In reply to the indictment formulated by Messrs. Amenomiya Keijiro and Tanaka Shinshichi, a document has been compiled by Mr. Murota and his colleagues. The latter point out that, in assessing the value of the Company's assets, the only legitimate method of procedure is to take for bases the prices actually ruling in the market. Mr. Amenomiya and his supporters contend that it is over-pessimistic to apply this rule to the whole stock of coal waiting to be disposed of, since its price may have considerably appreciated before the time for selling comes. But Mr. Murota insists that there may be further depreciation before the stock is disposed of, and that, at any rate, the only sound business method is to deal with actual prices as they exist to-day. With regard to the Company's lands in Hokkaido, it is unquestionably true that they would sell to-morrow for a much larger sum than that shown in the inventory of assets. But no careful business-men begin their schedule by setting down unrealized profits. That can be done at any moment. As for the enrollment of Mr. Kabayama Aisuke's name on the Board of Directors, Mr. Murota and his supporters contend that nothing is more desirable in the present state of the Company's affairs than to have a directorate including as many names as possible of men who command public confidence.

Our readers will probably agree with us in thinking that the above reply is not altogether consistent, for if the Company's stocks of coal are to be entered at their selling price, its landed properties should be similarly treated. But as to the addition of Mr. Kabayama's name to the list of Directors, all foreigners will agree that no wiser step could be taken in the interests of the Company. Mr. Kabayama is a gentleman who possesses universal confidence and whose knowledge of the English language and of foreign business methods is altogether exceptional. It may be noted that Mr. Tanaka Ginnosuke is also among Mr. Murota's supporters, so that foreign sympathy goes entirely with what is called the "Mitsui section" of the Directors. Any board including the names of Messrs. Kabayama, Aisuke and Tanaka Ginnosuke deserves public trust. Nevertheless, we observe with regret that, according to present appearances, Mr. Murota's party is likely to be worsted.

The Nippon publishes what purports to be a clear expression of the views of Mr. Murota with reference to the new dispute among the Directors of the Tanko S.S. Company. Mr. Murota says, in effect, that the affairs of the Company cannot possibly be adjusted satisfactorily on any lines other than those mapped out by him. In the days of Mr. Inouye Kakugoro's presidency, that gentleman handled matters in an arbitrary manner, with little reference to the other Directors. But Mr. Murota has followed a different principle, and has consulted the opinion of his colleagues on every topic. He finds it strange that the very men who took a prominent part in urging him to accept the post of President a short two months ago, should now be seeking to remove him. He declares, in the frankest manner, that if the programme proposed by Mr. Amenomiya and his partisans be adopted, he himself will resign at once. He also points out that the debts of the Company amount to 3 million yen, the greater part of which has been provided by the Yasuda and the Mitsui Banks. Doubtless the former would continue to give accommodation even after his, Mr. Murota's resignation; but it is more than doubtful whether the Mitsui would be so obliging. An idea seems to be entertained that while the interests of the small shareholders are fully represented on the Board, such is not the case with the large shareholders. That notion is quite incorrect. Mr. Inouye, Mr. Amenomiya and Viscount Watanabe are all represented by proxies among the Directors.

On the principle of audi alteram partem we quote the views expressed by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun. It says that the real question at issue is, not the valuation of the Company's assets, but the control of its affairs. Mr. Murota desires to obtain a new ally among the Directors, and with that object has asked to have the statutes of the Company altered so as to admit of an increase in the number of Directors. If this alteration were made, he would bring in Mr. Kabayama Aisuke. The Amenomiya faction opposes any such step, and alleges that Mr. Kabayama has no practical experience qualifying him to be a director—an argument which sounds very strange in view of the practice actually prevailing in Japan. The Nichi Nichi adds that Mr. Murota wishes to procure Mr. Kabayama's nomination to the directorate of the Seikoshu also, so that he may have the controlling voice in the affairs of the latter Company. That is obviously a random arrow, for the presence or absence of one director could not materially affect a company like the Seikoshu.

Tokyo newspapers publish the gist of the protest made by Mr. Amenomiya and his fellow-thinkers against the statement of accounts furnished by the new Board of Directors. Mr. Amenomiya says that the Company's actual liabilities are 3,900,000 yen, which will be reduced to 8,550,000 in October, when the next call on the old shares is paid up. There are ten yen due on each of the new shares, and when this is included, the liability will be reduced to 700,000 yen. Such a debt is a mere bagatelle for a Company with a capital of 27 millions. Turning to the Board's assessment of assets, Mr. Amenomiya insists that whereas much of the reclaimed land in Hokkaido is worth 50 yen a tsubo, it is all shown in the accounts at 5 yen, a similarly narrow view is taken of the other property of the Company, and altogether a pessimistic showing is made, whereas the facts warrant an optimistic one.

Mr. Murota replies that the land in Hokkaido is not all reclaimed, and that it would be extravagant to include among actual assets a property which has not yet any tangible existence. He adds that if the Directors are judged to have acted unwisely they are prepared to tender their resignation at any moment.

The Nippon thinks that the quarrel will eventuate in victory for the Amenomiya party.

THE FINANCIAL TROUBLE IN SHANGHAI.

Since the Taotai in Shanghai put up the sum of 3½ million taels to assist the three exchange-shops which had borrowed money from nine foreign banks, the financial situation has been steadily improving, and a telegram to the Mainichi Dempo says that the foreign banks have been entirely justified in their action. The preparation of detailed accounts is, however, giving some trouble, and the banks concerned are now busily investigating the question.

THE ANGLO-JAPANESE ALLIANCE.

Mr. G. Date, who appears to be the Paris correspondent of the Kokumin Shimbun, sends to that journal an analysis of the sentiments entertained in England towards the Alliance with Japan. He refers specially to a dinner recently given at the Salisbury Hotel in Fleet Street, when the editors of the foreign departments of several leading London journals discussed the Alliance in unreserved terms. They attributed much of the oppressive weight of English naval armaments to the Alliance, their view being that by joining hands with the East against the West, England had alienated German sympathy, and thus impelled the latter to launch upon the immense programme of naval construction which had become such a menace to England. At the moment, some excuse for the Alliance might have been found in the fact that Russia was at that time England's hereditary enemy in Asia; but this is no longer the case, and, on the other hand, the Alliance seems likely to seriously impair the relations between the United States and England. No Englishman can contemplate with indifference, whether from a racial or from a commercial point of view, the idea of a conflict with America, and this constitutes an additional reason for disliking the Alliance. Finally, there is not even the consolation of deriving adequate assistance from Japan. England, in the face of German effort, has had to give up her two-Power standard of naval strength and it would be some consolation if Japan set herself earnestly to redress the balance by a vigorous policy of naval expansion.

This is Mr. Date's appreciation of the situation, and he adds that the tariff question has injuriously complicated the issue.

The Asahi Shimbun has an interesting article on the subject of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. It sets out by saying that the object of the Exhibition must be said to have been fully attained, since it has contributed to the stability of the Alliance. There is no concealing the fact that the original purpose of this Alliance was to check the southward aggressions of Russia. Those aggressions, however, are now a thing of the past. Between Russia and Japan, between Russia and England, between Russia and France, between France and Japan and between France and England, there exist ententes which may be said to fully guarantee the situation. It is natural, therefore, that some publicists should talk of the Alliance being no longer necessary. But such a view does not commend itself to our Tokyo contemporary. The Asahi holds, in effect, that England and Japan joined hands, originally, for the protection of China, and that China is no better able to protect herself to-day than she was when the Alliance was formed. She has no army, nor any navy worthy of the name; and to hold that her helplessness would not attract the aggression of any Power, would be to place unparalleled trust in international morality. Until China is able to guarantee her own integrity and the policy of the Open Door, it would be highly dangerous to give up the Alliance.

THE WAKAMATSU FOUNDRY.

The Wakamatsu Iron Foundry is said to be about to absorb another block of the State's money. The Manager, Major-General Baron Nakamura, is quoted by the Fiji Shimpō as saying, in effect, that the works must be doubled. At present, the Foundry is capable of producing only 150,000 tons of iron annually, and is therefore obliged to refuse many commissions. General Nakamura insists that its capacity must be doubled, which would mean the expenditure of another sum of about 35 million yen. The Major-General does not name this last figure; neither does he indicate the length of time covered by the outlay; nor does he speak of the comparative prices of imported and home-made iron. He confines himself to insisting that the country must endeavour to be self-supporting in this matter, and that expert competence will come in time.

The Asahi Shimbun has a vehement article condemning Major General Nakamura's proposal to double the producing capacity of the Wakamatsu Iron Foundry. This enterprise was originally started on a basis of 5 million yen expenditure, and it has already cost the country between 50 and 60 millions; namely, over 30 millions for construction expenses, and over 20 millions for losses. Its accounts now show an actual annual loss of 2 million yen, not including interest on capital sunk. Hence it is a fair inference that if the works were doubled, they would cost the country over 4 millions annually. The Asahi cannot approve of such an expenditure. Baron Nakamura talks of a yearly demand for 600,000 or 700,000 tons of iron, and yet, under the plea of meeting national needs, he proposes only to double the present capacity of 150,000 tons. Yet the increased works would still be incapable of producing more than one-half of the quantity of iron required for annual use in Japan, and, consequently, there would be the same argument for quadrupling the output as there is now for doubling it. Imported iron, after paying insurance, cost of carriage and some 15 per cent. ad valorem duty, can, nevertheless, undersell iron smelted in Japan. Such a glaring discrepancy does not seem likely to be easily remedied, and the strong probability is that for many years to come the country will have to go on putting its hand in its pockets to support this ill-advised enterprise at Wakamatsu. The one sound argument on the Government's side is that the country should be self-supplying in the matter of iron for material of war. But that problem may easily be solved by means of a foundry capable of producing sufficient for this special purpose, iron for industrial uses being obtained from abroad.

Such is the Asahi's contention. It seems to us to carry much weight until we arrive at the last proposition, namely, that the country should limit its production to its warlike requirements. How could that possibly be managed, and what might be taken as the measure of such requirements? In time of peace they might be very small; in time of war, enormous.

COMMODITIES.

The returns of the Bank of Japan show that there was a marked depreciation of commodities during the month of July. Taking the average figure for June at 100, the figure for July is 99.34, a difference of 0.66. The number of commodities which fell in price was 17, the number which rose, 11; and the number which remained stationary, 28.

JAPANESE COMPANIES.

The state of affairs in Japanese joint-stock companies does not improve upon close inspection. What with dishonest practices and jealous struggles on the part of directors, things are decidedly sombre. The case of the Keihin Electric Railway is now attracting much attention. Its shares refuse to partake of the upward movement in the market, and there is now talk of the resignation of Mr. Miura, who accepted the Presidency solely for the purpose of introducing reform. A few days ago his resignation was said to be compulsory, but the reason now assigned is that he cannot achieve his purpose, and that great doubts have arisen about the application of 4 million yen which stand in the book as "construction expenses." Moreover, Mr. Miura has found it impossible to check dishonesty on the part of conductors, any drastic measure of that nature being thought likely to cause a strike.

Meanwhile, the trouble in connection with the Yenoshima Electric Tram Company has been settled. As this was a simple case of fraudulent borrowing by two or three of the directors, it needs no special comment.

As for the Toyo S.S. Company, a formal demand has been preferred to the Hoden Oil Company for the return of the price of two tank steamers, namely 3,400,000 yen. It is expected that this matter will be compromised at a meeting of the two Companies' directors, which is to be held on the 14th inst. Meanwhile the shares of the Toyo S.S. Company have taken a strong upper leap.

There is a dispute among the shareholders of the Tanko S.S. Company. One party, headed by Mr. Murata, are in favour of paying no dividend this term, and another party are equally insistent on payment. It is thought that a compromise will be effected by paying 2½ per cent.

ANOTHER BANK.

Mr. Katsuda, Chief of the Economic Bureau in the Department of Finance, is reported by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun to be strongly in favour of a project recently referred to in these columns, namely, the establishment of a bank for lending money on the security of fixed property. The Agricultural and Industrial Banks already transact this business, but on a limited scale, and scarcely at all in the case of urban lands and houses. A notion prevails among foreigners that the Industrial Bank, over which Mr. Soyeda so ably presides, is prepared to grant large accommodation on the security of fixed property. We believe that to be a misconception. The Kogyo Ginkō advances money chiefly against shares and debentures. The principal bank which grants accommodation against fixed property is the Yasuda, and formerly transactions of this kind were readily enough undertaken by other banks also; but the consequent fixing of capital proved so inconvenient that it is now a matter of no small difficulty to obtain loans against immovable property on easy terms. Many people would probably contend that if the Government obtrudes itself into this sphere of finance also, private enterprise will be checked, as it certainly has been by the State's connection with the Industrial Bank. This is a difficult problem to solve.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Japanese newspapers state that when Baron Mumm left Tokyo recently, it was not his programme to return to Japan. He anticipated appointment to another post. But his movements have been influenced by the intended visit of the German Prince Imperial to the Far East. To prepare for that important event his Excellency will return once more to Tokyo, and will leave the Japanese capital finally about April next. The public seems to be under an impression that this journey of the Prince Imperial eastward is the result of a suddenly taken resolve. But that is denied by the Kokumin Shimbun. On the contrary, the trip of His Imperial Highness was planned a long time ago and was finally decided in June last. The Prince will probably arrive in Japan some time in October so as to escape any great heat on the voyage. It has been stated that he intends to travel by a warship but that is now denied.

The Asahi Shimbun publishes an analysis of the various sections in the House of Peers, but the interest of our readers will be satisfied when we say that the 365 members of the House are at present divided into no less than 9 sections, the largest of which, the Kenkyu-kai, comprises 80 members, and the next largest, namely the Independents, comprises 78. There are actually in the House, 21 so-called Independents, but 43 of them do not get the credit of being really central. The most important changes that have taken place since last December are that the Thursday Club (Mokuyokai) has dwindled from 51 to 24, and a new association called the Seiko Club has been formed with the seceders, to the number of 18.

The latest theory about the origin of the Japanese race is that there is close kinship between them and the people of Peru. The latter are said to resemble the former both in physiognomy and in customs, and the resemblance is so great as to be unrefusable to mere chance. The idea is that both races derived a large element from the inhabitants of the south-sea islands, some of whom drifted eastward and some westward. We do not know whether this theory owes anything to a propaganda in favour of emigration from Japan to Peru but we observe that the two things are bracketed together in the context of a glowing account of the gum-yielding resources of Peru.

The Royal Horticultural Society of England has devoted a sum of 1,000 yen to prizes for the best Japanese landscape gardens, dwarfed shrubs and artificial flowers, shown at the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition. Nine prizes were given, ranging in value from 50 to 300 yen. The prize-winners are as follow:—

The Floating Island Garden...	Mr. Ozawa Keiji
The Two Gardens.....	Mr. Izawa Hannosuke
A Box Garden	The Taiko-en
Dwarf Trees	Yokohama Shrub Co.
Bronze Garden Lantern	Hayashi Shinsuke
Flower Arrangement	Ikenobo
Artificial flower Garden	Nippon Yusen Kaisha
Artificial Flowers	Girls' Industrial School

Travelling in groups may be said to have become quite fashionable. This form of pastime, which combines information with recreation seems to find special favour in Russia and Japan. On the 4th inst. a large party of Japanese language-students set out from Vladivostok for Tsuruga, on their return journey, and on the same day another party left Tsuruga for Vladivostok. We read also of a third party of 100 members which has just left, or is on the point of leaving, Niigata.

The Special Committee of the Tokyo Municipality, which was commissioned to examine and report upon the project of an overhead electric railway in Tokyo, has decided to recommend the scheme. The railway is to set out from Shinagawa, and be carried along the sea-shore, thence passing up the bank of the Sumida River as far as Senju. It is stated that the Committee's reason for approving the project is to create competition with the Tokyo Railway Co. The citizens are dissatisfied with the latter, and the projectors of the new line, headed by Mr. Amenomiya Keijiro, are precisely the men to take advantage of such a mood.

We read in the Nippon that the agreement which has hitherto existed between the five principal fire insurance companies in Japan has practically come to an end. Some time ago they reduced their rates to the same figures as those charged by the foreign companies, but both sides have of late departed signally from their schedules, and coöperation has therefore ceased to be possible among the Japanese.

A strange story is going the round of the Tokyo journals. An Austrian Baron is accused of exceedingly rude conduct towards Japanese railway officials. Particulars are given, but as they seem scarcely credible, we refrain from reproducing them. The facts will doubtless be known in a few days.

The affairs of the Keihin Railway Company are said to be still in an unsettled condition. The resignation of the Managing Director was announced a few days ago, and the reasons assigned were that he had consulted his own interests in fixing the localities of the stations so as to suit the conditions of lands owned by him and his friends. Nothing definite is heard of these charges, but that a settlement has not yet been reached is proved by the resignation of another Director, Mr. Moriya. An idea appears to be growing that the affairs of this Company call for close scrutiny. Nobody suggests that there is anything unsound in the actual condition of the enterprise, and nobody doubts its profit-earning capacities. But a great many people question whether its finances are managed in a sound manner.

Our readers are aware that the finishing touches were recently given to an electric tram plying between the railway station at Nikko and the hamlet of Iwahana, commonly known as Umagaeshi, because it is the point where travellers bound for Chusenji have to give up their horses. The fares have just been published. They are progressive, the basis rate being two sen a stage, so that the charge from the station to the bridge over the Daiyagawa is 6 sen, and the charge to Iwahana, 22 sen. These prices are irrespective of the transit tax.

The party of Japanese Language-School students who left their country on the 10th of July returned on the 6th inst. to Tsuruga. They speak in warm terms of the welcome extended to them, especially in the towns of Nikolaivsk and Habarovsk. Evergreen arches were erected in both towns, with hospitable legends written in Chinese characters. Most of the visitors had studied Russian, and this fact produced an excellent effect, especially when associated with the new Convention, which the Russians regard as having made brothers of the two nationalities.

The Yomiuri Shimbun preaches something very like a goody-goody sermon to the Directors of the Tokyo Gas Company, and to those of the Chiyoda Gas Company. It says, in effect, "Don't go on squabbling like naughty boys as to which shall have the upper hand. Lay aside your ruinous competition, and each go his own gait without reference to his opponent." It appears to us that the two Companies know their own business a great deal better than any newspaper editor can possibly know it.

On the 14th inst. the meeting is to be resumed in St. Petersburg with reference to linking the railway systems of Europe and the Far East. It will be remembered that this meeting was deferred in consequence of the international conference in Brussels, but the latter having have been concluded, the former will be renewed. Japan will be represented by Mr. Kinoshita, a railway engineer, and by Mr. Tanaka, of the South-Manchuria Railway. The latter is also accredited to represent the Osaka Shosen Kaisha, which runs steamers between Dairen and Japan. When the Conference is concluded, it will be possible to buy a through ticket from Tokyo to any of the European capitals.

The inclement weather of the past few days seems likely to injure not the rice-crop only but also the silk crop. The summer silk worms and the autumn will both be affected, and though the price of this staple has gone up, this will not nearly compensate for the loss entailed by the weather. Floods are also reported from many quarters, and despite yesterday's improvement in the weather, the outlook is disquieting.

Talk is again heard of the purchase of this cable from the Great Northern Telegraph Company by the Japanese Government. Negotiations were undertaken some years ago, but they fell through; and now that the Company's charter expires in two years, it is thought that a favourable opportunity presents itself for renewing the scheme.

A NEW PRIVILEGE GRANTED TO MIDDLE SCHOOLS.

With a view of obtaining students who are marked by decision of character, the Department of Education some months ago issued a new regulation respecting Entrance Examinations for the High Schools, whereby Middle School students who in behaviour and work reach a certain standard are allowed to enter High Schools without passing an entrance examination. But it is necessary that such students should remain in the same Middle School for three years. This regulation will not have the effect of rendering entrance examinations unnecessary for all Middle School students, as the number of applicants for entrance to the High Schools without an examination is greater than existing vacancies and is likely to be so in future. The advantage of the new system will be that the competing students who hail from Middle Schools will all be youths who have good records. This, it is considered, will raise the tone of the High Schools and will tend to weed out the numerous weaklings who now attend these schools.

W.D.

THE SESSION'S RECORD AND EFFECT.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 6)

THE Parliamentary Session of 1910, which promised to be the most fateful and momentous in recent political history, has, through the influence of an utterly unforeseen event, come to a comparatively uneventful close. The House rose on the 3rd inst., but so far from having concluded its labours for the year, will follow a regrettable precedent, which Liberal Ministries have established and are fast converting into practice, by reassembling for an autumn session on November 15th. Thus the crisis of May, with all its portentous possibilities, has been transferred to November. If the original postponement was the work of "the act of God," in depriving the nation with fearful suddenness of its acknowledged Head, the resumption of strife at an unnecessarily early stage must be laid to the charge of the Radical "Red Mountain," and their Irish allies. It had been the hope of all sober-minded men, whether sympathizers with the Government or not, that the year darkened for English History by the death of the Seventh EDWARD, and the opening year of the new Sovereign's reign would be unmarred by the pitched battle of the polls. In other words, a strong feeling is believed to exist against the holding of a General Election prior to the Coronation which has been arranged to take place next June. For there seems little possibility—despite the good intentions of the Moderates of both the great political parties—of keeping the CROWN out the mire of party strife. The extremists who, in the absence of any league between the non-revolutionary elements, must continue to control the situation, have no choice between being reduced to political impotence, if not extinction, or attaining victory—disastrous victory—through the forced intervention of the Crown. Hence, of course, the loud protest from Radical and Irish throats against the one hope of the Moderates—a compromise arrived at through the instrumentality of the Conference, and the acceptance of that compromise by a substantial majority in the House of Commons. This in fact is the whole meaning and purpose of the Autumn Session. The mere holding of that session is already "a hit—a palpable hit" for the extremists. When the Prime Minister announced from the Treasury Bench that there was to be an Autumn Session, the world knew that the Radical-Irish faction had once more bent a Liberal Ministry to its will. For it is the clearly-expressed intention of the Red-Republican clique to wreck the work of the Conference, unless the settlement at which the party leaders have arrived contains the revolutionary all for which they ask. The attitude of the extremists is clearly reflected in a recent speech of the Labourite, Mr. PHILIP SNOWDEN. Its uncompromising character may be gauged from the following passage:—

"The Labour party are in earnest. If it should turn out that the Government do not prosecute this campaign to a conclusion which will forever take away the power of the House of Lords to oppose the democratic will, then the Labour party will have something to say about it, and I do wish the people to believe that if the Government recede one single inch from the conditions embodied in the resolutions in the House of Commons, if there is an agreement between the representatives of the Liberal party and the Unionist party for what they call a settlement of the constitutional question which will allow the House of Lords to retain the shadow of veto power over financial measures or a permanent veto upon general legislation, then the Liberal party will be dead without the hope of resurrection."

The ASQUITH Ministry will then be called upon to choose, and choose quickly, between defeat in the House—with a consequent appeal to the country, the issue of which no man can foresee—and a more or less ignominious alliance with their hereditary enemies, the Unionists. Such is the crisis which a tyrannous minority insists on bringing to a head before the issue of this death-marked year of grace, and such are the disagreeable alternatives to which the Liberal officeholders have to look forward—in November next. Meanwhile (as is only to be expected at a time when the great issues are fearfully held in abeyance) the legislative record is scarcely of a monumental character. Even the Budget for the current year has not become law. Its concluding stages have also been postponed, for obvious reasons, to November. When Mr. REDMOND has been favoured with the results of the Constitutional Conference, he will then, according as he likes or dislikes them, permit the Budget to be passed or he will do what the Lords must be damned for doing—reject it. As for the other measures, an attempt was made on the part of the Little Navyites, headed by an Irish agitator who doubtless perceives that in the effacement of British maritime power there lies a surer road to Irish independence than in the emasculation of the Lords—to reduce by £2,000,000 the expenditure on new construction; but the unpatriotic venture miserably failed. Even a Liberal Government has at last realized that social—or, shall we say, Socialistic—reform without national security is as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. On the other hand, apart from questions whose undebatable character should raise them above the plane of party politics, three measures have received the Royal Assent. The Accession Declaration Bill, which, by appealing to the bigoted on both sides of the House, and by threatening to arouse that sleeping lion, the Nonconformist Conscience, seemed at one time to forebode an era of mingled political and religious strife, has been framed in so conciliatory a spirit as to silence even bigotry. The Regency Bill, providing for the rule of Queen Mary during the minority of the young Prince of Wales, in the untoward event of the Reaper once again assailing the Royal House, has been placed upon the statute book, and the new Civil List, providing for the expenses of the Household, likewise encountered no opposition. But comparatively speaking, the life of the new Parliament, since the stormy events which ushered, in its birth, has been barren of legislative results. We do not say that, in the unusual circumstances of its existence up to the present, anything different could have been expected. The "Truce of God" has been recognized on all hands. The only matter for regret is that the hope of prolonging that truce into permanent constitutional peace should be endangered by the brutally aggressive and unreasoning attitude of those who stand for parochialism, as opposed to nationalism and imperialism, in British politics.

NEW ENGLISH CATHEDRALS.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 6)

IN this age of materialism and social decadence it is refreshing to find that communities still exist where less sordid considerations hold the hearts of men. No doubt it is with little regret that the world as a whole bade farewell to the middle ages, upon which modern civilization looks back much as a rescued miner looks back upon the darksome pit wherein he all but perished. Nevertheless it were well for the world that it knew more of the spirit of altruism and of reverential art which raised to the Creator's glory such noble fanes as those of Rheims, of Ely or of Seville. "Mammon," says Mr. ALEXANDER IRVINE of New York, "is the devil within the world, and a much more satisfactory devil he is than the devil the Jews painted for us before the early Christians met and dealt with the power of money. His countenance intimately resembles the ruling politician of our generation." While we hesitate to endorse so sweeping a charge against the political publicist, even in America, there is no denying the pernicious influence excited on modern society by the adoration and pursuit of wealth. Indeed a community is already far on the road to decay when it holds cheap those primitive virtues of which Mr. ROOSEVELT has spoken so forcibly and measures the worth of its individuals by their capacity for ostentatious display. Is not such a community but little above the level of the money-changers in the Temple Court, and does it not as urgently need the advent of the Master with his whip of cords? It is refreshing then, we repeat, to find that things spiritual, and the devotionally attuned creative instinct of the Middle Ages, have not altogether lost their hold upon some portions of humanity. As evidence of this, the raising of three magnificent "prayers in stone" to the Deity whom having not seen they yet reverence and love does immeasurable credit to the people of England at this present day. When the inhabitants of Liverpool decide to crown their city's heights with a Gothic cathedral fit to be compared with any of the grand old English minsters, and set themselves to raise the sum of half a million sterling for that purpose, they were laying up for themselves treasure where, in the words of the Master, "neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal." They were at the same time earning the gratitude of their compatriots and of posterity for adding thus notably to England's monuments of art. Liverpool, like Bristol, Birmingham and Sheffield, is one of those great English cities of comparatively modern growth whose ecclesiastical equipment has not kept pace with its material progress. As with Bristol, where the stately edifice of St. Mary Redcliffe far surpasses the so-called Cathedral, Liverpool's principal place of worship was not commensurate with the civic wealth and dignity. An elevated and commanding site was selected on St. James' Mount in 1901, and the foundation stone was laid three years later by King EDWARD VII. The design drawn up by Mr. G. GILBERT SCOTT—son of the distinguished ecclesiastical architect, Sir GILBERT SCOTT—is for a Gothic structure of great height which, when completed, will be 584ft. in length, slightly longer than that of Winchester, at present the longest of English Cathedrals. In the first instance, only the choir, transepts, and central space are to be constructed, and these will provide seating accommodation for about 3,500 persons. Of this first portion the Lady Chapel—a structure of great beauty—has just been completed at a cost of between £50,000 and £60,000, and the first services have been held therein. Quite another part of England has in recent years received the distinction of a cathedral based on the masterly, if mediæval, designs which Canterbury and Lincoln have made familiar. We refer to the new minster at Truro, Cornwall, which, commenced some 15 years ago, is now practically complete. Built of almost white freestone and of ample but harmonious proportions, this cathedral, if it lacks the hoary dignity of the other English minsters, is a worthy addition to their number. Again, in the heart of the Metropolis, the new Roman Catholic Cathedral at Westminster has been carried to completion. We fancy that this stately building, in the Byzantine style of architecture, must appeal to the Englishman rather by its impressive interior than by its external features; but it is nevertheless a noteworthy accession to London's places of worship. With these three temples rising simultaneously, as it were, to the Father of Mankind, the Mother Country deserves the congratulations of all who set some store by the spiritual side of man's manifold nature.

REFERENCE AS A BASIS OF EMPIRE.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 9)

IT is not often in these days of constitutional crises and social "reforms" that questions of Imperial concern have a chance of receiving even a passing degree of attention at the hands of that assembly which has to do duty for an Imperial Parliament. It is a matter for congratulation, therefore, that the Leader of the Opposition found an opportunity—probably, as he pointed out, the last opportunity before the meeting of the next Imperial Conference—of discussing the vital and increasingly urgent question of preference within the Empire. The occasion of which Mr. BALFOUR availed himself was the second reading of the Appropriation Bill, and the debate which followed, apart from its intrinsic interest, had the effect of compelling the Government to lay bare the nakedness of the land, if one may thus metaphorically describe the attitude of the Ministry in the face of colonial advances and the crying needs of the Empire. The Unionist leader showed that, since Canada in 1843 expressed an opinion in favour of Colonial Preference, all the Dominions had with one voice pressed that policy on the Mother Country, and it was the Mother Country alone that had stood in the way of its adoption. The unfortunate effects of this attitude are now beginning to reveal themselves, and no man can say to what disastrous issues they may lead. As Mr. BALFOUR went on to point out, the British Dominions beyond the Seas are becoming great nations in themselves, and Canada has already had to carry on commercial relations with various Great Powers. "Every one of the treaties she has made has," he said, "been accompanied by a diminution in the preferential advantage of this country." It was inevitable that the same pressure which had driven Canada into negotiations with foreign Governments must, sooner or later, be felt by the other Dominions, and the consequence of this would be, the ex-Premier was certain, that such advantages of Preference as we now enjoyed at their hands would gradually be whittled away, faster or more slowly, until they vanished altogether. We do not think Mr. BALFOUR's warning is uncalled for. With things going as they are now, the day cannot be far distant when Great Britain will be to Greater Britain as a foreign Power. Meanwhile the inhabitants of the United Kingdom are watching one market after another being diminished or taken away, without being able to strike a diplomatic blow in their defence. Yet it is left to a Party—and that a Party not in power—instead of to the State and to all British Statesmen, to take up the policy of Imperial Federation through the medium of preferential tariffs. It was a number of years ago that Lord ROSEBURY expressed in eloquent and inspiring words the Imperial Idea—"a peaceful Empire encircling the globe with a bond of commercial unity and peace." Said the great Liberal-Imperialist, "Ever since I traversed those vast regions which own the sway of the British Crown outside these islands, I have felt that there was a cause which merited all the enthusiasm and energy that man could give it. . . . It is a cause for which anyone might be content to live; it is a cause for which, if needs be, anyone might be content to die." Nevertheless the Liberal dog continues to be wagged by its parochial tail. The once great historic party—swayed by a blinded mass of Socialists, Labourites, parochialists, pensioners, Home-rulers and self-seeking cranks—remains uninspired. The Imperial idea leaves Liberalism cold. Nay more: sedulous appeals are made to the selfish ignorance of the masses. They are implored not to vote for Imperial Federation, lest the price of bread might conceivably be enhanced to the extent of a half-penny per quartern-loaf! And when the great inspiring theme comes up for consideration in the Mother of Parliaments, it is officially blanketed. "Are you going to tax Corn?" asks the PRIME MINISTER, ringing the changes on the dear-food bogey. "Here, I think, there is a little rift in the Protectionist lute. Is Colonial corn to come in free? If so, where does the British farmer come in?" This momentous question of the "little loaf," which has been answered time and again, was once more dealt with by Mr. HENRY CHAPLIN. The veteran of the Tariff Reform movement made the Unionist position on this point quite clear. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's policy, he said, was to let Colonial corn in free. The Tariff Commission afterwards proposed that there should be a duty of 1s. on Colonial corn and one of 2s. on foreign corn; but the present policy of the Party was the policy announced by Mr. BALFOUR, in which Mr. CHAPLIN said he was perfectly ready to concur, that the duty should be limited to foreign corn. Whereupon Colonel SEELY, whose career and present position should have had the effect of broadening his mind, once more with apparent triumph struck the parochial-party note. "The Leader of the Opposition," he declared, "had committed himself, and presumably his followers, to a tax on corn." The under-Secretary's arrière pensée could hardly have been more obvious had he spoken it aloud—"Election Agents in working men's constituencies, please note: taxation on poor man's loaf foreshadowed by Unionist Party." Nor did the impressive warning uttered by Mr. H. J. MACKINDER weigh against the prospect of few misgotten votes. The Government, said this recognized authority on economics, was driving the Colonies away. "The breaking up of the Empire is now in progress under our eyes."

We are far from saying that the policy of Tariff Reform is devoid of difficulties, even of anomalies, and possibly of inconsistencies. But we believe that the business men of the Empire, if they were met together for the purpose, untrammelled by party considerations, could certainly devise a scheme which, without being in any way detrimental to the Mother Country, would confer some immediate and practical benefit on every Dependency or Dominion, thus making each of them working partners in one great Imperial concern. In the rapid development which such stimulation of their natural resources would indubitably bring, the Mother Country would be bound to share. Sir CHARLES DILKE, whose political proclivities should absolve him of the charge of attempting to bring into being that self-contained Empire the mere notion of which, to the Little Englander, is a moral offence—has remarked in one of his writings that “the British Empire, lying in all latitudes, produces every requirement of life and trade. It possesses the greatest wheat-granaries, wool-markets, timber-forests and diamond-fields in the world; and as for food-supply, its inhabitants might, if they pleased, be independent of any foreign source.” Such is the ideal of self-sufficing strength which all well-wishers of the Empire should set before themselves. It is to the lasting credit of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN’S genius that he first taught his countrymen to look upon the Colonies not as the burdens, but as the assets, of the Motherland; and that he invested the policy of Tariff Reform in an Imperial garb. We believe that thus, in this far-seeing spirit, the cause of Imperial Preference will triumph over the narrow creeds of those who only England know, and who for only England care; we believe that the larger vision will prevail, and Imperialism yet succeed in vanquishing parochialism; we believe that mutual preference, with a single eye to the welfare of the Empire as a whole, will prove to be the safest, and the only satisfactory basis on which any Empire constituted as is the British Empire can subsist.

“THE KITCHENER AGITATION.”

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 10.)

IT is clear from the statement recently made by the PRIME MINISTER in the House of Commons that the Government has no use for the high abilities and unique experience of Lord KITCHENER of Khartoum. Replying to a comprehensive enquiry from Mr. GIBSON BOWLES, as to whether Lord KITCHENER had ever been invited to become, or had been appointed, a member of the Committee of Imperial Defence; whether the holding of the appointment of General Officer Commanding in Chief in the Mediterranean was qualification for appointment to the Committee of Imperial Defence and a refusal to hold that appointment a disqualification; and whether his Majesty’s Government would consider the advisability of strengthening the Committee by inviting Lord KITCHENER to become a member thereof, the PRIME MINISTER made answer that Lord KITCHENER, when it was proposed to him that he should accept the post of Commander-in-Chief in the Mediterranean, was offered, in conjunction with it, a seat on the Committee of Imperial Defence; that after full consideration he declined the Mediterranean Command, and the other offer consequently fell to the ground. Mr. ASQUITH proceeded to state that the Committee of Imperial Defence “is constituted by the Prime Minister of such persons as for the time being he invites to sit upon it,” and that while the Government attached the highest value to Lord KITCHENER’S distinguished military ability and experience, they did not think it desirable to give undertakings as to who should, and who should not, be invited to sit on the Committee.

This unsatisfactory state of things is of course the sequel to the refusal of the late Commander-in-Chief in India to accept that somewhat mysterious Mediterranean Command which the DUKE of CONNAUGHT had declined to retain, and this despite official inducements that the scope and responsibilities of the position were to be increased, as it were, to a degree commensurate with Lord KITCHENER’S high reputation. Even if the proposed removal of the distinguished soldier to a safe distance from the purlieus of Whitehall were not based on political intrigue, the Government, in the opinion of competent observers, have succeeded in making themselves ridiculous. Lord LANSDOWNE, indeed, went so far as to observe, in the House of Lords, that the resignation of Lord KITCHENER, following as it did so closely on that of his Royal predecessor, “probably constituted as great a rebuff as even the War Office had ever received.” We do not think that Mr. ASQUITH has in any sense improved matters by his ex-cathedra pronouncement as to the composition of the Imperial Defence Committee. If, failing a post of active usefulness, the military talents of so great a soldier are not to be utilized even in an advisory capacity, the PRIME MINISTER can hardly be surprised if the public looks for other and less creditable explanations of this consignment of Lord KITCHENER to the shelf. “The late Commander-in-Chief in India,” says one of the leading reviews, “is a national asset, and it is the wish of the country that that asset should be turned to account in Whitehall.” Unfortunately, that is not the wish of the Government. Hence what a Radical paper calls “the Kitchener agitation,” which it congratulates the ASQUITH Ministry on having the courage to resist. However, it is interesting to note that certain Liberal papers are taking an active part in this same agitation, and by no means in a congratulatory strain. Thus we find, in a recent issue of that unctuous sheet, the Daily News, the following panegyric on the distinguished soldier, mingled with censure of its own political patrons:—

“By universal consent, Lord Kitchener is the most formidable military asset of an intellectual kind which we possess. He has an unrivalled experience of armies in the field, he has exhibited exceptional organising and administrative talents, and his will-power is proportioned to his skill and his knowledge. By a consent not less universal, it is precisely these qualities which our Army is hungering for, and yet we have the spectacle of the British Army being deprived of Lord Kitchener’s services. We do not know who if anybody is responsible for this unfortunate situation, and we do not desire to allocate blame, still less is it the function of a newspaper to indicate the capacity in which Lord Kitchener ought to be employed. But it is our plain duty to say that the country cannot afford the extravagance of allowing its greatest military genius to rust from disuse while still in the vigour of years, and we express the hope that Lord Kitchener’s period of rest, whether enforced or voluntary, may not be prolonged indefinitely. There is work for him to do, and there is no other man in England who could do the work as well.”

To this style of “exaggerated eulogy” and to the KITCHENER agitation in general, the Spectator takes exception, on the ground that “to write in this way about soldiers, and indeed about any public servants, is to spoil them;” and suggests that, so far from the hero of Khartoum and Paardeberg being “one of those simple-minded, single-ideal men who dream of nothing else but serving their country,” as any one reading the Daily News would suppose, the real reason of Lord KITCHENER’S refusal to retain the Mediterranean Command was that he was aiming at the highest civilian appointment in the gift of the CROWN, namely, the Governor-Generalship of India. We fancy that, for once, the sedatest of the reviews is out of touch with public opinion. Rightly or wrongly—most people, we imagine, would say rightly—Lord KITCHENER has, by his remarkably successful record, obtained a hold upon the popular imagination which will compare with that obtained by any man of his generation. With that popular faith in his undoubtedly conspicuous abilities, the arm-chair warriors at Whitehall, and Parliamentarians in particular like Mr. HALDANE, “whose suave rhetoric can paint putty to look like granite”—however unanxious they may be, as men of words, to measure themselves with the man of action—will most certainly have to reckon at no distant date. There are always plenty of technical excuses to be urged, as more than one of the Government’s critics point out, for a Ministerial refusal to employ an eminent man who, for one reason or another, does not happen to be persona grata. But we shall be much mistaken if, in the face of accomplished facts, the public shows any patience with such pleas. The attitude of the great majority of Lord KITCHENER’S countrymen will rather, we are inclined to think, be reflected in the impassioned words of a service journal which we here quote in conclusion:—

“Hercules, in Lord Rosebery’s celebrated phrase, has returned from the Himalayas. He has indeed taken the whole world in his stride, but he is to be given no chance to cleanse the Augean stables on his return. The organiser of victory in the Sudan and in South Africa, the reorganiser of our Indian military system, the adviser in whom the Self-governing Dominions put their trust, has apparently no honour, not in his own country but in Downing Street and Whitehall. Once again mediocrity has registered its triumph in the perpetual game it plays against talent. The event, unfortunately, is no new one in the history of this country, and Lord Kitchener merely adds another name to the long list of men who, like Lord Curzon or Lord Milner, have been laid on the shelf in the very heyday of their powers. But the end is not yet, and the people will not permanently permit Governments and subordinates to deal with the great servants of the Empire in that spirit of jealous suspicion which defined the attitude of more than one Monarch to the overpowering gifts of Chatham. It is well to remember on occasion that there is bound to be a return from Elba."

CANADIAN DEVELOPMENT IN ITS RELATION TO THE EMPIRE.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 11.)

IT is impossible for any Briton—whether he hails from the home-land, from New Zealand or that latest of the Dominions, South Africa—to remain unimpressed by the almost phenomenal development of the Canadian confederation within recent years. On all hands there are the same unmistakable evidences of expanding wealth, increasing population and spreading influence—all these the fruits of the unrivalled natural resources of that half-continent, and of the consistent energy of its inhabitants. As the New Brunswick poet reminded his countrymen ten years ago, in his stirring "Ode for the Canadian Confederacy," the hour of dreams is done. If Canada has not yet fully awakened to a sense of her national and imperial destiny, there are at least signs that the process is nearing completion. There are those who think that her privileges as a partner in the Imperial heritage still bulk more largely in Canadian eyes than do her responsibilities; but that, we believe, is merely a defect of youth. The sense of responsibility, in its social or altruistic aspect, is of later growth than the sense of possession or of power. After all, half a century is an inconsiderable period in the growth of a nation, and it is little more than forty years since the realization of the ideal of Sir JOHN MACDONALD—whom a recent writer has appraised as "the greatest by far of the statesmen born in the Overseas Dominions." That ideal was a trans-continental Canada, and all honour must be paid to the genius who conceived and brought it to fruition. That great act of constructive statesmanship now needs to be seconded by a still greater achievement, the confederation of all the Imperial partners by means of fraternal preference within the Empire. When that final act in the drama of British Imperial growth is accomplished, Canada will of necessity occupy an honoured place in the comity of British nations. Meanwhile, however, it cannot be said that Canadians have themselves achieved unity within their borders, for the French-Canadian hierarchy of Quebec still forms an imperium in imperio, and will continue to do so as long as it sets its face against any intermingling of French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians. The selection of a French-Canadian Prime Minister has of course done much to remove the old antipathy, but there still remains enough race-feeling to constitute an anti-Imperialistic, if not an actually disloyal, influence. As for the Premier himself, he deserves universal congratulation for the manner in which he has identified himself with the constructive national policy inspired by Sir JOHN MACDONALD, and pursued by such men as Lord STRATHCONA and Sir T. SHAUGHNESSY. Canada owes her astonishing development, in the first place, to that trans-continental policy to which we have already alluded; in the second place, to the systematic protection of Eastern industries for the market of the non-manufacturing West; and, in the third place, to a vigorous immigration policy. It is in these last two respects, especially, that Sir WILFRID LAURIER has deserved well of his countrymen. We are not sure, however, that he has not carried his national ideals to a point at which they become anti-Imperial, just as an ultra-individualistic attitude is essentially anti-social in its effect. No one will deny to the Canadian Premier the noblest sentiments and a rare gift of clothing them in the most eloquent language—his latest utterance to German settlers in the North West is a case in point; but we venture to say that we are not alone in thinking that Sir WILFRID LAURIER's words are sometimes fairer than his deeds. This is illustrated, of course, in the Canadian naval policy, which may be said to be peculiarly his own, and at the same time illustrates our contention of the ultra-national spirit as antagonistic to the truly Imperial. The development of local capacity in such a special direction as that of warship-building has no doubt something to be said on its behalf; but are there not other, and greater, issues at stake? And even from the national point of view, what Canadian can take pride in a navy consisting of a few second-class cruisers, when even South American Republics are equipping themselves with super-Dreadnoughts? Of what value, even from the national point of view, is a navy not one unit of which is "fit to lie in the line"—a navy which New Zealand's single Dreadnought would be capable of sending to the bottom? However, we believe that all that is wanted here is a little education in matters of naval strategy and history; and this, we feel sure, will suffice to show Canadian Liberals the shortsightedness and unsoundness of their present naval policy. The spirit of Imperialism is abroad in the land, and its practical embodiment in this regard may be looked forward to with confidence in the near future. The rumours one hears from time to time, mainly from American sources, of an alleged hankering after the Stars and Stripes on the part of the Canadian people may be dismissed as unworthy of credence. The statement attributed, in a recently published "interview," to Admiral Sir ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS—which interview has since been repudiated—served to some extent as a test-case. The Admiral is reported to have said that "while annexation to the United States was not openly spoken of, it was none the less at the bottom of many men's hearts, and men also who were holding responsible positions under the Crown." Ample evidence has since been adduced to show that no such desire exists, either in the official or the non-official world. "There may be eccentric and perverse individuals in Canada," writes a Canadian journal, "who would willingly exchange the Union Jack for the Stars and Stripes, but no body of opinion of that kind can be said to exist, and no one holding 'a responsible position under the Crown' is likely to blast his fortunes and reputation by advocating such treachery." Wherever the Canadian of today hailed from originally, it is a remarkable, but none the less incontrovertible, fact that he has become and remains a Canadian. "The chief achievement of modern Canada," writes the Ottawa correspondent of a London review, "is that she has produced the modern Canadian—a type not easily defined, but distinguished from others without difficulty, a type which combines the expansiveness of the American character with the Englishman's conservatism and respect for legality." A similar inference is drawn by the same writer from the widely different ways in which the National Holiday is observed in the two countries:—

Seeing that Dominion Day is kept as a holy day rather than a holiday, as a time for meditation on the larger issues of the nation's past and future rather than as an opportunity for the burning of gunpowder and displays of rhetorical fireworks, the still greater cry of the national conscience is likely to be heard in all the habitations of men from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Great Lakes to the Arctic Ocean. There is a great and significant difference between the way Canadians celebrate the First of July and Americans commemorate their Fourth of July.

Pan-Americanism apart, however, there are two dangers by which the future of Canada is beset. The one of them is from within: the other from without. "Not having grasped the truth," writes the correspondent whom we have already quoted, "that the character of its public men is the fate of a nation, the Canadian thinks he is at present too busy to purge Canadian public life of the bribery and corruption that have become systematised under the existing administration. Imperialist as he is by nature and by training, he suffers himself to be governed by men who say to themselves, secretly, 'the Empire, it is myself.' As long as he suffers this wrong, he cannot be regarded as fully conscious of his nation's manifest destiny." The other danger which threatens Canadian security, and threatens also the solidarity of the whole Empire, is the persistence with which the English statesmen now controlling its destinies cling to a miserably inadequate and out-of-date fiscal policy "deliberately designed by its main authors to destroy our Imperial system." To be delivered from these two dangers the modern Canadian may fittingly pray; and when the day of deliverance dawns—through his own efforts and through the political extinction of those whose indifference to the claims of Empire makes them its worst enemies—Canada may well prepare herself to play her magnificent rôle, for which her geographical position specially marks her out, as the pivot and centre of the British Imperial Federation.

THE PROPOSED HUNDRED-MILLION LOAN FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 12.)
(COMMUNICATED.)

THERE was published in this journal last week the text of a memorial addressed by the Imperial Maritime League to the PRIME MINISTER and signed by 158 admirals and generals of the United British Services. That memorial recommends the immediate raising of a loan of a hundred millions sterling for expenditure on armaments. It is now two years since the Daily Telegraph announced that a sum of £60,000,000 was to be raised for a similar purpose, but nothing more was heard of it. Instead, however, a petition was signed by 144 Radical and Socialist members of Parliament for a reduction of the expenditure on munitions of war. The noble army of the Little-Navyites sustained considerable losses in the General Election of January last, and any lingering hopes their shattered remnants possessed must have been dashed to the ground when Mr. DILLON's motion to reduce the Shipbuilding Vote by £2,000,000 received no more than 70 supporters and was lost by a majority of 228. Much has happened in the past two years to strengthen the hands of those who hold to the maxim, Si vis pacem, para bellum. Most notable of these events was the discovery, in the spring of 1909, of acceleration in construction on the part of a certain naval Power—a policy which, if the English service papers are to be believed, is still being pursued in the same quarter, with a greater or less degree of secrecy. The immediate result of this discovery was the authorization of the supplementary "contingent" programme of four Dreadnoughts—one of which, the battleship-cruiser Lion, was launched at Devonport a few days ago. Nevertheless, as Mr. ASQUITH admitted in the House of Commons in the recent Naval Debate, the margin of safety is still too narrow to induce a feeling of absolute security on the part of the invasion-threatened population of the British Isles. All these circumstances certainly give weight to the Imperial Maritime League's appeal. One strong point in the petition which has been so extensively and authoritatively endorsed, is that the adoption of the proposed loan would lift the heavy burden of national defence out of the party arena. That in itself would be a great gain. Apart from this, however, the idea of the petitioners is, of course, that a loan of one hundred millions for defence purposes would, in the first place, ensure the strengthening of the Navy and Army beyond all question; and, in the second place, would relieve the Government of financial strain at a critical period in British political history. Moreover it is argued, and with some cogency, that the raising of such a loan would give pause to our naval competitors. "The sum, wisely expended, would be a final warning," we are told, "to potential antagonists that Great Britain declines to be outdone in the struggle for national and Imperial independence." The interest on the loan would, for a nation like Great Britain, be inconsiderable, and its repayment would be gradual, while both political parties would be equally responsible for its burden.

Supplementing their original memorial, submitted towards the end of June, the Imperial Maritime League have addressed a further appeal bearing nearly a hundred more signatures, some of distinguished civilians. We quote a few passages from this second appeal:—

Apart from these last [the civilian signatories], the appeal made to you has now the public endorsement of no less than 247 Flag and General Officers, who all thus concur in affirming their conviction that "National danger does threaten, and that the need of special effort to meet it is urgent."

It will, we think, be generally recognised that no such weight of expert authority has ever before been attached to any communication touching the National safety, and we venture to submit that the public declaration by such men of such conviction constitutes a new factor in the situation as regards National Defence, a factor which no thoughtful British citizen can ignore, and which in itself goes very far to justify the measure which they suggest.

As the aims in view are the restoration of National confidence by the assurance of National safety, and the removal of the provision of the means required for that end from the domain of party strife, we presume, with the deepest respect, to plead for the attention of His Majesty's Government.

The claim to attention advanced in the second of the above paragraphs, on the score of expert opinion, is, we think, amply justified. It is clear that doubt does in fact exist as to the safety of the Empire; were it not so, no naval or military leader of reputation would have put his signature to a document which must carry with it the sense of a grave situation. This weight of authority can hardly fail to appeal to a large class of Englishmen who, whatever their politics may be, are still sane enough to prefer security to speculation. We do not see how the Government can afford to ignore the question: it is a very different matter from a petition of woman-suffragists. Presumably these 247 naval and military experts are at least as good judges of the situation as the Government. If it be urged that the PRIME MINISTER also has expert advice at his command, in the officers of the Board of Admiralty and of the Horse Guards, it must be remembered that both these departments of State are liable to be subjected to pressure from the Treasury—and particularly a Liberal Treasury. We fancy that the man in the street (with all respect to officialdom) would set more store by the opinion of these 247 independent experts than by that of any Government Department. Then, again, these 247 officers have set it forth as their deliberate conviction that a national exists. No sane man in Britain or in any of her wide-spread possessions desires war; but if there is the smallest risk of a conflict being thrust upon them, do not the responsibilities of the statesmen in power become commensurately great? Already the Two-Power Standard has gone by the board. Recent estimates show that whereas Great Britain has decided to spend this year 40½ millions on her Fleet, the next two strongest Powers, Germany and the United States, are spending 49½ millions; while the Triple Alliance, whose naval development will ultimately compel a division of the British forces between the Mediterranean and the North Sea, has arranged for an expenditure of 31 millions, a total which bids fair to be largely increased in the near future. Not long ago we commented on the fact that so-called "scares" had as a rule some foundation in fact, and were not without effect on the war-expenditure of the day. A striking concurrence with our opinion comes, curiously enough, from a quarter which may unhesitatingly be acquitted of sensationalism—the Berlin correspondent of the leading Liberal organ, the Westminster Gazette. This authority sends the Fortnightly Review a very grave warning as to the risk of a war into which England cannot but be dragged; and adds, "The question is apposite whether the sensation-mongers, who in poetical justice ought to be wrong, are not right; whether the serious, sceptical foes of alarmism, who ought to be right, will not be proved to be grievously in the wrong."

THE EXPEDITION TO THE SOUTH POLE.

The preparations originally made for this Expedition were represented in the Japanese press as quite inadequate. It has now been decided to effect various changes. Instead of a vessel of about 200 tons, one of over 300 tons is to be selected. Ten names have been added to the roll, making 35 in all. The personal expenses are now reckoned at 1000 yen per man. Including food and outfit, it is calculated that the total cost of the Expedition will run to about 56,000 yen. Orders have been given for the construction of a house, 27 ft. long, 15 ft. broad and 10 ft. in height, in pieces capable of being easily put together on the ice or snow. Orders for sledges have been placed with the Hakodate Itō Iron Foundry, and the sledges are to be delivered by the 10th inst. They are ten in number, measuring seven Japanese feet in length, and one foot five inches in breadth, being intended to carry one man only. A learned geologist from the Imperial University is to accompany the Expedition and he will be furnished with the instruments and appliances needed for observations by the Tōkyō Observatory.

W.D.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

SOME PERSONAL REMINISCENCES.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

The personality of Theodore Roosevelt is one well worthy of study by men of all nations. Indeed, this idea of analyzing men who are of special value to civilization is worth while, because, as the world comes more closely together and mankind more and more tend to be one family, the aim ought to be to produce a higher type of man and to increase human efficiency to its extreme power. As the ideals of the race advance from those of war and destruction to the nobler ones of peace and conservation, we shall need more and more men full of energy in body, mind and spirit, or at least those who make this three-fold perfection their aim. Mankind must enter upon more "intensive farming," so to speak, of the human product. For, whether by strife and bloodshed, or by a method of rivalry in peace, only the strongest civilization and types of man are destined to survive.

My own reason for thinking of Roosevelt as a great man, apart from those which dazzle the populace and the world in general, are those which come from private knowledge amounting almost to familiarity. Yet this knowledge has never bred contempt, but, on the contrary, admiration; even though I confess to large areas of doubt as to whether Roosevelt has performed, or can perform, all that his ardent admirers believe he has done and will do. One who knows his private life and actual history can see that he is an ordinary mortal, who, as often as he accompanies his wife to the worship of Almighty God in the Episcopal Church, confesses doubtless with the profoundest sincerity, "We have left undone those things we ought to have done."

But to the positive. Roosevelt has, from boyhood, been a loyal and faithful member of the Reformed Church in America. This is the name of that body of Christians which came from the Netherlands in the seventeenth century, and gathered on Manhattan what was the first fully organized Protestant Church in America. That is, a church with a salaried pastor and a board of church governors, on the republican or representative plan according to the form generally called Presbyterian, in vital union with the national mother church, and with a congregation composed of actual church members who had brought their certificates or letters from the home land. This is the same church which sent out to Japan as missionaries such men as Guido I. Verbeck, Samuel Robbins Brown, and scores of highly educated ladies and gentlemen to bring to the Japanese the good news of God for their uplifting.

Unfortunately, in our popular knowledge of American history, it is supposed by the vulgar and uncritical that pretty much all our ideas and institutions come from England (which happens to be the home of the ancestors of the present writer). Unfortunately, also, American historiographers and their copyists in England seem to have been, for the most part, utterly ignorant of the fact that the four great Middle States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Delaware,—which have given more of the fundamental principles of the government of the United States and created probably more precedents of organization and action for a federal government than either or all of the other nine colonies, or possibly of all the states put together,—were settled by the Dutch. These Dutch people brought, from the Republic of the United Netherlands, their public schools, their freedom of religion, their hatred of primogeniture and their equal division of property among children, the education of girls as well as boys, and scores of other social and political features which are now vital in the countenance and constitution of the American people. Yet, despite all this, so great has been the influence of the English language upon Americans, that possibly millions of them still pronounce the President's name Ruse-velt, instead of with three syllables Roos-e-velt; the first syllable being pronounced like the national flower of England, and the name, of course, meaning field of roses. In fact most American descendants of Dutchmen whose names were once veldt or velt now write their names Field, or Felt. The great struggle for religious liberty, by which we Americans were saved from the incubus of a State Church, was fought in New York, mainly by the Dutchmen. This lasted from 1664 to 1777, when the State constitution, the first in the United States to do so, gave absolute religious liberty to men of every conceivable creed. In a word, the struggle of the people in the middle states issued very much as the struggle in South Africa has issued, in a virtual victory of the Dutch, yet with that enlargement and principles of progress so characteristic of the English race, and of which inheritance all who have in their veins English blood are so proud. Expert students believe that, in the United States of 1910, there are eight million descendants of Netherlanders.

To return to Roosevelt. Belonging to the same Church as he did, I knew him when he was a boy. He was then a thin, scraggy-looking young fellow, of whom one could not readily believe that he would grow to healthy, much less robust, manhood. Being much in New York city, and having charge of one of the chapels of the Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church, in 1869 and 70, I knew fairly well of his family and connections, who were all of the highest social grade at a time when wealth had not made such lines of demarcation as can be traced to-day. Looking back over these years when I was frequently in company with the people of the Collegiate Church, of which young Roosevelt was a member, what strikes me is the fact of his faithfulness to duties. For example, it was his habit to go back and forth frequently, during these years and later, between Manhattan and what was then the Far West, where in hamp and at the ranch he spent much time on horseback and hunting, living the free life of the West, gaining health and strength, and building up a constitution that has since shown itself equal to the tremendous demands upon it. Many anecdotes are told of his life in the West, showing that he had a terrific temper, quite equal to that of George Washington, but all pointing to the fact that Theodore Roosevelt, like the father of his country, was master of his own spirit. In that he certainly was greater than those who take cities.

One solid fact has always impressed me mightily. In Chicago, there were during the seventies only two Reformed Dutch Church edifices. One started with a fine building, to minister to the well-to-do, but it proved no success; and on my way back from Japan, I remember visiting what was once an elegant structure, in ruins. It was not picturesque with age, for age it had none, but virtually a new edifice, built of stone but with the roof caved in and its glass windows broken by mischievous boys. I never heard that Theodore Roosevelt visited this building, even in the day of its glory.

In another part of the town, the humblest portion of the city with plenty of "jungle" and slaughter house association, not far away, stood a chapel of the Reformed Church with a very large Sunday School and a prospective field of usefulness in inverse ratio to the adequacy of the financial means of the congregation. To this place, whenever young Roosevelt was in Chicago, whether east or west bound, he came and was always heartily assistant. Whether as Sunday School teacher, in addresses, to help the minister, to preach for him on occasions, hearten and cheer, he was always there. The world knew nothing of this, but it was his custom during years. To my mind, this faithfulness in little things is the key to Roosevelt's character and success. He is, first of all, and almost incredibly so, a master of details. Furthermore, I am inclined to believe that one reason why he was so moved by Mr. Upon Sinclair's story "The Jungle," which opened to view the horrors of the slaughter-house system and revealed the carelessness of greedy and avaricious men in the matter of food production and packing, that, largely by his own personal earnestness he prevailed upon Congress to pass immediately the Pure Food Law, was, that he was familiar with the situation.

Yet throughout Roosevelt's career, his aim has seemed to be to get at the bottom facts and to see clearly the eternal law of righteousness involved in every question at issue. He has also made it a point, while living among the artificiality, conventionality and comforts of civilization, to keep near to nature. He loves to know not only the primitive, savage man, but also real humanity, whether under forms of civilization or without them. Hence, it is almost impossible for men, however versed in the dialectics or strategy of highly organized society to deceive him with plausible arguments, pretexts, or appeals. He strikes at once for the real motive and the unvarnished fact.

Although making such profuse use of the English language with both voice and pen, and by means of typewriter and journalist, I question very much Mr. Roosevelt's longevity of literary fame. There is so little of that conciseness, and the proofs of leisure and calm which are water-marks of the classics, that I incline to the belief that his readers will be very few, a century from now. Yet I remember the first book he wrote. It was sent to me by a leading critical journal for review. It struck me very much as did the first book of Kipling, or of Marion Crawford, when reaching me through the same channel. I felt that a new force was perceptible. Here was a fresh way of treating old things.

Theodore Roosevelt was hardly out of Harvard University when in 1882 he wrote on the naval campaign of 1812. It was certainly a new thing in modern civilization when the American heavy frigate was built, when in single ship duels the Yankee sailors were able to win British flags, and, beside single prizes, an entire fleet, making a loss such as Great Britain had not known for a century. To explain this, James consoled his British readers and Cooper helped Americans to fatten like grubs in their special vice of brag and conceit. This young man Roosevelt, turning his back on such methods of writing history, brought out the fundamental facts on each side. With judicial coolness and honest weighing of the elements of the problem he showed that both sides, whether in humiliation or in exultation, could be justly proud of the naval campaign of 1812. To those who knew this book well, it was no surprise to find that when Roosevelt became assistant secretary of the Navy, he infused into that organization a new spirit, helping it powerfully towards its notable efficiency in the Spanish War and stimulating its development to the status of to-day.

Now, again at home in his native State, we have Roosevelt with us and no doubt he will give us fresh light upon the question as to what we are to do with our ex-Presidents? It is needless to say that, whatever shrewd politicians like Chauncey M. Depew, for example, may say, the popular belief, amounting almost to a standard of orthodoxy, is that if Roosevelt lives he will not only again be president for the third term but that he will also be an ex-President for the second time. Even in this untrodden path he will make a precedent.

ST. LOUIS AND ITS CONVENTIONS.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

St. Louis has had in recent months an unusually large number of national conventions. The electricians where here and gave the public the benefit of a large display of electrical appliances at the Coliseum. Within the walls of that great building, one could witness during the week of the display a picture in miniature of what he could easily imagine the future of civilization to be. The noise of wheels, the blowing of whistles, the ringing of bells, and other sounds, produced by the electric current, issued from the busy scene. The electric wire murmured the music of cheer and hope to the housewives present among those who flocked into the Coliseum, while performing before their eyes such common household drudgery as

"THE TIMES" SUPPLEMENT ON JAPAN.

The following announcement as to the special Japan number of The Times appeared in that journal's issue of the 18th ultimo:—

We shall publish to-morrow, as part of the ordinary edition of The Times, a large number of additional pages dealing on the one hand with the history, life, and art, and on the other with the commercial and industrial progress, of modern Japan.

The greater part of this edition is the work of a Special Correspondent, who has recently revisited Japan for this particular purpose, and of our Tokyo Correspondent, whom residence in the country for nearly forty years has entitled to speak with more than ordinary authority on Japanese affairs; but it will also contain special articles from a number of distinguished Japanese contributors, including Count Okuma, one of the few survivors of the band of statesmen who built up modern Japan, Count Hayashi, well known as a former Japanese Ambassador in London, and Baron Kikuchi, formerly Minister of Education and now President of the Imperial Kyoto University. Count Okuma's contribution takes the form of an introductory letter on the Japanese Empire. Count Hayashi discusses "Korea in the Past," and explains why, in his opinion, Japan should now take further steps to "strengthen her government" there, and Baron Kikuchi, whose comprehensive lectures before the University of London two years ago will be recalled by all students of education, deals with "Education in Japan." Among other articles by distinguished authorities is one from Lord Redesdale, who returns, in a study of "Old Japan," to the subject of his well-known book, while Mr. Arthur Lloyd deals with the changes of religious thought which have marked the emergence of the new Japan from the old.

The subject of Japanese modern Literature has been treated from two standpoints, Mr. Walter Denning writing on Literature, while Professor Y. Takenobu discusses the present Japanese novelists. There are few women in Japan better qualified to write on the subject of the social status of women in that country than Madame Utako Shimoda, who had much to do with the founding of the well-known Peeresses School in Tokyo, and who has devoted her life to female education. Her article, together with an account of Woman's Work from another well-informed writer, will give a good idea of the changes that are taking place in the education and status of women. Japan, according to recent writers, both foreign and native, has not yet ceased to be a paradise for children, and "Little Japan" has been discussed from two points of view. Madame Y. Ozaki, Mayoress of Tokyo, describes the life of Japanese children from birth through school to manhood and womanhood, and Miss E. R. Scidmore, the author of "Jinrikisha Days," gives a foreigner's view of what she calls "the bewitching little folk of Japan," as well as a picturesque article on Japanese Gardens. Mr. K. Sugimura, a well-known editor in Japan, contributes an article on some of the minor cities of his country and gives some remarkable cases of changes in relative importance and of rapid growth. An informing article on Shipbuilding, showing the progress in naval architecture, is contributed by F. P. Purvis, F. R. S., Professor of Naval Architecture in the Imperial University, Tokyo. The question of Foreign Investments is fully treated by Juichi H. Soyeda, the President of the Industrial Bank of Japan, while there is also an interesting statistical treatise on the Wealth of Japan by Hideomi Takahashi. Professor F. Omori, undoubtedly the best authority in Japan on the subject of earthquakes, and a pupil of Professor Milne, contributes an exceedingly valuable essay on Seismology in Japan; Mr. E. Bruce Mitford, F.R.G.S., writes on Volcanoes. Mr. Josiah Conder writes with special authority on Japanese architecture and landscape gardening.

Our Correspondent for Naval Affairs and our Military Correspondent have written on the Japanese Navy and Army. Industrial Japan, with its mercantile and foreign trade, is treated very fully by our Special Correspondent, who also writes on the development of Korea and Manchuria, dealing in the case of the latter with Russian as well as Japanese enterprise. The political development of Japan, on the other hand, is covered by our Tokyo Correspondent, who has written, amongst several contributions, an article on the Dynasty, a retrospect of the Elder Statesmen and a comprehensive study of both the purposes and personnel of Japanese politics during the Meiji Era.

A MAMMOTH ISSUE OF "THE TIMES."

Yesterday's issue of The Times was remarkable even in these days of remarkable newspaper enterprises. Together with what may be described as a Japanese supplement, the paper consisted of ninety-six pages, and among the contributors to the special pages are names of world-wide repute.

This special edition is particularly opportune, as Japan and things Japanese are more than ever claiming attention at the present moment. Her awakening, her development, her change from a feudal state to a modern Empire have all taken place within the memory of living men, and the story is here told by men, both of Eastern and Western birth, who have personal knowledge of the facts.

There are dozens of pages bristling with statistical figures and dozens of illustrations to lighten the encyclopædic thoroughness of the text. Banking, Currency, Agriculture, Commerce, Railways, Imperial Forces, Public Administration—such are a few of the headings which meet the eye.

Count Okuma, Count Hayashi and Count Kikuchi write from the Asiatic point of view; Lord Redesdale, who knew Japan in what may almost be called the bow-and-arrow period, represents, among many other writers, Western ideas.

But what demand the closest attention are the articles dealing with Japan's Navy and Army. The Army has doubled since 1904, and how the Japanese Navy is being built up most of us know.

The Japan-British Exhibition at Shepherd's Bush naturally does not pass unnoticed, but suitably rounds off the supplement, which is a publication well worth preserving as an enlightening work of reference.

THE MEDITERRANEAN COMMAND.

DUTIES OF MUCH-DEBATED POST DEFINED.

A Parliamentary Paper was issued on June 23rd containing (1) the Memorandum defining the duties of the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief in the Mediterranean, dated August 6th, 1907, together with (1) the same revised, dated September 15th 1908; as well as (5) "The Duties and Responsibilities of the Inspector-General of the Forces," dated December 18th, 1907, and (4) the "Memorandum Defining the Duties of the Appointment of General Officer Commanding-in-Chief in the Mediterranean, Combined with that of Inspector-General of the Oversea Forces," dated June 20th, 1910.

Of the two last-mentioned documents, the earlier (No. 3) is published substantially complete in "The King's Regulations" of 1908. The later one (No. 4) is new, and its text in full is as follows:—

1. For the colonial administration of Gibraltar and Malta, the respective Governors will be solely responsible, and will communicate direct with the Colonial-office as heretofore.

2. As regards Egypt and the Soudan, all civil and political matters will, as heretofore, be dealt with by his Majesty's Agent and Consul-General in direct communication with the Foreign-office; and as regards the administration of the Soudan and of the Egyptian and Soudanese forces, the Governor-General and Sirdar will be directly responsible to his Majesty's Agent and Consul-General.

3. As regards the British troops in Gibraltar, Malta, Egypt, the Soudan, Cyprus, and Crete, all matters of local military administration will be dealt with by the Governors of Gibraltar and Malta, and the General Officer Commanding in Egypt in direct communication with the War-office, except that such questions of discipline as the General Office Commanding-in-Chief may determine will be submitted to him for consideration and orders, or, if necessary, for reference to the War-Office.

4. Questions connected with strategy, defence, training, and tactics will be dealt with by the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief, in communication on the one hand with subordinate military authority, and on the other with the War-Office.

5. In Egypt and the Soudan question of strategy and defence can seldom be dissociated from questions of policy, and consequently in dealing with such questions, it will be mutually advantageous for the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief and his Majesty's Agent and Consul-General in Egypt to consult each other before the former lays his views on strategy and defence before the War-office, and the latter his views on those matters of policy which have a military bearing before the Foreign-Office.

6. In Malta, and elsewhere within the area of the Mediterranean Command, the King will be represented on all occasions by the Governors of Gibraltar and Malta, the Agent and Consul-General in Egypt, the Governor-General of the Soudan, the High Commissioner of Cyprus, and the Consul-General in Crete, respectively; except that on the occasion of military reviews, parades, and inspections, the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief in the Mediterranean will, when present, have precedence over those of the foregoing high officials who, being general officers on the active list, are under his orders in their military capacity, and will take the salute as officer in chief command.

7. In addition to the duties within the area of the Mediterranean Command specified in paragraphs 3 to 6 inclusive, the inspectional functions of the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief in the Mediterranean and Inspector-General of the Oversea Forces will cover those portions of the empire, outside the United Kingdom, where troops under the control of the Home Government are stationed. He must form a judgment on the efficiency of officers and men, on the handling of troops, on the standard and system of training, on the suitability of equipment, and generally on all that affects the readiness of the forces for war.

8. The Inspector-General will submit an annual report to the Army Council by the 1st November in each year.

9. For the proper discharge of his functions it is necessary that the Inspector-General should—

- (a) By means of inspection ascertain whether the training, instruction, and preparation of the Oversea Forces for war, as laid down by Regulations, are fully carried out in the various commands, and whether a uniform standard of efficiency is attained.
- (b) Advise as to changes of regulations bearing on (a).
- (c) Keep the Army Council informed of the state of the Oversea Forces as regard both personnel and equipment.

10. The functions of the Inspector-General of the Oversea Forces should be exercised with due regard to a general system of inspection applicable to the whole army, this system as carried out consecutively by regimental commanders, commanders of brigades, general officers commanding, and the Inspector-General himself being of progressive nature. In every case the object of an inspection is to ascertain the results achieved by the officer responsible for the efficiency of the unit or body of troops concerned. It is the duty of an inspecting officer to bring omissions and defects to notice, but this should be done without fettering the initiative or trenching on the responsibility of the commanding officer in regard to the training of his men.

11. By the 1st November in each year the Inspector-General of the Oversea Forces will submit, for the approval of the Army Council, a programme of his inspections during the following year beginning on the 1st April. Long or formal notice of the dates of the proposed inspections need not necessarily be given to the local military authorities.

12. The direction of Army manoeuvres or Staff rides of an important character, for which funds are specially provided by the War-Office, will, if the Chief of the Imperial General Staff is not present, devolve upon the Inspector-General, unless the manoeuvre or Staff ride is being conducted outside the limits of the Mediterranean Command, by a General Officer Commanding-in-Chief senior to the Inspector-General in military rank.

13. In addition to the duties enumerated above, the inspection of coast defences and of the focal forces in the Crown Colonies will be included in the function of the Inspector-General.

14. In the event of the Government of a self-governing Dominion or Colony desiring that its force should be inspected, the Army Council will make the necessary arrangements for their inspection by the Inspector-General of the Oversea forces.

15. Official communications in writing between the Army Council and the Inspector-General will be signed by or addressed to the Secretary of the War-office, and will not emanate from or be addressed to individual members of that Council, with whom, however, and especially with the Chief of the Imperial General Staff the Inspector-General should keep in close touch.

16. The Inspector-General of the Oversea Forces will be a member of the Selection Board, and should the Prime Minister so decided, of the Committee of Imperial Defence, attending the meetings of the Board and Committee when present in England,

THE WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

With reference to the recent missionary Conference at Edinburgh, "An English Churchman" writes to the London Review as follows. The breadth of view which characterizes this letter seems to us to merit special attention:—

SIR,—The very remarkable series of meetings in the Northern capital has had some justice done to it in the Press, but I felt that the only way to realise the importance of the World Missionary Conference was to go and see it. Edinburgh is alive with men and women missionaries and with secretaries of many societies. The most impressive part of the proceedings took place in the great Assembly Hall of the United Free Church at the top of the Mound. It seats about two thousand, and was full for ten consecutive days. There were ladies in plenty far back in the receding galleries, but the main impression was that of a room full of men. Lord Balfour of Burleigh and Lord Reay represented statesmanship. They both spoke well. The Archbishop of York, who made a poor impression on Sunday through over-tiredness, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Southwark, the Bishop of Birmingham, and many others represented the fourth side of the Lambeth Quadrilateral. In one morning I heard a Swiss, a Norwegian, a German, a Frenchman, a Chinese, and a Welshman address the meeting in English, and in such good English that most of them were able to be humorous in a language to which they were not born. They varied greatly in mental agility, and one received the impression, which came home to those who listened much to Mr. Roosevelt, that the American genius is an immense capacity for saying ordinary things in an impressive way; but take the Conference as a whole, and its effect is to make it clear that the evangelisation of the world is entering upon a phase of reasoned conviction and of carefully considered policy which must secure for it the attentive respect of those who have hitherto smiled, and possibly have even jeered.

Let me refer to one side of the question that affects the ordinary citizen. Often all he knows about missionaries is that they produce political complications. An evangelist gets murdered, or, short of that, he makes himself a constant nuisance to the administration by a course of petty complaints about colonial or national government. But the cheers of this Conference have gone to the men who told it that it is the duty of the missionary to restrict his complaints to big grievances that really matter, to be sure that no question of personal pique enters into the charge he brings against a local official, and generally to set a perfect example of obedience to and confidence in administrative authority. It was not always so, and the change in temper is going right through the life of the missionaries. This Conference, then, seems to me to have done more to secure respect for a fine cause than anything that has happened in its history.

BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

A movement has been initiated in England, and has received the notice of the House of Commons for the replacing of Buckingham Palace by a more magnificent structure. The President of the Board of Trade, however, recently stated in Parliament that he could not even see his way to authorizing an expenditure of £100,000 for the re-facing of the east front of the Palace with stone-work. Discussing this subject, the Spectator points out that the Sovereigns of England have ever preferred to make their homes in the country rather than in the town—Queen Victoria at Osborne or Balmoral, King Edward at Windsor Castle or Sandringham; and speaks in glowing terms of the stately mansions which are the glory of the countryside. Incidentally the review draws attention to the source of the funds with which the official residence of the King of England was originally built:—

One curious point is worth noting in regard to Buckingham Palace. We believe that it cost the nation nothing. When war broke out after the Peace of Amiens, Napoleon seized all the travelling Englishmen he could find and held them as prisoners of war. Some were ransomed and some exchanged, but many remained as détenues for some ten years. When the Empire fell we claimed a recompense for the men who had been so barbarously treated, and a lump sum was handed over by the French Government. When our Government had apportioned it to the various claimants a large amount remained, and that remainder was, we believe, used to build Buckingham Palace.

ECHOES OF THE EDINBURGH CONFERENCE.

[CONTRIBUTED.]

The World Missionary Conference, held in Edinburgh June 14-23, was one of the most important and significant gatherings of recent times. It was attended by about 1,200 regular delegates from all parts of the world, besides several thousand visitors, also from all parts of the world. To attempt to give a comprehensive but concise account of the Conference with all its parallel meetings, rallies, reunions, etc., is entirely beyond the limits of this communication: a few notes must suffice.

There was a good representation from Japan, including several who were formerly in Japan, but are now at work in the home lands. The regular delegates of this description numbered twenty-three (23), as follows, in alphabetical order:—Rev. J. Chappel, Rev. Y. Chiba, E. W. Clement, Rev. J. D. Davis, D.D., Rev. J. L. Dearing, D.D., Rev. C. H. Evans, Mr. G. M. Fisher, Ex Bishop Fyson, Mrs Gordon, Rev. S. L. Gulick, D.D., Rev. T. Harada, LL.D., Bishop M. C. Harris, Bishop Y. Honda, Miss Dora Howard, Rev. Y. Ibuka, D.D., Rev. W. E. Lompe, Rev. H. K. Miller, Rev. D. H. Murray, D.D., Rev. J. C. C. Newton, D.D., Rev. G. C. Niven, Miss Peacocke, Rev. Albertus Pieters and Rev. F. N. Scott. Of these Drs. Davis and Dearing, Mr. Evans, Mr. Fisher, Mr. Miller (?), and Mr. Scott were accompanied by their wives. Besides these, the following persons were in attendance as visitors: Miss Ballard, Rev. and Mrs. F. C. Briggs, Rev. B. F. Buxton, Rev. H. H. Coates, D.D., Misses Dickerson, Hargrave, Lewis (Amy G.), Macdonald, Morgan, and Mr. Ono. All these names, it will be seen, make a pretty good representative list. It would have been much better, if there had been more "native" representatives. However the few Japanese who were present acquitted themselves with great credit, and received a most cordial welcome whenever they appeared on the platform. Dr. Ibuka was one of the important Business Committee upon whom devolved great responsibilities, and also appeared on the program. Bishop Honda delivered speeches in Japanese well interpreted by Mr. G. M. Fisher. Dr. Harada also appeared several times on the programme.

Japan was especially honoured in having a representative among those upon whom honorary degrees were conferred on June 14 by the University of Edinburgh. The President of the Doshisha was the Japanese selected for this honour. The Vice-Chancellor of the University presented Mr. Harada in the following well-chosen words:

In the eyes of the University one of the most interesting and important of the activities discharged by that many-sided enterprise, the Foreign Mission movement, is the work it has accomplished, and continues to accomplish, as a founder and fosterer of institutions for the promotion of higher culture. Amongst the academic seedlings which have blossomed forth in the Mission's wake, none exhibits signs of greater vitality, or promises more abundant fruitfulness in the future than Doshisha, the leading Christian University in Japan; and the position and prospects of this famous institution are largely due to the zealous care and lofty ideals of the distinguished divine who now guides its destinies. The appointment of the Rev. Tasuku Harada to the Presidency of Doshisha some three years ago was hailed at the time as an event of much significance and good omen. He brought to his office a rich and varied experience. Himself a graduate of Doshisha, he had extended the education received there by a course of study in the Theological Department of the University of Yale. For many years he had been actively engaged in pastoral work, and his fitness for leadership has been amply proved by his deportment in the President's chair, first of the Japanese Christian Endeavour Union, and later of the Japanese National Council of Kumiai Churches. Above all, he had achieved conspicuous success as a lecturer when touring in China and India, and his writings had come to be recognised as a weighty contribution to Christian theology. It does not admit of doubt that teachers of the stamp of the President of Doshisha, and work such as he is accomplishing, are doing much to break down the barriers between East and West, and to bring each to a knowledge and understanding of the other. The University desires to set the seal of its approval upon Mr. Harada's beneficent labours, in token whereof I ask you to admit him to our Doctorate in Laws. (Applause.)

At the close of the ceremony of conferring honorary degrees, the Vice-Chancellor announced that, on this special occasion, they would depart from their usual custom, and ask four or five of the honorary graduates to say a few words. One of these speakers was Dr. Harada, who was reported as follows in the Scotsman:

Dr. Harada, who was received with applause, said they gave him a great surprise when he was informed that the University proposed to confer this great honour on their humble servant. He did not regard himself as worthy of it, but he had reason to believe that it was not so much for the individual as for the representative of the great cause with which he was associated, and perhaps of the country which he represented. (Applause.) Ever since his boyhood Scotland was a land for which he had had great admiration. It was the land of John Knox, of Sir Walter Scott, of Carlyle, and of Burns, of Duff and of Livingstone, of Sir William Hamilton, Sir James Simpson, and Lord Kelvin—names which were household names in many homes in his country just as they were in other parts of the world. (Applause.) He believed there was no country of the same area which had produced such a large number of men of faith and culture, of intellect, and of character as Scotland; and, after all, the greatness of a country did consist in having such great men. He could not help admiring their country, and therefore it was with peculiar pleasure and gratitude that he felt himself now related to their illustrious land, through this historic institution which had done so much in producing the type of eminent men he had just mentioned. He hoped that this might be a sign of union and of a better understanding between the East and the West. (Loud applause.)

* * * * *

Among the eight persons who received the degree of D.D. were Rev. K. C. Chatterji, of India, Rev. P. M. Hawks-Pott, of Shanghai, and Robert E. Speer, of New York City. Among the six persons who received the degree of LL.D. were the Archbishop of Canterbury, Hon. Seth Long of New York City, and John R. Mott, Esq., of Everywhere.

What is perhaps the most important action of the Conference was the appointment of a Continuation Committee, consisting of ten members from Great Britain, ten members from the U.S.A. and Canada, ten members from the Continent of Europe, and one each from South Africa, Australia, Japan, China and India. The representative of Japan is Bishop Honda, of China is Mr. Cheng Ching-yi, of India is Dr. Chatterji; all native Christians. The duty of this Committee is to carry out the aims and purposes of the Conference and to make the initial preparations for the next Conference. This Committee may later give place to a standing International Missionary Committee.

* * * * *

One specially interesting occasion for the friends of Japan was the reception given by Prof. and Mrs. C. G. Knott, formerly of Tokyo, one afternoon. It was most delightful to meet in their comfortable home and talk over Japan—past, present and future. Among the guests were Mrs. R. Y. Davidson and son, Mr. Robin Davidson, formerly of Tokyo, now of Edinburgh. All those present thoroughly appreciated the kindness and courtesy of Dr. and Mrs. Knott in affording this opportunity for a rally and reunion.

* * * * *

The following may be given as the most profound impressions of the Conference:—

1. "Its comprehensive and representative composition."—It was truly inter-denominational, international and interracial, practically universal.

It was most encouraging to note the active participation therein of religious bodies which hitherto it has been infrequent to see represented in such gatherings.

2. "The thorough preparations made for the Conference, in respect both to its business matters and to the reports of the Commissions."—Most admirable was the painstaking care with which the minutiae of the organization of such an immense gathering were carried through. And little short of marvellous were the extraordinary carefulness and thoroughness with which the various Commissions prepared their reports.

3. "The masterly manner in which the sessions were managed without apparent hitch or unpleasant incidents."—The "crank" was conspicuous by his absence; or, at least, his voice was not heard! And the reports of the Commissions were so complete and exhaustive that little remained to be added or subtracted.

4. "The predominance of the notes of comity, co-operation and unity."—Every day almost every speaker referred to the urgent and overwhelming needs on those lines.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From our St. Petersburg Correspondent)

St. Petersburg, July 21.

The Russian State Bank yesterday celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation. The Minister of Finance, M. Kokovtsev, in his speech to the assembled officials and guests of the bank, briefly referred to the severe trials through which it had successfully passed in the half century just expired. He found a strong resemblance between the period of its foundation in 1860 and the present day. In 1860 Russia was still disorganised by the consequences of the Crimean War and on the eve of the great reforms of Alexander the Second, the Emancipation of the Serfs in the year following and the reconstruction of the State. To-day we were passing through a similar period of reconstruction after a similar period of disorganisation following on war and internal strife. The State Bank had attempted shortly after its foundation to grapple with the problem of a gold currency for Russia, but circumstances were adverse, and when they gradually recovered there came the sudden gust of the Turkish War, which again disorganised Russia's finances. It was not until 1893 that the scheme took shape and only in 1897 that Russia actually took the step of putting her finances on a gold basis. Ten years later, to be accurate, in January 1906, in consequence of the internal troubles, it became a case of "to be or not to be" for the gold basis, and Russia was within an ace of discarding the only solid foundation on which the prosperity of states can be built. Fortunately they had been enabled to overlive that crisis, and the gold basis was secure.

Turning to the second important department of the activity of the State Bank, that of supporting the industries of the country, M. Kokovtsev, acknowledge that there was some truth in the complaints brought by critics against the Bank that it had propped up various industries without warrant for such action in the regulations by which the Bank is controlled, reminded his hearers, experts in the matters touched upon, how this prompt action had saved many industries from total destruction. There are many great industries to-day that are flourishing which, but for this alleged illegal action of the State Bank at a critical moment, would not be in existence at all.

"Fifty years ago," said M. Kokovtsev, "the Bank newly founded had at its disposal to guarantee the paper issue only eight million roubles of gold: to-day its gold reserve is 1,415,000,000 roubles, in spite of the telling fact that nowhere in the world is the emission law so strict, nowhere in the world are the demands regulating the issue of money-tokens without gold security so inexorable as those initiated by us in the law of 1897. Yet, notwithstanding all, the Russian State Bank to-day possesses a right of issue still unused of 610 million roubles." If the past fifty years had been times of trial and struggle, the Bank had now proved its strength, and the future lay before it, bright as the noonday sun then streaming through the windows, and wide as the world of commerce and the wide bounds of the Russian Empire.

In conclusion M. Kokovtsev read a telegram from the Emperor congratulating the Bank upon its "jubilee," which was listened to by all, standing. Then followed the list of rewards and honours in commemoration of the occasion.

A very handsome volume dealing with the past fifty years of the Bank's existence, and richly illustrated, has been prepared and is to be presented to friends abroad and officials at home.

The Chinese Military Mission has been to Reval to be received by the Emperor previous to his leaving for Riga where the 200th anniversary of the annexation of Liefland to the Russian Empire is to be celebrated to-morrow. Next week the Chinese Mission will be present at a grand review at Krasnoe Sele.

The Novoe Vremja repeats and reinforces articles that appeared in the French press on the great advances made by Japan in the colonisation and "peaceful penetration" of the possessions of other countries in the Far East. Especially is this the case with the possessions of Holland. With Siam also the relations of Japan have been increasing of late by leaps and bounds. All this, says the leading Russian newspaper, is due to the keen sense of patriotism, the "true nationalism" of the Japanese, and it wishes that some Russians could learn this cardinal secret of national success.

Great activity is being shown in the railway-building spheres in Russia, and particularly in the direction of private railroad construction. Attention is once more drawn to the scheme for utilising the waterfalls of Finland for providing electric energy for the use of St. Petersburg as well as for running a railway between the city and Finland. The scheme has been put back in view of the changes in the relations of Finland to the Empire, and it is now intended to bring the projected line well within the city boundaries, and build it of the same gauge as the Russian railways. The Ministry of Commerce has secured a grant of two thousand pounds sterling for the prosecution of geological and other scientific researches in the districts through which the projected line will run which is to connect the Turkestan railways to the Great Siberian Railway.

Several towns of Russia have been visited by extraordinary storms of rain, and in some cases, of hail. In Kishinev the streets were turned into rivers with three feet of swirling waters rushing down them. In Poltava and in Tiflis, points very far apart, the same rain and hail storms have swept the country. Throughout Russia the temperature is much below the average for this time of year and the climatic conditions most uncertain.

Dr. Morrison, the famous expert on China, has passed through here on his way to London, where he will give an account of the marvellous journey taken by him in the past eighteen months during which time he has traversed the whole Empire of China, Central Asia, both Chinese and Russian Turkestan, and so on to Moscow and St. Petersburg. He was received at the Russian Foreign Office to-day.

The condition of affairs in Persia, according to latest advices received here, is rapidly growing critical. Thousands are preparing to take sanctuary in the Russian and British Embassies, and the nominal Government of the country, being unable to agree with the two men who hold the real power in Persia, is on the point of dissolution. Almost anything may be expected to occur at almost any moment. The bazaars at Teheran have been closed for some days past.

"Four years of Cholera in Russia" is a telling because only too true, headline, that is appearing in the Russian papers nowadays. In St. Petersburg the municipality has taken the usual annual step of placarding the streets and tramcars etc. with warnings "Don't drink raw (i.e. unboiled) water"; the placards are in black type, which indicates an early stage of the epidemic. Later on, according to former precedent, they will be in red type—after which nothing more remains to be done, think the municipal authorities of this waterless and drainless European capital, but to trust in luck and fill the hospitals with "cholera patients" who die, and "cholera suspects" who also die, both categories in about the same proportion!

The comments of the German Press on the Russo-Japanese Convention are received here with amusement verging on ridicule. It is regarded in well-informed circles as indicating the depth of the disappointment felt in Germany at the conclusion of this far-reaching act of amity: the criticism is considered naive in the extreme. The press takes a more serious view. The Novoe Vremja is indignant with Germany for attempting now to play, with England, the old game that has so signally failed with Russia, namely, to embroil her with Japan. The German statement that Japan must find an outlet for emigration and that Australia, a vast and fertile country without any population to speak of, is precisely the natural and satisfactory outlet sought by Japan, is treated as a purely gratuitous and unfriendly supposition. In any case no doubt is felt that England will know how to look after her own. As to Russia desiring to play a forward policy in Europe now she has secured her rear in the Far East, it is contrary to common sense and truth. Russia wants a long spell of peace to thoroughly establish the vast reorganisation of her forces, social and economic, that has already begun. All that Russia has to say to the nations is "leave us alone, we have all we want to do at home."

THE NEED OF ARBITRATION IN THE JAPANESE BUSINESS WORLD.

The Tōkyō Nichi Nichi Shimbun has an article on this subject. It says that much of the stagnancy in the Japanese business world to-day is to be traced to distrust of companies and firms. People are naturally scandalized by the disclosures which have been made connected with three companies, the Sugar Company, the Tōyō Kisen Kaisha, and the Nihon Shōyū Kaisha. The Law bearing on Companies needs altering, at once, but when this will be done nobody seems to know. In the meantime many business men are in favour of arbitration and they look to Chambers of Commerce to organise an effectual system of mediation between the various disputants when businesses get into a mess. These bodies are very powerful and they ought to have no difficulty in devising means for putting a stop to all kinds of irregularities in the business transactions of certain companies, though there are persons who doubt their ability as now constituted to deal with the numerous complications which arise when funds have been misappropriated. Anyhow the matter is now receiving public attention.

ASSOCIATION BETWEEN JAPANESE AND RUSSIANS.

An interesting article by a Japanese writer expresses the feeling that nationally the two countries are now on very friendly terms, but adds that the war has left a scar which cannot be quickly eliminated. The writer states very truly: "The mere exchange of diplomatic paper by properly accredited authorities will not heal this scar. That is better than nothing. But it is better to go deeper and find a real source of association, that is, commercial relations. Commercial statistics regarding Japan and Russia are far from satisfactory, and this is the real association which should be cultivated." The writer goes on to say that he considers the lack of ability to speak the languages to be the main difficulty and suggests that special schools be organized for the study of Russian.

This article is the expression of a very excellent spirit, and is, at the same time, very characteristic of the Japanese—"We fought a few years ago, but now we are ready to make friends, learn your language and help and be helped."

FOURTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE KINDERGARTEN UNION OF JAPAN.

Karuizawa, August 3-4, 1910.

At nine o'clock on the morning of August 3rd the doors of the Karuizawa Auditorium opened to admit the members and friends of the Kindergarten of Japan for their fourth annual session.

The Arrangement Committee had early been at work and many exclamations of surprise and pleasure were heard as the Kindergarteners entered the tastefully decorated room.

For several days, from all parts of the country, exhibits had been arriving from different Kindergartens and Training Schools and the auditorium walls were well covered with these evidences of the year's work.

Besides the usual display of Kindergarten handicraft part of the wall space was devoted to pictures especially suitable for little children, and several long tables were filled with books of many kinds, helpful alike to teachers of both Kindergarten and Sunday School.

One exhibit which attracted much attention was "A Letter from Fröbel's Widow, with a Leaf from Fröbel's Grave."

The devotional exercises, on the two successive mornings, were in charge of Miss Santee of Sapporo and Miss Seeds of Yokohama and were hours of communion with Christ—the Children's Friend.

The President's address was given by Mrs. R. A. Thomson of Kobe, who in a few well chosen words welcomed all present at the Convention. She especially spoke of the many causes for encouragement we have in the growth of our work and her earnest words set a key note of joy to all that was to follow.

There are at present fifty-five Kindergartens represented in the Union and of this number twenty-eight responded to the roll-call, and the reports given were full of interest. Many touching incidents were recorded showing the influence the Kindergarten is exerting for good not only upon the children, but upon their parents, friends and even whole communities. Fifteen new Kindergartens were reported at this meeting and several Chinese and Formosan Kindergartners gave reports of their work. Many present expressed a desire for more trained teachers to supply the urgent demand.

Kindergarten-Training Schools were represented by those in charge, either in person or by letter, and Miss Howe, for twenty years principal of the Glory Kindergarten, Kobe, made a strong plea for the best and highest standards in our Kindergarten training and work.

There were two papers read before the convention on which much time and thought had been expended in preparation.

The first subject was "Plans and cost of Building" by Miss Hart of Ueda. Miss Hart showed a book in which had been drawn plans of fifteen Kindergarten buildings, in various parts of Japan, making a valuable collection for future reference.

Miss Howe's paper on "Some Kindergarten Events of the Year" was most interesting. She spoke of the recent Osaka Kindergarten celebration, the summer school for Kindergarten study now being held in Tokyo, and gave many instructive statistics relating to Kindergarten-work in Japan.

The musical selections during the convention were varied and beautiful; Mr. Cobb's organ solos, the Misses Landis' piano and violin duet, and Mrs. Wilbur's sweet child-songs contributing greatly to the enjoyment of all.

The election of officers for the ensuing year resulted as follows:—

President	Miss Howe
Vice-President ..	Miss Santee
Recording Secretary and Treasurer	Mrs. Hennige
Corresponding Secretary	Miss Drake
Executive Committee.—The above mentioned officers and Mrs. Thomson.
	Miss Walleth.
	Miss Lennox.

In spite of cloudy skies and frequent down-pours, the attendance at all of the sessions was very good, but the tide of interest rose highest, perhaps, on the closing afternoon, when the Auditorium was filled with kindergarteners, children and friends, who came to witness, or to join in, the games and to enjoy the social hour.

Miss Santee had charge of the songs and games, and Japanese and foreign teachers combined to make the time one of pleasure and profit to all interested in games for little children.

The social hour was presided over by Mrs. Pedley, and during this time the Kindergarteners and their friends became better acquainted and several new members were added to the Kindergarten Union of Japan.

The outlook for the future is most promising. New life has been brought into the Union by the arrival of several new Kindergarteners who have entered with enthusiasm into the work, and there seems to be a growing interest on the part of all. A discussion of the topic "New work in Korea, Formosa, China and Manchuria" brought out the facts that the leading educators in those countries are looking to the Christian Kindergartens of this land for help in securing teachers for their work. At the same time the educational standard in Japan is being raised and our Kindergartens are being taken as models, while our graduates are being offered positions of opportunity and responsibility everywhere.

One of the most interested listeners at the Kindergarten Convention was Mr. Kawai, a Formosan pastor, who came all the way to Karuizawa to gain new ideas for his work among the children of that land.

Those of us who were privileged to attend this Kindergarten Conference among the mountains, came away feeling more deeply than ever our responsibility as teachers of little children, and more than ever ready to appreciate the words of our great American statesman—Daniel Webster:—"If we work upon marble, it will perish; if we work upon brass, time will efface it; if we rear temples, they will crumble into dust. But if we work upon immortal souls, if we imbue them with principles, with the just fear of God and love of fellowman, we engrave on those tablets something which will brighten all eternity."

ANNA BLANCHE SLATE,
Secretary pro tem.

THE KATSURA CABINET AND THE SEIYUKAI.

A prominent member of the Seiyukai predicts that the coming Session of the Diet is likely to be a stormy one. The principal questions of importance that will come up for discussion are the present financial policy of the Government, Naval increment, the government of Korea after annexation, Formosan affairs, and certain big items in the Budget. According to the authority I am quoting, Marquis Saionji is by no means satisfied with the present administration of affairs, and it is whispered that when he handed over the Government to Marquis Katsura there was an understanding to the effect that Marquis Saionji should again take the reins of government at a subsequent date. The time for the carrying out of the agreement is now said to be near. That Marquis Katsura should be able to manage the Seiyukai without the support of Marquis Saionji is inconceivable. Up to this time a conflict between the Cabinet and the Seiyukai has been warded off by the adoption of various tactics on the side of the Government. A general election is a costly affair and, hence, hitherto care has been taken not to create a situation that might necessitate an appeal to the country. But the year after next there will be a general election anyhow, and so the members of the Seiyukai feel that the present is a very suitable time to assert themselves and furnish proof to constituents that they are something more than vessels which the potter moulds as he pleases. Next year the elections for members of Prefectural Assemblies will take place. This event causes considerable excitement throughout the country and is utilized by men who are bidding for popularity. This would no doubt turn out to be a suitable occasion for the carrying on of a general election. The situation seems to be this. Either Marquis Katsura will resign or he will adhere to his present policy, thereby causing a rupture between himself and the Seiyukai, which will mean a dissolution of the Diet.

NOTICE OF TERMINATION OF TREATIES.

The Imperial Government sent under date of the 4th instant notices of the termination of the Treaties and Conventions mentioned hereunder to the respective Contracting Powers concerned:—

Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with France;

Supplementary Convention with France and the Tariff annexed thereto;

Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Austro-Hungary.

The term of validity of the Supplementary Convention with France and the Tariff annexed thereto is the same as that of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with France. That Treaty came into force on the 4th August, 1899 together with the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Austro-Hungary; and as it is stipulated that either Contracting Party shall have the right, at any time after the lapse of eleven years from the date they took effect, to give notice of its intention to terminate the same, and that at the expiration of twelve months after such notice is given, they shall wholly cease and determine, the Treaties above mentioned will, in consequence of these notices simultaneously lose effect after the 3rd August next year and cease to exist from the 4th.

The Imperial Government entered into a Conventional Tariff agreement with regard to some articles with Austro-Hungary under the Supplementary Convention with that Power at the time when the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation was agreed upon, but the Supplementary Convention became null and void on the 31st December, 1903, according to its express provision.

A NEW RAILROAD LINE ALMOST COMPLETED.

Japanese railroads are noted the world over for the engineering difficulties which have been overcome. But the present Central Western line between Suhara and Narai, although only 23 miles long is one of the most difficult and costly in the country.

The Central Eastern line shows 42 tunnels within the distance of 42 miles, and was built at a cost of 1,000 yen per mile. But this new line is even more costly, having cost an average sum of 200,000 yen per mile. The Torii tunnel is over a mile long, and in addition to this, four of the other tunnels have been built under difficulties which made necessary a cost of over 100.00 yen per foot. It is expected that the work will be completed by December but because of the peculiar conditions under which it has been done, and the dangers, which the winter season may enhance, it is expected that the line will not be opened for traffic until Spring.

This line will be a great convenience to a certain section of the country, as products from Echigo and Shinano can be conveyed to Kyoto and Osaka, and from Nagano through Shiojiri to Nagoya. Hitherto, such merchandise has been handled by way of Tokyo.

NOTICE TO MARINERS.

CHINA SEA SWATOW DISTRICT UNCHARTED ROCK
OFF GOAT ISLAND, HONGHAI BAY.

Notice is hereby given that an uncharted rock, covered 10 feet at low water of spring tides, is situated with the south-eastern extremity of Goat Island bearing N. 5½° E. (magnetic), distant 2.3 cables, washing and ironing, cooking, and sweeping the floors. The application of electricity to commercial and industrial purposes was exhibited in numberless forms, convincing the spectator that the electric wire was indeed destined to become "the spinal cord of the world's civilization." The matter of expense, the sole obstacle in the way of a general use of electric power, is being gradually overcome.

At the same place, the Farmers' Educational and Co-operative Union of America held its convention and was attended by about ten thousand delegates. The depressed condition existing among the agricultural classes a few years ago, which gave rise to the farmers' movement, has passed away. The American farmer then was losing ground, but fortune in recent years has smiled upon him. The low prices paid for his products in the markets have given place to prices that seem to belong to times of war rather than to peace. Never have men in agricultural pursuits been favored with greater prosperity than the farmers in America enjoy at the present time. When a combination of men is taking place with reference to every human interest, it is a matter of importance to know that the men behind the ploughs have shown a capacity for organization, the class which it had been thought would never be able to combine to protect their own interests. The underlying principle and purpose of the farmers' convention, according to the promoters, is to do away with the gambling and speculation on farm products by commission brokers and to reduce the cost of living by eliminating the gambling percentage paid by the consumer. They do not oppose legitimate commission men, but make the gambling feature the object of their attack. Other movements supported by the Farmers' Union seek to secure larger appropriation from the United States government for the education of farmers by visits of demonstrators at the farmer's home; to interest boys and girls in farm work by promoting farm and poultry competition for prizes; to establish postal savings banks with the funds deposited in banks in the communities from which the funds come; to secure parcels post, the drainage of swamp lands and the building of good roads. The subjects discussed in the convention covered a wide range and were evidence of a mental quickening among the rural classes as well as a combined effort to protect their own interests.

The American Medical Association held its opening session also in the Coliseum, but for subsequent meetings was broken up into so many sections that those who desired to hear what the doctors had to say felt a sense of disappointment that they could not be in more places than one at a time. There was an immense attendance of medical men, coming from the great centres and from the most remote districts. Their discussions impressed one with the optimism which characterizes the medical profession at the present time. Dr. Wm. H. Welch, the president of the Association, distinguished as the founder of the pathological laboratory of the Bellevue Hospital Medical College in New York, and the organizer, later, of the now famous Johns-Hopkins Medical School in Baltimore, gave expression to a most hopeful view as regards the ultimate conquest of medical science over disease, in an address delivered at the graduating exercises of Washington University. The mention of this institution of learning calls to mind the latest development in medical circles in the United States. As a result of the private donation of five and a half million dollars by business men of St. Louis, plans have been set on foot for the establishment and equipment of one of the greatest medical schools on the American Continent. It is the aim of the promoters of this enterprise to establish at St. Louis a centre of medical education that shall possess standards of efficiency in medical education and research equal to those of any other school in the world. Grounds have been purchased for the buildings of this great medical school adjacent to the large tract acquired for the Barnes Hospital, a Methodist institution soon to be erected at a cost of one million dollars and to be equipped according to the most modern ideas. This immense outpouring of wealth directed to hospital purposes and for medical education in St. Louis marks an epoch in the history of the Mississippi Valley states. The standards here will be as high, if not higher, than those reached in the older institutions in the Atlantic states. The enterprise of the Washington University Medical School called forth, from the American Medical Association, unsparing eulogy; also some criticism and attack. There is a national movement the aim of which is to raise the standards of medical schools and to rescue medical instruction from the commercialism which has brought it into discredit. The movement is receiving powerful aid from the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, which seeks to secure a substantial basis of admission for every reputable medical school in the United States. It is not surprising that a work of reform of this nature should awaken opposition among those connected with the popular schools whose standards have been low. The leaders of the reform are inspired by the conviction, however, that medical practice cannot be elevated apart from the promotion of sound medical theory and that research work is the product, not the source, of high standards of medical education.

The ground covered by the American Medical Association overlapped in part that which formed the subject of discussion in the thirty-seventh session of the National Conference of Charities and Corrections, which met in St. Louis in May. So many are the phases of this organization that ten different public buildings were required for its sectional meetings. Wide and diverse interests were represented at this Convention, covering many fields of charity and reform. The movement represents the new democracy in which the people assume a fuller responsibility for the reform of society and the elimination of all sorts of evils; as well as for the development of public sentiment, the dissemination of correct ideas and the introduction of improved methods, as regards wholesome public and social life. This body is making relentless war upon the white plague. The battle against pulmonary tuberculosis, it is believed, will result in a triumph as great as that in the war made on cholera and the yellow fever. In attending the meetings, one could not fail to be impressed with the vastness of the movement for reform and social betterment, with the scope and varied character of humane activity, and with the deepened sense of the duty of altruism as felt by men of the present generation. The movement in general has the sanction of the state officials. It is supported by friendly public sentiment and is promoted by endowments, such as the Carnegie, Rockefeller and Russell Sage Foundations. The work is carried on by devoted enthusiasts, each in his own department, and by means of reports, leaflets, articles and addresses. There is a vast army of workers, and the battle waged against evils is more popular, and the work done is characterized by greater efficiency, than has been true at any other period of the history of the world. Private interests are sacrificed for the public good, and, while religion does not exhaust itself in social ideas and social service, much more of its energy is spent in that direction than was the case a century ago.

The cause that overtops all others in the way of social reform is the movement for temperance and prohibition. Recent years have witnessed a tremendous advance on the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors. Prohibition is practically the only political issue in the south and is the greatest issue in Missouri where the great breweries thrive and where the vote for constitutional prohibition is pending. Kentucky, as famed for its "bourbon", as Scotland, and a state in which one hundred million dollars is invested in distilleries, has only four "wet" counties out of a total of one hundred and nineteen. It is estimated that three-fourths of the entire population of the United States is now living under prohibition laws. This amazing advance is largely the result of systematic education begun in the Sunday Schools and public schools a quarter of a century ago, on the subject of temperance. It is a fine illustration of the true secret of effective self-government, that is, to look to the people for advancement in legislation rather than to legislation for the improvement of the people.

Not to mention the Laymen's banquet would leave unnoticed the gathering during the year which left the deepest impression upon the city of St. Louis. The banquet was one of a series held in about seventy-five cities in the United States, and was a part of a very remarkable religious movement among the laymen of the church. In St. Louis eighteen hundred plates were laid down, and those in attendance were the representative business and professional men of the city, among whom were Mayor F. H. Kreismann, Ex-Governor Folk of Missouri and Ex-Governor Yates of Illinois. The tide of enthusiasm ran high and the meeting reached a climax in the prayer offered by a great layman, one of the millionaires and leading business men of St. Louis. It was an impressive scene, for the men were in earnest and represented the strength of St. Louis, as regards influences that this city is capable of wielding for the advancement of the higher interests of the race. S.H.W.

THE WEATHER.

The incessant rain of the past two days, which at times has been extraordinarily heavy, has brought the usual tale of inundations and disasters. It would seem as if Central and Eastern Japan are threatened with a repetition of the floods in the latter part of August, three years ago. Reports are coming in of the rising of rivers, the submersion of houses, and damage to bridges and embankments in various quarters of this and neighbouring prefectures.

The low-lying parts of this city, and the coastal districts extending from Totsuka and Ofuna to Fujisawa and Chigasaki are more or less under water. The Kawasaki district between Yokohama and Tokyo is similarly affected through the overflowing of the Rokugo-gawa. Injuries to houses through landslides, and even of loss of life through the same cause, are reported from the inland districts. Unfortunately there is no prospect of improvement in the present abnormal conditions, and the meteorological authorities expect a continuance of the rains for the next day or two.

On Monday evening two Japanese houses on the north side of the Daikan zaka, of this city, were destroyed, and two damaged, owing to a landslide from the higher ground belonging to No. 75, Bluff. Fortunately the accident occurred early in the evening and no one was injured.

On account of interruptions at several sections of the Tokaido railway line, a train from Kodzu which was to arrive at Shimbashi at 7.45 a.m. on Monday was delayed until four o'clock in the afternoon. Several landslides have taken place near Washizu on the Tokaido line, and tunnels have collapsed at various points, so that the immediate restoration of traffic cannot be expected.

In various districts of Shizuoka and Aichi prefectures, traffic on the Tokaido railway has since Tuesday morning been interrupted at the sections of Motsumune-Yayezu, Yayezu-Fujiyeda, Tomoda-Horinouchi, and Washiji-Fukagawa. Telegraphic and telephonic communication at these sections has also been interrupted, so that little is known as to the present condition of the line west of Shizuoka.

The pier belonging to the Hayama Detached Palace has been washed away and the ricefields about Dzushi have suffered much damage.

A fairly sharp shock of earthquake was felt in Yokohama at 10.47 last evening, the oscillations being from north to south.

A notice is presented by the Yokohama Imperial Post-office to the effect that owing to damage to the Tokaido Railway by the recent floods the present Siberian Mails may possibly fail to connect with the steamer at Tsuruga.

INUNDATIONS AND OTHER DISASTERS.

Owing to the continuous and heavy rain since the 8th instant nearly the whole of the Tokaido and a part of the Tosando are the scene of disasters caused by the rising of various rivers. Railway traffic and telegraphic and telephonic communication have been interrupted; in many sections, houses have been submerged bridges damaged and embankments washed away, and many other serious accidents are reported.

A Kobe train which was about to enter Horinouchi Station at midnight on the 8th instant, was derailed, so that an express train from Kobe which arrived there soon afterwards was delayed two hours. Subsequently the latter train had to stay at Shimada Station. Over 122 passengers, among whom were 13 foreigners, were obliged to get out at that station. The train which left Kobe at noon on the 8th arrived at Shimbashi at 2 p.m. on the 9th, but trains which followed are supposed to have been stopped at Hamamatsu. At 7.30 p.m. on the 6th the central Railway Administration office instructed various station-masters to suspend the selling of tickets for places west of Shizuoka.

In Shizuoka over two thousand houses were submerged by the overflow of the Abekawa. On Tuesday morning the dormitory of the Shizuoka Commercial School collapsed as the result of a landslide. As the summer vacation had commenced several days before, there were no students in the dormitory, but one of the care-takers was instantly killed, and three others narrowly escaped. The reports published in various papers yesterday as to 14 students being buried alive are false.

The embankments of the Tenryu have been broken. Muddy water covered the fields, and over 2000 houses at Hamamatsu have been submerged. In the same town two persons were buried alive in the debris of a landslide.

In Fujiyeda all the bridges over the Setogawa have been washed away and nearly all the houses in the town are submerged. People are hurrying to places of safety, and over 40 persons are missing.

In Kanagawa prefecture the Banyu, Sagami, Name, Sakawa, and other rivers have risen to a considerable height. Several landslides, with inundation of fields, are reported from Kamakura, Ofuna, Oiso, Yokosuka, and other districts. The long bridge connecting Enoshima and Katase is in danger of being washed away. Electric tramway traffic between Odawara and Yumoto is interrupted.

Reports of damage by inundations and landslides are continuously being received from Tochigi, Ibaraki, and Saitama prefectures. In the region of Chuzenji, Nikko, rain has not ceased since the 1st instant, and at 10 p.m. on the 7th the rainfall was measured as 118.7 m.m., while the water in the lake had risen four inches.

On Tuesday and Wednesday mornings landslides occurred at Ise-cho, Nakamura-cho, and near Sengenzaka of this city, by which two houses and two sheds were crushed. Fortunately no one was injured.

On Monday evening a fishing boat with a full cargo of horse-mackerel was on her way from Futsu to Kanagawa, when owing to the carelessness of the helmsman the boat was upset. Fortunately the crew consisting of six men were saved by the steam launch Choyo Maru, of the Yokohama Harbour Police Station. The boat was towed to Yokohama.

On Monday night a landslide occurred at Esashi-machi, Kaishikawa, Tokyo, resulting in the destruction of a block of four houses. No loss of life is reported. A fire occurred the same night in the compound of the Naval Arsenal at Akabane, resulting in the destruction of the gun-powder laboratory.

Electric tramway traffic over the Rokugo River on the Keihin line is interrupted, and also between Higashi-Kanagawa and Hodogaya.

Railway traffic between Omori and Higashi-Kanagawa has been interrupted since 6 p.m.

yesterday, owing to floods in the neighbourhood of Kawasaki. Yokohama is thus virtually cut off from the capital.

METEOROLOGICAL REPORT.

According to the report of the Meteorological Station of this prefecture, the rainfall was measured as about 100 m.m.—nearly 4 inches—both on the 8th and 9th instant. At present a high pressure area extends from the Okhotsk Sea to the east of Hokkaido, registering 766 m.m. Several slight depressions have passed from time to time through the eastern provinces of the Main Island, so that the temperature generally has been low and much rain has fallen.

August.	Rainfall, m.m.	Time, hours.
1	4.7	1 26
2	18.5	10.03
3	72.2	10.36
4	10.8	3.46
5	0.6	2.28
6	0.3	1.17
7	8.7	3.32
8	91.5	22 15
9	98.7	23.18
10	38.6	10 00

Yesterday morning heavy rain was experienced in the Kwanto district, with a strong easterly wind blowing. A low pressure area was felt off Kumano, Kii province, registering 746 m.m., which was proceeding towards the N.E., while another over Kyushu, which registered 746 m.m. was coming east-north-east. It is presumed that the weather will be restored to its normal state when these depressions have passed.

The devastation caused by the recent floods is said to exceed anything experienced in this country during the last fifty years. Reports are coming in rapid succession from various quarters of the country concerning the rising of rivers, submersion of houses, demolition of bridges, embankments, and interruption of railway traffic, telegraphic and telephonic communication, &c.

These disaster have fallen most heavily on Shizuoka prefecture, especially at Fujiyeda and neighbourhood, where a large number of people have taken refuge on the roofs of houses and the branches of lofty trees, and many of them are on the verge of starvation.

Two trains which were compelled to stay at Kanaya Station on the 9th instant, carried some 700 passengers. Most of these passengers are living in the carriages on account of insufficiency of inns at Kanaya. They are barely keeping off starvation and are living on nigirimeshi (rice made into balls) and tea.

On Wednesday afternoon six passengers who were crossing the Oigawa in a small boat from Fujiyeda to Yaitsu, were swept away by the rapid current. Four of these men were saved, while two are missing.

In the neighbourhood of Shimada there are many villages entirely submerged. A lumber factory at Shimda, has sustained a loss of 40,000 yen, 200,000 cubic feet of lumber being swept away by the current of the Oigawa. A number of persons were also drowned in the muddy water.

On Tuesday a landslide occurred at the section of Matsuida and Yokogawa on the Shinyetsu line, and 13 workmen engaged in repairing the damaged railroad were buried under the debris. Three of these ill-fated workmen were killed, one injured, and the others are missing.

On Wednesday night the Fukuzumi Hotel at Tonosawa was entirely destroyed by the inundation of the Sakawagawa. There were nine buildings in all, and 61 guests were lodged in the hotel of whom 15 are missing. The loss is estimated at 150,000 yen.

In Tokyo rain and wind increased in violence on Wednesday night, causing many landslides and other ruins in almost all parts of the capital, Honjo, Fukagawa, and Asakusa wards being most seriously affected. The Tenjin River in Honjo overflowed its banks and over 2,000 houses in neighbouring streets were more or less submerged. The Edogawa in Ushigome also overflowed its embankments and muddy water covered the streets. The residence of Count Okuma was one of those flooded.

The embankments of the Rokugo River were broken on Wednesday afternoon, and the town of Kawasaki was entirely surrounded by overflowing water so that the town had the appearance of a small island in muddy water. Houses standing near Kawasaki Station are submerged up to the floor.

In Yokohama the principal hall of the Buddhist temple Joshoji at Minami-Ota, collapsed on Wednesday night owing to a landslide. The superior of the temple was slightly injured. During the same night landslides occurred at Yamate-cho, Moto-machi, and Teppoba, resulting in the destruction of several houses and sheds. One person was killed and several others were more or less seriously injured.

At Nakazawa Tsukui-gori which is source of the Yokohama Waterworks, landslides have occurred at several places and the water-pipes have sustained more or less damage. Consequently the Waterworks Office was compelled to stop the supply of water at 9.00 a.m. yesterday. In order to complete the repairs in a day or two, water will be supplied for only one hour to-day and to-morrow—from seven to eight in the morning.

The Meteorological Station of this prefecture reports that the long continued heavy rain stopped at 1.25 a.m. on the 11th instant, when the direction of the wind was N.N.W. and the atmospheric pressure lowered to 746 m.m. It thundered at intervals from 1 a.m. till 4 a.m., first in the E.S.E. and afterwards in a little more easterly direction. Meanwhile the principal depression which had been proceeding towards this district grew weaker and passed, being attracted by a new low pressure area which appeared in the quarter of Mayebashi. The force of rain and wind was thus minimized.

The Yokohama Post Office forwarded all the mails going to places west of Shizuoka, at 10 a.m. yesterday Kobe by the steamer Chikugo Maru, and to Atsuta by the No. 17 Kwannon Maru at seven o'clock in the evening, while the Kumano Maru brought mails coming from the western provinces at 1.30 p.m., from Kobe. The Chikuzen Maru will arrive here with the western mails at 2 p.m. to-day. The mails from Tokyo are brought here for the present by water at 7.00 a.m., 11.00 a.m., 2.30 p.m., and 6.30 p.m., while those from Yokohama leave at 4.30 a.m., 9.00 a.m., 1.30 p.m., and 4.30 p.m.

CHINA NEWS AND NOTES.

VARIOUS FORMS LAWLESSNESS.

It is perhaps almost impossible for an outsider to realise the amount of lawlessness actually permitted in China. Bandits are on the frontiers, pirates on the coasts, children are kidnapped, and traders who take merchandise to interior cities carry back young women and girls as slaves. Apart from political considerations it would seem a blessing to the world if some nation strong enough did take hold of China and clean its cities morally and physically. Imagine the following within a few miles of the British possession of Hongkong.

PIRACY ON THE WEST RIVER.

On Tuesday evening as the West River steamer Tai On was returning to Hongkong from Kiang-moon those on board witnessed a stirring fight between a band of pirates and the crew of a trading junk. When nearing a place called Na Ning discharges of musketry were heard and a little further down the river officers and crew saw a large dragon boat, containing about twenty men, lying close to a big junk and blazing away with rifles and what appeared to be blunderbusses at the crew of the trader. The junk, however, appears to have been well armed, and her crew, probably realising the treatment they might expect to meet if captured, were returning the fire of their assailants with interest. The little river steamer, which carries only a few obsolete weapons, was steered clear of the battle area, her captain probably realising that while he could not render assistance he and his crew might fall victims of the large party of armed pirates. As the vessel proceeded on her way, those on board watched the course of events with breathless interest, and as the light grew dimmer they observed a new development. Firing opened from the river bank, and the volley appeared to be directed on the pirates' craft. Then a guard boat hove into view and opened fire on the robbers, and as the Tai On was passing out of sight those on board observed the Government vessel overhauling the pirates. Long after the scene was obscured from view the cracking of rifles was audible on the river steamer.

SLAVE TRAFFIC.

Regarding slave traffic in China the N.-C. Daily News gives the following:—

A lady who lives at Tungchow a market place about 260 li south of Kueiyang reports that Cantonese traders who bring goods to Kueiyang generally take numbers of girls and young women back with them to sell in Canton. Some of these seem to go willingly, evidently not realizing to what there are going; others, generally younger girls, are very unhappy, but helpless. It is shameful that such traffic should be tolerated.

CHINESE EDITOR ARRESTED.

A Cantonese named Chao Yuh K'ing editor of the Kung yen Pao, who speaks Russian, and has travelled extensively in Continental Europe, has been convicted of "treason" for selling military information to "a certain Power" at Peking; the Regent is resolved to make a salutary example and to mete out the highest punishment in this case. At one time the prisoner held a Russian railway post as station-master at Manchuria on the Russo-Chinese frontier.

SUICIDE OF A NATIVE MERCHANT.

The Chinese conception of justice is certainly peculiar at times. A good illustration is the following, printed in a recent edition of the China Gazette:—

A highly respectable Chinese merchant, Mr. Yuan Shu-liang, proprietor of the Poun-Kee Shipping Hong, Foochow Road, committed suicide on Tuesday afternoon.

The tragedy was caused by the fact that Mr. Yuan in course of business received a number of bank orders issued by the Tsing Yuan Bank which is the first of the native banks which failed within the last few days, which bank orders he discounted for cash with a high official of the Chapei Police. Immediately after the failure of that bank, two of the Chapei Police officers, the above mentioned being one of them, succeeded in enticing Mr. Yuan's nephew outside of the Settlement limits and had him arrested and brought to the Chapei Police Station, where he is being imprisoned and held as a hostage for the repayment of Wei's money, which is at the most, only a civil claim, notwithstanding the fact that Yuan Gen-tsu, that is the name of Mr. Yuan's nephew, is a resident of the Foreign Settlement and also that he is in the employ of a Spanish subject. The Chapei Police, not satisfied with the possession of his nephew, applied to the International Mixed Court for the arrest of Mr. Yuan Shu-liang himself and his elder brother, although the latter had nothing to do with the matter. This proved too much for Mr. Yuan to bear and he thought it better to terminate his life. The case may lead the Chapei Police into some unpleasant complications with the Spanish Consul and the Municipal Police. The Spanish Consul has already protested against the irregular procedure adopted by the Chapei Police in the arrest of the nephew, there having been no warrant of any kind, and is demanding his immediate release; particularly in view of the fact that the Chapei Police have no judicial authority over the native residents of the Settlement.

ALLEGED CAPTURE OF COLOWAN PIRATES.

Since the reported escape of a number of the Colowan pirates, the Hongkong Police, especially those stationed on the outskirts of British territory, have kept a sharp look-out for any of the band who might seek a haven of refuge in the Colony.

On Friday night a gang of seven men were captured by Sergeant Gordon at Cheung Chau, and are now in Victoria Gaol awaiting trial. Being informed that a native craft had put into the island the Sergeant procured a sampan and with a party of his men went on board to investigate, and was not long in discovering that all was not as it should be. Of thirteen men in the boat, six were imprisoned in the cabin. These it was learned were the original crew, while the seven men at large had pirated the vessel and are said to be escapees from Colowan. In the dusk of the evening it seems that they hoped to land unobserved at Cheung Chau, and to lie low there until the memory of Colowan had faded from the minds of the public and more particularly from the police. But the vigilance of the police on Dumb Bell Island made it impossible for anyone to land there unobserved by night or by day, and thus the little band in question ran right into the arms of the law.

When he discovered the state of affairs on board the Sergeant had the boat pulled alongside the police jetty and the suspects conveyed to the lock-up on the island. The fishing boat was then searched and two Maurer rifles, two revolvers and some 200 rounds of ammunition were found, as well as a number of belts and bandoliers.

The story of the happenings on this fishing boat was told to the police by one of the boatmen who was found locked up in the cabin. He states that he and his comrades were fishing off Sze Tong, which is opposite Colowan, on the night of the 26th instant. Somewhere about midnight, or shortly afterwards, a sampan glided quietly alongside their vessel, and before they were aware what had happened seven armed men sprang aboard, covered the crew with revolvers, and warned them as they valued their lives to create no disturbance. The crew were then told curtly that if they did not obey orders, and take their visitors where they desired to go, they would be shot. The fishermen had no alternative but to obey, and under instructions from the pirates the sails were hoisted and the vessel got under way. Island after island was visited, but the voyage was continued until Cheung Chau was reached on Friday night, when the boat's crew were imprisoned in the cabin and the pirates took the vessel into port.

GLOWING EMBERS.

A TALE OF THE SATSUMA REBELLION.
(FROM THE JAPANESE OF TOKUTOMI KENJIRO)
BY A LLOYD.

CHAPTER I.

"Win, and they'll make you a general: get licked, and they'll brand you as a traitor."

The sentence reminds me that of the fifteen thousand vigorous young men who, one February day marched out of the castle of Kagoshima, splashing their way through slush and snow, some fell wounded here and there, until at last the poor remnant were brought to bay at the village of Nisshūnagi, where they stood like snarling boars, surrounded on all sides by relentless hunters.

Ammunition, provisions, strength,—all had given out and the greater part of the corps, feeling discretion to be the better half of valour, had hoisted a white flag and offered to make their surrender. Only a gallant remnant of some three hundred irreconcilables determined, as a forlorn hope, to cut their way through the opposing hosts of the loyalist army, in order that by so doing they might at least be able to die and be buried on the same hill that had witnessed the tragic end of their beloved leader Saigō. With this hope before them, they had tightened the strings of their straw waraji, and during the whole of the night of August 17th in the tenth year of Meiji, were making a forced march where the moonlight over the trees cast deep shadows on the slopes of Kawaigatake.

Their baggage had been left behind. They marched in silence, each man with his haversack on his back, his musket in his hand, and his sword slung across his back. They had no torches, and needed none: a native of the district had been secured as a guide across the mountains, and Kirino was their commander.

Kirino wore the familiar dress of the Satsuma men, and was girt with an obi of coarse blue cloth, which contained the short dirk which was his favourite weapon. His garments were tucked up behind with this same obi, and he marched pipe in hand, sharing the leadership of the forlorn hope with a few congenial spirits,—with Murata, Kijima, Beppu, Nomura, Yamanoda, Sakata, Masuda, and others. These men formed his body-guard: the men that marched behind them, had, in happier days, formed a portion of Hemmi's battalion. The men smiled as they marched, but it was the half-unconscious smile of men whose minds are fully made up to batter down walls of iron, or to perish in the attempt.

It was four in the afternoon when they decided on their march, and it was dark by the time the vanguard reached the foot of Kawaigatake. The Milky Way straggling across the heavens, the mountains loomed black in the distance, blacker perhaps, because of the feeble rays of the waning moon, and the cold made them shiver as they walked.

Nor were their enemies asleep. They could see their watch and signal fires, flashing from hill to hill and mocking the stars; they could hear beneath their feet the irregular firing of their scouts, as they advanced up the valleys. And there still remained more than two ri to climb before they could arrive at the summit of the path.

"We must make haste," they said one to another, "we must make haste to reach the summit before daybreak." And hasten they did, in spite of the fact that their road lay through deep sticky clay, and that the darkness beneath the trees was one that might almost be felt.

Presently a man of the rear-guard made a false step at a rocky corner and fell down into the valley beneath. But his comrades paid no heed to the occurrence. Six hundred waraji sandals went pattering on across valleys and over mountain shoulders, through green underwood and over fallen leaves. They were too busy to notice that one of their number had fallen; all they did was to go up, up, up, until the late moon was fading away in the West, and the short summer night was drawing to a close.

CHAPTER II.

The short summer night was drawing to a close, and the cliffs which crowned the mountain summits were already beginning to show white against the dawn. The white drops of dew were hanging on the branches of the shrubs and trees: as the morning breeze moved the branches they fell to the ground. Some, more unfortunate, perhaps, than the rest fell on to the cheek of the man whom we have seen falling from the mountain path into the dark ravine before him, and trickled into his mouth. The man's lips began to tremble, his hands and feet moved convulsively, and words came unconsciously to him.

"Here I am, mother," he said.

The sound of his own voice awoke him from his lethargic sleep. He sat up, and looked around him. He looked up at the blue sky above him, and groaned aloud.

"I thought I was going home,—home," he said. "I must have been dazed by my fall! Why, it is almost daylight."

He smacked his lips, rose to his feet, punched himself four or five times on the hips, wrung his hands, stamped his feet, and was looking around for the musket which had slipped from him during his fall, when suddenly the cry of battle came to his ears over the distant mountain tops.

"Damn it!" he exclaimed (for the Japanese, too, has words with which to relieve his feelings.) "I am too late, I fear." And without the loss of a moment he adjusted his waraji strings, gave a hitch to the sword that hung across his back, planted his foot firmly on the slippery clay, and stretching out his hand to seize hold of a bough above his head, began climbing the steep side of the ravine.

He would stop every now and then in his climbing, and prick up his ears to listen. The shades of night had all disappeared by the time he had crossed the ravine, and had reached the foot of the mountain, and the morning light lay on all the hills. A few minutes later, the sun rose in his royal splendour, and the mountain crows began their matins. We may look at him for one moment as he leans on his musket and pauses in his ascent to strain his ears for the sound of battle. He is eighteen years of age, thin in the face, but with clear black eyes. His uniform (of European cut) is covered with mud and the stains of travel: he has a girdle of white cotton stuff, Japanese leggings and waraji. A net bag, and another pair of waraji hang across his shoulder. His sword has a sheath of red lacquer and is tied with a thick sawada cord.

He listened, however, in vain; for the sound of battle came no more.

"I can hear nothing," he exclaimed, with disappointment and chagrin on his face; they must have cut their way through. Chut! Chut! I am too late, too late! They were certainly making for Mitai. I wonder which way Mitai lies from here."

As he climbed, he muttered to himself, but the farther he went the more oppressive did the silence become. Once indeed he fancied he could hear the sounds of shooting in the far distance, but the sound was not repeated, and when he stopped he could only hear the beating of his own heart and the pitter patter of the dew-drops falling from the trees. After a couple of miles or so of climbing through the forest, he reached the edge of the great fir plantation and found himself at the foot of a mountain covered with the thick foliage of trees.

Then, all of a sudden, he heard the tramp of soldiers' footsteps, and before he could realize his own astonishment, found himself confronted by a troop of fifteen or sixteen infantry soldiers of the Imperial Army.

He stopped in astonishment; so did the soldiers!

"A rebel! A rebel!" cried one of the latter and at once there followed the ominous click of cocking muskets. Our friend knew that he had not a moment to lose. Seizing his musket by the barrel he attacked a soldier who stood in his path and felled him with a blow from the heavy stock. A moment of confusion followed, for the soldiers had not expected so sudden an attack from a single foe. Profiting by the opportunity, our friend the rebel seized another of his antagonists and was about to throw him to the ground, when a third soldier came to his comrade's rescue, and seized the sword which hung idly across the rebel's back. The rebel did not stay to fight. He gave one whoop of defiance and flung himself back into the thick plantations from which he had just emerged.

"Fire! Fire! He has got off!" The cries of the soldiers and the reports of their muskets came simultaneously, as did also the ping ping of the bullets close to his ears. But our friend did not stay to look around him. He slid rapidly down the tree-grown precipice, and did not rest until he had put a mile or two of thick forest between himself and his enemies.

CHAPTER III.

A fair maiden, rising sixteen, is sitting at a window looking westward. She has those soft dimples round her eyes which the Japanese admire so highly as a mark of feminine beauty, and her hair, which she has only recently begun to do up, is trying to straggle rebelliously over her cheeks. She has been bending over her loom to mend a broken thread, and has just resumed her shuttle. She is now gazing fixedly at the shadows which the trees cast against the shoji in the light of the evening sun. The shadows are blurred and dim by reason of the wind that comes rushing down from Hikosan, and as she looks, the heaves a sigh which seems to comes from the lowest depths of her little heart.

A voice came from the interior of the house. "O-Kiku, O-Kiku!" it cried.

"Yes, yes," cried the maiden in reply. And she got down from her loom, removed her tasuki, and went into the next room, where a woman of some forty years of age, with gray hairs peeping out among the black, was busily employed in peeling boiled chestnuts.

"Tea is ready, Kisan dear," said the mother.

"Mother," said the girl, "where is Matsu?"

"He has not come home yet," replied the mother. "With Saigō in his present frame of mind, and all the world thinking only about fighting, the boys in the village play at nothing but soldiering, morning, noon, and night. It's a dreadful thing, this soldiering. Isn't it, Kisan?"

Mother and daughter looked at each other and sighed. Then a silence fell on them for a few moments, as they sipped their tea and peeled the chestnuts.

Presently the mother stole a glance at her daughter's face.

"Kisan," she said, "are you listening? Do you know that Jimbei came to visit us again a few days ago?"

But there was no response from the girl.

"Yes," continued the mother complacently, "he came for an answer. I refused to give him one on the plea that father was away from home, but I fear, all the same, that Takeru will be much annoyed at my treating his messenger in this way. And, by the by, I am told that the announcement will be made within two or three days of Takeru's appointment as heir and successor to the family property. At any rate, Jimbei says that they are very busy over at the Ueda's with preparations for a great feast."

"Takeru!" exclaimed the girl, but without enthusiasm, "Has he got his wish at last?"

"You see, replied the mother," there was really nothing else to be done. For Satoru, though the first born, is such a fool, and Shigeru has left the house. But the really important thing is that Jimbei says they want to have the question of Takeru's marriage fixed up before the announcement of his selection as prospective heir is made, and he is to come again to-morrow for an answer. We must give him some sort of an answer, my dear, and, seeing that the offer comes from the Ueda family, it ought to be a favourable one. But there are your feelings to be consulted.

"Mother, if I am to marry Takeru, I . . ."

"That is the very thing my dear, that worries your father so. You know we are under great obligations to the Ueda family, and father thinks it would be a very nice match for you. But he is too kind-hearted to betroth you to anyone without your knowledge, especially as you are only his stepdaughter, and your reluctance to accept the situation puts him into a very awkward kind of a dilemma. For myself, I am always trying to take your part, but my plans are always being thwarted. It is very hard on me. I had ten times rather be abused than thwarted."

The mother finished with a sigh.

"Oh dear! murmured O-kiku," it is so hard to go against your wishes; but I really cannot bear the thought of marrying Takeru, mother. If Takeru's mother were here to see me, I think she might understand my feelings; but Takeru's father, . . . well, you see, his illness has so changed him that he is no longer the man he was. And you know what Takeru's character is like, don't you, mother? His mother has all sorts of ideas about him and for him, but she has no influence over him at all."

"Dear, dear," sighed the mother. "If only Shigeru were here!"

O-Kiku sighed sympathetically. "Tell me mother," she whispered "what has become of Shigeru." As she spoke, the tears which she could no longer control or conceal fell fast into her lap.

From what Jimbei tells me," replied the mother, "the Castle of Kagoshima must have fallen on the 24th of last month. Saigō is dead, and Masuda of Nakatsu has died also. Not a single one of the men who went from Nakatsu neighbourhood to join the rebels has returned home, so we have no news at all. Shigeru may be dead, or he may have been taken prisoner; but the probabilities are that a man of his spirit would have died on the field of battle. The Ueda family are all convinced that he is dead."

"But, mother," replied Kiku, if he had died, we should certainly have heard of it from somewhere. I cannot bring myself to believe that Shigeru is dead. Last night I dreamed of him. He was terribly thin and emaciated, but he reached his home in safety."

"My dear," said the mother, your dream came to you because you always have him in your thoughts. How well it would all have been had Takeru joined the rebels, and Shigeru stayed at home. But things don't always happen as we want them; do they, Kiku dear?"

CHAPTER IV.

While O-Kiku and her mother were thus conversing on affairs of momentous importance to them, at a distance of about ten chō from the house in which they were, an old man, with a hoe over his shoulder, was slowly walking along a narrow field-path. The evening sun was shining on his back, and he trod on the shadow which he cast himself. He looked every now and again at the rice growing in the field, stopping at intervals to pluck a tempting ear, which he would rub in his hand, and throw away the husks after eating the grain. The occupation was evidently a distraction for troubled thoughts, for his face kept twitching and he murmured much to himself.

He was presently overtaken by another man who was walking in the same direction. This latter was dressed as a country gentleman, with a silk haori over a long cotton garment, and his hair done in the queue known as a chompage. He, too, had evidently something to trouble him, for he was scratching his head as though in anxious thought.

"Mambei San! Mambei San!" he cried, as he caught sight of the old man before him.

The old man turned round at once.

"Why, Jimbei," he said, "Where do you spring from?"

"I," returned Jimbei. "I have just been to Takemura."

"To Takemura? To see Sonobe? I tell you what Jimbei, that matchmaking job of yours is giving you a good deal of trouble, I fear."

"You are quite right. It is anything but plain sailing. Still, if Sonobe will only give his consent, I shall see an ample reward for my labours. Eh? Mambei? Matchmaking and warfare are both things to be avoided eh?"

"Talking of war, Jimbei, Saigō being dead now will give us no more trouble. He was a marvel of activity so long as he lived."

"Quite true. So active, that it is hard to tell who has not been troubled by his pestilential schemes. Why, even here in Nakatsu, there are between forty and fifty families in tears because of him. For instance, there's the family at the yashiki."

"And what about Master Shigeru? I suppose it is useless to look for him to come home now."

"I am afraid it is."

"Hm! If he does not come back, the master will break his heart for him, and so will his wife, I fear. Still, Jimbei San. . . ."

"Eh?"

"I fear that Takeru looks upon Saigō as his god of fortune."

"Doubtless."

"You see, if there had been no Saigō there would have been no war. And if there had been no war, Shigeru would now be here. And if Shigeru were here, the property. . . . But, there, what am I saying? Henceforth the property belongs to Master Takeru. The man that stood in his way is dead. His elder brother is half-imbecile. The whole of the property comes into Takeru's hands, and with it will go the possession of the beautiful young lady. Don't you think, Jimbei, that Takeru is a most remarkably lucky young man?"

"Of course he is. He has his life, and life is nine-tenths of everything. For suppose now that Master Shigeru had not gone off to the war. He was the very apple of his parents' eyes, and had he lived at least one half of the inheritance would have been his. By that one foolish act of his in going off to the war, he has thrown away property worth thousands upon thousands. His inheritance will be just an empty tomb, and everything else, even his beloved O-Kiku, will pass to another. And yet I don't think Takeru will get her as easily as he thinks. . . . What a pity it is, to be sure, that Shigeru should lose her. . . . And what a man Master Takeru is! Behind his back folks do say the he's got a rare bad temper of his own, but to his face they all cringe and fawn. . . . Why even I, Jimbei, you see that I have to do his errands."

Suddenly they heard coming behind them the sound of horsehoofs. Both men turned round to look and were surprised to find that the rider was already within a few feet of them. He was a young man of three or four and twenty, with remarkably thick bushy eyebrows. He wore riding-trousers of white kokura cloth, carried a bamboo riding whip, and sat in a Japanese saddle on a chestnut horse.

The man in the chomage turned to address the rider, in evident confusion.

"Have you been for a long ride, sir?" he said. The rider vouchsafed no more than a stately inclination of the head, by way of reply, but rode forty or fifty feet, and then suddenly turned himself round.

The servant was by his side in an instant.

"Your pleasure, sir," he said deferentially.

"How are things going on?"

"I am now on my way home," replied the servant trotting alongside of the horse. "I am sorry to say, sir, that the gentleman was not at home to-day."

"Not at home? Nonsense! Do you know, Jimbei, how many days you have been over this job?"

Jimbei scratched his head as he came close to the horse's side.

"Well, sir, it has not been through my fault or neglect. The arrangements are all but completed. Will you not please give me another day or two of grace, sir?"

"If you can't do what I want you may be sure that I shall entrust the job to some one else."

His shaggy brows were knit, and his cruel eyes gleamed at Jimbei's face. Then he gave his horse one cut with the whip and rode away. Jimbei followed his retreating figure with his eyes. Then he turned, and meeting the old man's gaze, gave a sigh.

"What is it, Jimbei?"

"Nothing. I can't help feeling disappointed, that's all. You know, that is the next heir to the estate. The village will feel it very much."

In the meanwhile, the young man had ridden on ahead. His brows were knit, and he did not seem quite sure of his plans. He stopped by some willows to break off a twig, then gave his horse the whip and hastened on, and then a few minutes later, reined in again.

"There's no use hurrying home," he said.

The wide expanse of the fields stretched itself out before him in the sunshine, and the heavy ears of October rice seemed to bow their heads to their new master. Sitting high on his horse, he could look down on the busy men and women who were engaged in the harvest, and singing their happy songs as they laboured. Not a man or woman but whipped off his kerchief as the young squire passed by, and did obeisance to what they felt to be the rising sun. It was pleasant to be thus favoured.

At the end of the narrow path, some five or six furlongs away, on the slope of a bank that faced him, he could see blue smoke rising from a group of buildings whose white walls and dark-tiled roofs peeped cosily out from a clump of venerable cypress trees. He smiled as he looked at his home (there was a sense of proprietorship in the smile), and the horse, cooling his ears in the breeze that came over the fields, walked lightly and slowly in the evening sunlight along the path he knew so well. When he came to a place at the foot of the bank, where a battered fixō Sama, with a torn bib and a heap of pebbles around him, stood under the shade of a figus Indica, the horse of his own accord struck off to the right, over a rude bridge consisting of a single slab of stone thrown across a narrow stream, and brought his master right below the courtyard.

A big heavy man, who might have been one of the ugly Niō that guard a temple gate, came out at the sound of the horse's hoofs, and shading his eyes with his hand, peered to see who it was. His eyes were evidently dim, or the low evening sun shone into them and prevented him from seeing, for the horseman was preparing to dismount before he had satisfied his mind. Then, quite regardless of care or caution, he came bounding down the stone steps three or four at a bound.

"Takeru, Takeru, Takeru!" he cried.

"Well, Satoru," said the rider, pausing in the act of dismounting. "What is it?" And he quickly knotted up his reins.

"He is back. Shigeru has come back."

"What—Shigeru?"

The young man jumped off his horse excitedly. "How was it?" he asked. . . . Tell me, how was it?"

"Why, an hour or two ago," said Satoru, "a man dressed like a labourer, with a kerchief tied over his head, came wandering down the hill behind the house and into the garden, and when we looked, it was that fool Shigeru. He had lost his comrades on Kawaigatake and had tried to kill himself, but could not. He had then spent a long time in great distress at a farmhouse, and eventually made his way home across the mountains in the dress of a labourer. Ha! Ha! Ha! He had had no food for two days and was as thin as a ghost. When mother saw him she wept on his neck and fussed over him, as you might expect. We gave him a good square meal, and now he's fast asleep in the six-mat room at the back of the house. Ha! Ha! But, I say, Takeru, you must not tell anybody."

Takeru listened in silence. Then he tightened his hand over the riding whip which had almost slipped from his grasp.

"Hm!" he muttered. "Shigeru has come back, has he?"

CHAPTER V.

About two ri south-east from the Castle of Nakatsu in Buzen lies a certain mountain village. Close by it, and overlooking a narrow stream between high banks, stood a group of houses not unlike a castle when seen from a distance. The group formed, at the time of which this story is concerned, the mansion of Ueda Kyūgo, the richest man in the whole neighbourhood.

Some ancestor had planted, more than three hundred years before, in the midst of the grounds, a camphor tree. The tree was still strong and flourishing, in spite of the centuries it had seen, and was a fit emblem of the Ueda family, a race of mere country gentlemen, it is true, and yet so old that even the proud Okudairas, the ancient lords of Nakatsu, treated them with the greatest respect. The harvest never yielded less than a thousand bushels of rice for the Uedas: the Ueda strong-box was filled with title-deeds and documents, and broad pieces of ancient gold and silver coin; the Ueda godown was filled with antiquities and curios, with kakemono and gaku, and the story went that a certain great and famous connoisseur almost fainted with emotion at the priceless masterpieces of art which the Uedas once brought out for his inspection. Everything about the house, even the moss-grown walls and pigeons cooing on the roof, betokened wealth and comfort, and the people of the country side had composed a poem to the effect that it would be a very nice thing to be a lord, even if one could not be as rich as Ueda.

Ueda Kyūgo, the present master, was at the time forty-seven years of age. In his youth, according to the best traditions of a somewhat narrow age, he had filled his head with the wisdom of China and strengthened the muscles of his arms with swordsmanship: and nature and training had combined to produce in him a Puritanic temper. For the last year he had suffered from gout, which had practically debarred him from taking exercise in any form; and the result of the continued pain with constant confinement, had been to reduce him to a state of the greatest despondency. He lost all taste for fishing and shooting indeed with the exception of two annual Kago-excursions, in the spring and autumn, he rarely left his bed now.

His wife, Madame Yoshi was forty-two, a spare pale-looking lady rather stern and forbidding when first you saw her, but yet in truth one of those gentlewomen who would not willingly hurt a fly.

The worthy couple had no daughters, but there were three sons, Satoru, Takeru and Shigeru, aged respectively, twenty-five, twenty-three and eighteen.

The eldest, Satoru, was a giant, as big as his two brothers put together. But in intellect he was dull and slow, and not at all (to use the homely proverb of the Japanese) the kind of timber that would make a good roof-tree. The servants despised him, his younger brothers ordered him about as they chose. He had already practically been disinherited.

The second son, Takeru, formed a perfect contrast to his elder brother. He had a high brow and deep sunk eyes, and his strength of will was such that when he clenched his teeth, iron bars could not have forced them open to reveal a secret. Yet, in spite of his obstinate will and frequent wilfulness, he was a man of great practical wisdom. He spoke little, thought much, fashioned himself on the wisdom of the Chinese, did his hair in the old mage style, and never rode out except on a saddle of Chinese make.

The youngest, Shigeru, was the very reverse of all this. He was a youth of the modern school, and had early imbibed liberal principles. He read Tokyo journals and talked patronizingly of liberty and the rights of the people. He had babbled from infancy about the invasion of Korea, representative Government, and the overthrow of Ōkubo's Government. All the old gentlemen round Nakatsu held up their hands in horror at his radical audacity, and in the end he attached himself to one Masuda Sotarō, a demagogue to whom he looked up as to a sinless sage. His whole thought was given to his country. The result of all this was that in the April before the commencement of this story, he had disappeared along with his teacher Masuda, leaving behind him a letter which explained where he had gone and why. It was this Shigeru, the reckless enthusiast for often unattainable ideals, to whom the affections of his parents were really given, and when they refused to allow him to be adopted into a neighbouring family of position, the whole country side were quite sure that the future of the Ueda family lay with him, and that he would have at least one half of the family property. This was one of the reasons for which Takeru hated his younger brother.

He had another reason. One ri distant from the Ueda homestead lived a family named Sonobe, a mother, and her one daughter by her first husband now deceased, a second husband, and a son of the marriage. There had been another son by the first marriage, a great friend of Shigeru's, but he had been dead some two years. The daughter, O-Kiku, was sixteen years old this year,—in Japanese eyes, just the marriageable age.

Many years ago, when O-Kiku was only eight years of age, towards the end of one autumn, when the nuts were falling from the trees, the three Ueda boys had been invited to the Sonobe's to gather nuts on the hills behind the village. All day long, in the autumn sunshine, the children were busy with their baskets among the trees and bushes.

Their baskets were heavy with rich spoil; only Shigeru, who was younger than the rest had not secured more than half a basket full. O-Kiku was the first to discover this, and with the generosity of a girl, she tried to make things level by transferring to Shigeru's basket some of her own abundant share of the spoils. But she was not skilful enough to deceive the others.

"Yah!" cried out the blundering Satoru, "look at the idiot of a Shigeru. He lets himself be helped by a girl!"

Shigeru flushed like a turkey-cock, and turned to punch his brother. It was his only resource, and his anger found no other way of expressing itself. But there was seven years' difference between the lads, and Satoru was remarkably tall and strong, Shigeru was promptly knocked to the ground, much to O-Kiku's distress, who, summoning her own brother to her aid, created a diversion by making an attack on her own account on Satoru. Shigeru might now have succeeded in making his escape, but just at this moment Takeru thought fit to intervene. He rushed at his prostrate younger brother and kicked him on the head as he lay on the ground. An exciting struggle followed, but at last the combatants were separated.

"Yah!" cried Satoru, as a parting shot, as he retired from the combat. "Shigeru and Kiichan are going to be husband and wife."

"Quite right," answered O-Kiku with spirit. "I'll take Shigeru. I don't want a fool like you."

Many years had elapsed since then. O-Kiku no longer did her hair in the "tobacco-box style," something more elegant and refined having taken its place. All three brothers fell in love with the fragrant beauty of the white chrysanthemum. But Shigeru, who was the chosen friend of O-Kiku's dead brother, became the girl's friend likewise. When the brother died and Shigeru's visits to the house became less and less frequent, her mind would still dwell on Shigeru as her brother's friend. And this was the second reason that the envious Takeru had for hating his younger brother.

Takeru was not in the habit of wearing his heart on his sleeve, and he said nothing to show his feelings. But it was hard for him to repress the smile of satisfaction which came over his face when he found that Shigeru had thrown over all his prospects and had run off to join the rebels under Saigō.

"Opportunity," he thought, "comes to those who wait for it; Shigeru's impatience has made him jump into the fire. The idiot!"

Then he spoke his thoughts to his parents. "Father, mother," he exclaimed vehemently, "look at the folly of this. He has deserted his parents, forsaken his home, and turned rebel. Why go on mourning for him? It is ninety-nine to one against his coming back, and even supposing he should escape with his life from the field of battle, he will be taken and put to death as he reaches his home. To all intents and purposes Shigeru is dead, and you had better make up your minds to treat him as such. Now what are you going to do? Satoru you know is an ass; you have none upon whom you can rely for securing the future prosperity of the Ueda family. I am your only prop and stay; you know me, and you had better henceforth look upon me as your best heir and successor."

Takeru did not express these sentiments just in so many words. But his behaviour betrayed his sentiments in a most unmistakable manner, and he made no scruples about laying an iron hand upon all the business of the family. And deeds are more potent than words.

Once or twice, in the early days of the civil war, news had reached the family from their son on the battlefield. But the news soon ceased to come. Then they heard rumours concerning the war. The Satsuma army was daily drifting into greater straits and difficulties, and the hopes of return became faint and shadowy. At last it was rumoured that Kagoshima Castle had fallen a month ago. The grieving parents were at last convinced that their favorite child was dead, and Takeru's brow began to clear.

"The war is over," he said to his father, "and things are gradually returning to what they were. Now is the time to settle the question of the inheritance. It has hung fire too long: and so has the question of a marriage with O-Kiku, negotiations for which should be commenced without further delay."

Takeru's efforts were not fruitless. It was at last arranged the announcement of the settled inheritance should be publicly made during the next two days, and efforts were made to settle the betrothal with all convenient speed.

It was on the tenth day of October. Suddenly Shigeru, the object of so much heart-burning, upset everything by re-appearing suddenly upon the scene.

CHAPTER VI.

"It can't be helped, can it, Oyoshi?"

The speaker was a man of over middle age, who was sitting on an outspread futon with his legs stretched out comfortably before him. Behind him, on the tokonoma, were two stag's antlers which served as a stand for a couple of Japanese swords with ornamented scabbards and andle. It was the most private apartment in the house of Ueda and the time was midnight, two days after Shigeru's return.

His wife whom he addressed was sitting by his side. Her face, careworn and wan already, turned paler at these words.

"It looks, then," she said, "as though he had come home only to die. Is there no help at all? Is that what you mean, Take dear?"

"I have already explained my position to you. I am most anxious to help him. But you must remember that the honour of the family is now at stake. An Ueda has turned traitor. That alone is an almost overwhelming disgrace, though perhaps we might bear it. But the rebel who ought to have died on the field of battle, has come home safe and sound, and if we give him shelter and try to screen him, it will be just as though we had turned rebels ourselves. Just think what the world would find to say about us. Suppose we protect him. The fact of our doing so must come to light. It cannot be otherwise. Why, the whole village knows of his having come back already, and however well we may succeed in stopping the tongues of our own servants, we can't prevent the rumour from getting about. Have you forgotten that that man Sonobe has already offered to conceal Shigeru in his own house for a bit, because it would be so difficult for us to hide him here? The thing is impossible. The police would soon find where Shigeru is hiding, and in that case it would not be Shigeru only that would get into trouble. You and father would be taken up, too. Could you bear that, mother?—to see father taken to prison in his old age, and to think of him in the red clothes of a convict.

And suppose Shigeru were acquitted. That would not make our shame the less, would it? There have been about fifty young men from Nakatsu and the neighbourhood that have joined the insurgents. But, with the sole exception of Shigeru, not one of them has come back to his home. Suppose then that he, the only one that has come back, is allowed to stay with us here. What would people say? They would say, would they not? that out of love for your child you had sniiled a rebel who ought to have killed himself rather than return to his home, and that you had bribed the police to shut their eyes to your proceedings. The only thing that Shigeru can do now is to kill himself here. Then people will know that the Uedas come of worthy samurai stock, that Shigeru has shown it, that his parents have shown it still more, and that the blood that circulates in the veins of a samurai is different from that of the common people. For Shigeru himself, too, it would be far better to die honourably here, in the presence of his parents and brothers, than to be meanly arrested by the police and held up to the scorn of the populace. Just think—just persuade yourselves—that he has died on the field of battle. The thought will enable you to resign yourselves to his fate. Don't you think so, Satoru?"

Satoru was taken aback by this sudden appeal. "Yes, yes," he stammered, "you are quite right, what avails it for a fool like that to live?"

Father and mother looked each other in the face and drew a long breath.

"You agree with me, don't you? Father, and you, Mother" continued Takeru sharply. "I don't think you can have any objection. If that is so, then I will send for him immediately."

"Immediately?" pleaded the poor mother.

But Takeru heeded her not.

"If we hesitate," he said, "all will be lost. We heard only an hour or two ago that the policeman had been questioning the villagers about him; didn't we, Satoru?"

"Yes,..... Yes....."

"But....."

"Now, Mother, no buts. Remember, it will not be my fault if you have to go to prison for him."

"Try to resign yourself, dear," urged her husband.

"Yes, Mother," pleaded Satoru, repeating his father's very words, "try to resign myself."

"Brother," said Takeru, "go and fetch Shigeru." Satoru rose vigorously at the command of his younger but more determined brother, and left the room. But he returned a moment later.

"Takeru! Takeru!" he cried.

"What is worrying you? Can't you be quiet?"

"He is fast asleep."

"Asleep, poor boy!" sighed his mother.

"Asleep?" scorned Takeru. "Then wake him, and bring him here. You need tell him nothing. Do you understand?"

"I am to tell him nothing, and just to bring him here." The sound of Satoru's footsteps died away on the corridor, and a dead silence fell upon the room. The andon, round which the three that remained were sitting, shed a dim, gloomy light, and the melancholy drip of the water from the bamboo pipe into the pond, made itself distinctly heard.

CHAPTER VII.

"Shigeru," said the father, as his son came into the room, unconscious of what was in store for him, "we have been talking about you." Then, turning to his second son, and with his hand trembling as he reached out to pull an arm-rest close to him, "Takeru," he said, "you may speak to him."

"You, Shigeru," spoke Takeru in clear magisterial tones, "you have seen fit to join yourself to the traitors."

At the word "traitor," Shigeru gave his head a violent toss into the air.

"Traitors? Our noble Saigō a traitor? The traitors are the officers of the Government, and that wretched knave Ōkubo—the men that mislead the Emperor."

"Hold your tongue," said Takeru scornfully, "Saigō was the enemy of the Emperor, and he has got his deserts. He is dead."

"It's just a toss up, Victory or Defeat" (Shō hai wa toki no un).

"Be quiet, Shigeru. You left your sick father, and went off to join the traitors, to the shame of your family. This we might have borne, but, like a coward, you have come back alive from the field of battle, and have thereby brought untold trouble to your father and mother, and all the members of your family. What excuse have you to offer for your conduct?"

Shigeru had no answer. He merely hung his head, and gazed at the tatami.

"Takeru," pleaded the mother, "don't be so....."

Takeru turned an eye of thunder on his mother. "Mother" he said, in tones that made her quail, and then, to his brother, "Shigeru," he said "you must kill yourself."

Shigeru raised his head. It was as though a thunder-bolt had struck him.

The old father drew a long breath. "It is a your brother has said, Shigeru," he spoke presently. "For the sake of the family we must as this of you"

"Yes," echoed Satoru, "for the sake of the family we must ask it."

Shigeru looked at his father, and then at his brothers. Next he turned a tearful and imploring eye to his mother who sat trembling with fear beside her husband. She tried in vain to speak, her lips quivered, but words failed her, and Tak ru's fearful eyes were fixed gloweringly upon her. At last she plucked up heart to speak.

"Shigeru," she said, "please forgive me." And her voice trembled with pity.

"What! you too, Mother?" said Shigeru, dropping his head in an agony of despair, "alas! why did I not die on Kawai ga take?"

He rose from his seat, took the sword off the stag's antlers on the toko no ma, and returned to his seat.

"By your leave (gomen)" was all that he said. Then he plunged the sword into his bowels, and drops of his red blood spirted on to the andon.

CHAPTER VIII.

The villagers who had been talking about Shigeru's coming home, soon began to gossip about his death. Some said that he had taken his own life, others that his brothers had stabbed him to death, and again others that he was not dead at all, but had made his escape to some distant part of the country. But after the funeral had been celebrated with becoming solemnity no more was heard about his having made good his escape. The people who had been saying that the hand of the law did not reach as far as the rich, and that even a rebel, if he had the money and knew where to place it, might get off scot free, now began to change their tune. They now began to pity the sorrows of the rich, who could not protect their sons and brothers, but were obliged to force them to commit suicide. It was better in these times, they said, to be the son of a beggar than of a rich man. A thick fog of popular disfavour and hatred seemed to brood over the Ueda homestead.

Takeru perceived the popular ill-will and took his father off on a visit to a hot-spring. Only Satoru, his mother, and servants, remained at home. The villagers began to keep away from the house, and a deathlike solitude seemed to reign in the once prosperous mansion.

Madame Ueda was never happy again after the death of her son. She kept her own room, and mourned incessantly for him. But Satoru heeded her sorrow no more than he cared for the absence of his father and brother. He spent all his days in fishing, and the house was left to the silence of autumn or of death.

CHAPTER IX.

There was a strange glow on the clouds on the morning of the 18th of October, and the air was very sultry. By noon the air was perfectly still, there not being even the slightest breeze to rustle the heavy leaves. The villagers shook their heads. "Such a stillness," they said, "is weather making."

Nothing however, occurred to disturb the stillness of the scene until about 3 p.m. When, all of a sudden, there came a great sound as of the wings of a thousand eagles flapping in a rapid flight. The rice-straw sheaves standing in the fields were seized by the whirlwind, which rapidly developed into a hurricane, and borne aloft in the air. Hour by hour, the storm increased in violence, and in the evening the servants in the Ueda house, cowered round the kitchen fire, and chattered just to conceal their fears.

"My! how it blows," exclaimed one of the men-servants who was sharpening his sickle, to one of the maids who stood peeling a persimmon. "Just go to the door, O-Tsugi, and look at the weather. What a horrible, dark night it is!"

O-Tsugi shuddered at the thought.

"That reminds me," she said "A short time ago I took an andon to the Mistress in her room. And when I entered, Madam looked at me with her scared wan face and asked me to stay with her. You can easily imagine how frightened I was! 'Yes Madam,' I said, 'as soon as my work is finished.' And with that I slipped out of the room. O-Chiki, you might go and see her."

"I?" said O-Chiki, "Never! The old master and the young master both away, and no one in that lonesome chamber but Madam! Mr. Satoru is in the house, it is true; but he is fast asleep,—and in this gale too!—He's not a bit like his brothers, not like Mr. Takeru, nor like Mr. Shigeru,—peace to his soul! Dear, how the time does fly: It's a week to day since he died, isn't it?"

"Aye, aye!" said one, "Namu Amida Butsu! Peace be with him!"

"He is indeed much to be pitied," interrupted an old servant who was busy beating out some rice straw. "But I think Miss Kiku needs our commiseration even more, does she not?"

"Yes indeed. I heard Jimbei say that the poor girl has been off her head ever since she heard the news, and that yesterday she all but succeeded in cutting her throat. Her mother has to watch her day and night."

"I can quite believe you. Poor Shigeru! It was like a return from the dead when he came back safe from the war. . . . and then. . . . Well, well, Master Takeru's a hard-hearted man! But hark! The wind has died away. No:—there it is, blowing again."

CHAPTER X.

Heaven and Earth seemed to have calmed themselves to a breathless silence. A moment later, the pent up forces broke forth in a terrible hurricane, shaking the creaking house and hurling gravel and sand against doors and windows. There was an ominous clatter of falling tiles, and the old camphor tree moaned and groaned as though the Day of Judgment were fast approaching.

In the midst of the chamber stood a solitary andon, whose flame flickered and quivered in the wind that came howling in through the cracks in doors and windows. Madame Ueda sat sewing by the fitful light. She paused in her work to listen, trimmed the wick of the andon, so as to get more light, and then, suddenly rising threw open the fusuma that led in the next room:—Then having looked round the room, she closed the fusuma again and resumed her work.

A few minutes later she shouted, "Tsugi! Tsugi! Are you there, Satoru?"

But the wind effectually prevented her voice from passing out of the room. Nobody came in answer to her summons, only the doors creaked more than ever.

"What is it? What a terrible storm! Who's that outside the fusuma? Is it you, Tsugi?"

She shivered as she spoke the last words. Then she rose, yard-measure in hand, opened the fusuma again, but shut them at once, picked up the wick of the andon, and was about to resume her seat when her eye suddenly fell on a dark spot on the white paper that covered it, she looked at it almost mechanically. Then she put out her finger and touched it. "Yes, yes," she said in a reassured tone, "it's a spot of oil. I had quite forgotten that the paper had been renewed. How could I have thought that it was blood? But what a poor light it is!"

She trimmed the wick for a third time.

"Why, who is there? Who is it? Who is laughing it me? Tsugi, Tsugi! Satoru! Somebody, I say, come quickly."

She tried to speak loud, but her lips moved in vain. No one came to her, and her terror became so great, that her eyes grew dim, as she fell prostrate before the andon. She had no strength left her to stand or to sit.

"Who's that over the andon? Is it you, Tsugi? Or, Satoru? Why, it's Shigeru. Shigeru! Shigeru! please forgive me, Shigeru."

She rose from her seat and wondered helplessly around the andon.

"I did wrong, Shigeru! I did wrong! Please forgive me, and don't look at me with that dreadfully stern eye. What is it you say? 'Mother you too?' Yes, you do well to reproach me. I did wrong. It is all my fault. How poor the light is! Ah! Shigeru is pursuing me. Help! Help!"

Mad with terror, she ran hither and thither about the dimly lighted room. Suddenly the long sleeve of her dress caught the andon and overset it. The flame caught the paper of the andon, the blazing andon set fire to the shoji, and in a moment the whole room was one blaze of light.

"How beautiful!" exclaimed the demented woman, as she gazed on the scene. "Shigeru, Shigeru," she cried, clapping her poor hands, "you will forgive me now. What! you too, Mother?" do you say? Please don't say that again. Forgive me, Shigeru, and be once more the dear old boy you were when you sucked at my breasts. Why, how bright the light is! Shigeru, let us make a bonfire."

With these last fateful words, the poor woman began throwing cloth, thread, paper, everything that came to her hands, into the fire. And as each thing caught fire and blazed, she clapped her hands for joy. The wind came rushing through the cracks in the shutters and fanned the flames to fury. Mats, fusuma, and ceiling, were smoking, crackling and blazing.

CHAPTER XI.

Just at that moment a man came galloping up to the house at full speed.

Urgent business had sent Takeru homewards that afternoon from the hot spring where he was staying with his father. The storm had delayed him, and when he was still about four ri from home the night fell black and hopeless, and the wind rose with unparalleled fury. He could not light a lantern, but he knew the road very well, and he spurred on his horse. Quite by chance he looked in the direction of the village and noticed a glare of light coming over the mountain.

"What's that glare?" he asked of a man who came out of a shed by the roadside.

"It looks rather like a fire," said the man, "but I am an old man, Sir, and my eyes are dim. I cannot be sure."

"A fire?" murmured Takeru, and for the next half mile he rode with his eyes fixed on the top of the hill, over which the glare became more and more distinct.

"Yes!" he said presently. "It's a fire, sure enough. What careless wretch, I wonder, has let his house catch fire on such a stormy night as this?"

Presently he rounded the foot of the hill, and came to a village. Here the flames were quite clearly to be seen, and two or three villagers were standing in the road watching the blaze.

"A fire in this terrible gale," said one.

"It will do a lot of damage" said another.

"I can see the pine-tree by the Inari Shrine on the right of the flames, so the fire must be at—"

Takeru heard this fragmentary conversation as he passed the group. He rode quickly on for another mile until he came to the bamboo grove through which the lane passes, and which was waving in the gale like a surf beating against the rocks. The fire was not far off now, for the flames could be seen through the bamboo stems, and the voices of people crying for help mingled itself with the storm. He sped rapidly out of the grove, and in another moment the truth flashed upon his mind. "Good gracious! (Ya shimatta!)" he exclaimed. And at the same moment he heard the voices of people running along the lane. "Help! Help!" they said. "The Ueda homestead is on fire."

CHAPTER XII.

"Heavens!" cried Takeru, as he set his teeth and spurred on his steed. He was now within half a mile of the homestead. The lane was as bright as though lighted by torches, and the red ball of the conflagration could be seen quite distinctly against the sky.

"Heavens!" he exclaimed again, and slackened his speed. He could feel the heat of the flames on his face, and the sizzling sparks fell on his hand and the horse's mane. But he heeded them not.

"Good heavens!" He was now within a few hundreds yards of the mansion. The godowns and barns were just bursting into flame: the residence was not yet quite burned out, and the glowing pillars stood like columns of coral or gold in the midst of the purple blue sea of flames. Fiery flowers were hovering about in the air, and golden showers were falling. The whole scene was like the interior of a smelting furnace. The five godowns were enveloped in the roaring flames, through which the black tiles could be seen every now and again. In the lulls between the blasts, the flame rose in separate columns from each one of the five godowns, but when the wind rose again, the five columns merged into one, and shot out with a great roar till they reached the bamboo-grove the tips of which crackled like pistol shots as they caught fire. Then the fire seized the old camphor tree, with its dry leaves and dead limbs, and presently the great aged trunk stood enveloped in flames like some great serpent, emitting camphor-oil and a sweet fragrance.

"Room for Mr. Takeru," shouted the villagers as he made his way to the front.

"You idiots!" he exclaimed, without dismounting. "What are you gaping at? Why don't you do something? Why don't you try to put the fire out?" His face was flushed with excitement, anger, and fatigue, and he glared on them like a red demon. "But, Master," said one. "In this gale we can't get near the flames."

"What dreadful flames! The whole house has gone." Everybody was talking at once.

"But what's the use of talking?" cried Takeru wildly. "Why don't you try to put out the fire? where are the 'fire pumps'?"

"Fire pumps are of no use in this wind, Sir," replied one of the men. "It is quite useless trying to put out the fire, one can't get anywhere near the place," exclaimed a second. "You had better go and put it out yourself" exclaimed a third.

"You rascals!" cried Takeru, mad with rage. Just then a tall stout youth came running up. "Takeru," he cried, "we've been burnt out." "I see it, you fool," cried Takeru. "How came you, Satoru, to let the house catch fire?"

"I don't know," replied Satoru, "It was none of my doing."

"You don't know?" said Takeru scornfully. "What have you done with the furniture?"

"I got mother out" said Satoru, "and have put her into a place of safety."

"But what have you done with the furniture, and the documents?"

"There was no time to bother about them."

"Do you mean to say that they are all burnt?"

"Everything's gone. We had the greatest difficulty in getting everybody out of the house."

"You idiots!"

"Takeru dismounted as he spoke, and walked towards the burning buildings. At that moment the pillars of the house fell with a crash, and a shower of sparks and ashes drove him back again.

"It's all gone," he said. And all the people echoed his words.

"The homestead has gone! The godowns! The barns!"

And then some one added: "It is the Judgment of Heaven on the house of Ueda."

CHAPTER XIII.

As Takeru stood, gazing helplessly at the ruins of his home, a man came working his way through the crowd till he stood by his side.

"It's all lost," he said.

Takeru turned on him an enquiring gaze. "Ah! it's you, is it, Junbei. Yes, all is lost for me."

"Yes, Sir, all is lost, and I fear beyond hope of recovery. You know that Sonobe's....."

"Sonobe's? Sonobe's what?"

"Sonobe's daughter....."

"What of her?"

"She hanged herself this evening by Shigeru's grave."

"What, Kiku?"

Just then the villagers raised voices of warning. "Look out!" they cried, "The camphor-tree." Takeru had barely time to spring out of the way when the camphor-tree, which had been burning at its base, swayed before a great gust of wind and fell into the fire with a tremendous crash. Innumerable sparks flew up into the air, to fall again presently in showers of hot gold.

"Ashes, ashes!" cried the people. "The whole homestead has turned to ashes."

CHAPTER XIV.

Yes? In a single night the ancient mansion of the Ueda family, with its costly art treasures and its precious deeds and documents, had been reduced to ashes.

The old father was so shocked by the news that he died of apoplexy the next day. Takeru was much distressed (as well he might be) by the ill-will of his neighbours' tongues. He removed to Nakatsu, from whence, after selling all his property, he removed to Tokyo, and disappeared from the ken of his Kyūshū neighbours. Satoru and his poor mother were taken to the house of a relative, and there protected and sheltered.

O-Kiku's remains were buried by her mother and step father in the same grave with those of her lover. The villagers call the place Hiyoku-tsuka, "the lover's mound," and the grave is never suffered to be without its seasonable tribute of flowers. There is a feeling abroad that a curse hangs over the site of the Ueda homestead. No one has ventured to build on it since that day. It is a place of rank weeds and grasses, and the charred stump of the old camphor tree stands in the midst of it like a deserted tombstone.

LOCAL NEWS.

A Kamakura despatch says that Viscount Sone is said to be in a critical condition. He has developed dropsy and is sinking rapidly.

At the instance of hotel proprietors at Enoshima, the fireworks display and toronagashi will be held every Saturday evening this month, commencing on 13th instant.

The Yokohama Electric Light Company is reported to have decided to reduce charge on outdoor lamps from this month, while the cost of indoor lighting remains the same.

General Nogi who has been suffering from ear disease, was taken on Tuesday to the Red Cross Hospital at Shibuya, Tokyo. His condition, however, is reported to be not serious.

The news of the eruption of Usu-dake having reached the Imperial ears, Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress seemed greatly solicitous for the people in the district. They will shortly make some monetary donation towards the relief fund for the sufferers.

The summer fête at Ryogoku was held on the 6th instant when fireworks were displayed as usual, and the entertainment lasted till late in the evening. Although the weather was not so favourable as desired for the occasion, there were immense crowds of visitors on land and water.

Major Hawthorne, military attaché to the U.S. Embassy, has been bereaved of his beloved wife, who passed away on the 3rd inst. at Karuizawa. The funeral service took place on the 5th inst. at Christ Church, Yokohama. Major Hawthorne will take the remains to the United States for interment.

With a view to constructing a tunnel through one of the hills located between Moto machi and Kitagata-machi of this city, the Kyūzaka Inarizaka, and Daikan-zaka have been surveyed. As the result Daikan-zaka was found to be the most convenient. The cost of construction is estimated at 150,000 yen. Those persons interested in the matter are at present canvassing for raising half the amount by means of contributions by the citizens, while the balance is to be provided by the municipality.

General Nogi, Director of the Peers' School, who was taken ill on the 2nd inst. at Katase while swimming off the beach with some students, is undergoing home treatment at his private residence in Tokyo. Prince Fushimi Hiroyoshi, one of the students of the School, paid the General a visit on the 5th instant to inquire after his health.

At 1.50 p.m. on Tuesday fire broke out in an unoccupied foreign-built house, No. 43-B, Yamate-cho, Yokohama. Through the efforts of the Bluff Police Brigade, however, the flames were extinguished before they took firm hold of the building. Mr. Woodruff, of No. 29 Bluff, is the agent for the house, which is the property of Mr. M. Russell. Incendiarism is suspected.

Yokohama foreign firms dealing in the import of fertilizers are reported to be presenting a complaint to the Board of Trade regarding the unlawfulness of the Customs levying a light duty on some kinds of fertilizer. The Yokohama Customs authorities, it is stated, levy 30 per cent. duty on a certain fertilizer on the ground that the same is to be dealt with according to Art 59 of the Customs Regulations.

Owing to railway accidents caused by the recent heavy rain, the transportation of raw-silk from inland districts to Yokohama has been suspended. Moreover, it is anticipated that the results of silkworm rearing both in the summer and autumn will prove bad. The quotation of raw silk sold on time has suddenly advanced by 1.50 yen. The tea market is also much affected by non-arrival of inland goods.

Some days ago the Kanagawa Prefectural Assembly adopted the measure for the construction of the Hakone road. But in reality there still exists a disagreement between the members representing the cities and those of the counties, in connection with respective burdens of expenditure. In consequence it is reported that the Assembly shall have another meeting before any final settlement can be reached.

According to the report of the meteorological station of this prefecture, the temperature during the doyo season this year was 0.6 degrees lower, on an average than a normal year. The thermometer registered 33.3 C. degrees on the first day of the season, which was the highest temperature during the period. There has been so much rain that the total precipitation amounted to 280 mm, and the rainfall on the 8th August was measured as 91.5 mm.

The Korean Crown Prince who has been on a tour of inspection through the Sanyo and San-in districts, returned to Tokyo on the 6th instant. The Young Prince was received at Shinbashi Station by Vicount Watanabe, Minister of the Imperial Household, and many other distinguished persons, among whom were representatives of the Prince Imperial and other Princes of the Blood. His Highness immediately drove to the Torijizaka Palace. It is reported that the Korean Crown Prince will visit Nikko in a few days to meet the Prince Imperial staying there.

During last month the gathering of inland goods at Yokohama Station amounted to 17,892 tons which shows an increase of 1,853 tons as compared with the corresponding month of last year, while in the dispersion there were 19,159 tons, the freight of which amounted to 41,707 yen, showing a decrease of 11,412 yen as compared with last year. The chief causes of this decrease, it is stated, were that the import of foreign rice has been reduced on account of good harvests in the north eastern provinces and that there was no iron pipe transported to the Hoku-district.

THE PROGRESS OF JAPAN.

Under the above heading The Times of 18 ult. contains a leading article dealing with its special Supplement on Japan:—

We publish to-day, in response to the fresh interest in Japanese affairs aroused by this year's Exhibition at Shepherd's Bush, a large number of additional pages dealing on the one hand with the history, life, and art, and on the other with the commercial and industrial development, of modern Japan. The dramatic appearance of Japan among the great nations has kindled the admiration and won the sympathetic respect of men of every race. Nowhere have the achievements of the Meiji era been watched with more attention or approbation than in Great Britain. Though America first broke down the barriers, it was Great Britain, more than any other nation, that in the end helped and encouraged the regeneration of Japan. The intimate relations between the two countries began at a time when Japan seemed still struggling with adversity. The community of interest, which was presently to ripen into a firm Alliance, found expression at a period when Japan's prowess was unrevealed, and her prosperous future unforeseen. We are, however, far too prone in England nowadays to allow our minds to revert to the glittering spectacle of Japan militant and victorious. We fail fully to realize that, though the national genius of Japan has found successful expression in war, it is chiefly and honourably desirous of winning world-wide recognition in the domain of peace. To correct that tendency in Western thought is the principal object of this special edition. It tells, it is true, of the growth of a formidable fleet, and of an army reputed to be twice as strong as in 1904; but it tells far more of a wonderful development in education, industrial enterprise, in commerce and finance, in statesmanship and the art of good government, and in all those interests which go to the making of a strong but pacific nation. The story, as set forth in these pages, will repay careful study. It describes the wise adaptation of Western thought and science to Oriental needs, the swift abolition of an obsolete feudal system, the creation of constitutional methods of control, the birth of great cities and seaports, the building of railways and steamships, and the successful administration of conquered and backward territories. It shows, too, that these things are being accomplished without the sacrifice of much that was worthy of preservation in the art and the family life and the national spirit of medieval Japan. It has failed in its intention if it does not convey a vivid impression that the triumphs of Japan have not been won on the battlefield alone, and that her purpose is neither aggressive nor reactionary.

The makers of modern Japan are fast passing away, but among the few who are left none bears a more honoured name than COUNT OKUMA. The letter which he has addressed to us is a frank revelation of the spirit in which the Empire was regenerated, and it is not less forcible because it discloses that in the evening of his days COUNT OKUMA is sometimes assailed by doubts about the solidity of Japanese progress. Such moments of hesitation come to every man when his life's work approaches completion and the buoyant confidence of youth has faded; but the sum of human endeavour will generally bear the test of re-examination. The review of the relations between Great Britain and Japan has both an historical and a present interest. It shows that the Alliance has the unqualified support of both the great political parties of Great Britain, and it deals separately with the relations between Japan and the Oversea Dominions. The series of articles by our Tokyo Correspondent has a special importance and value. No living Englishman, except perhaps SIR ERNEST SATOW, is better acquainted with the modern history of Japan; and even SIR ERNEST SATOW has not enjoyed the continuous and intimate familiarity with the march of events which has fallen to the lot of our Correspondent. He has seen, and at times participated in, the whole process of the remaking of the nation. He sketches the character and daily life of the EMPEROR with a sure pen; describes the peculiar evolution of Parliamentary institutions, with their present partial effacement, hardly understood in England; discusses the Elder Statesmen and the new generation of administrators from the standpoint of one who has lived and worked among them; and writes of Japanese economics with precise knowledge. His reminiscences of the late PRINCE ITO are drawn from the memories of a friendship of forty years; and his article upon Japanese arts and crafts carries with it all the weight that attaches to the views of a recognized and undisputed authority. The article by LORD REDESDALE upon "Old Japan" will be found equally engrossing. LORD REDESDALE, too, can carry his memory back to the days of chain-armour and two-handed swords and SIR HARRY PARKES; he saw the downfall of the Shogunate, and held midnight conferences with the revolutionaries; he knew ITO when he was a wild and merry adventurer, and KIDO, whom he esteemed the greatest of the men of new era. No page of fiction is more romantic than the stories of these early years.

This special edition, however, is concerned even more with the present and future than with the past. No section of it, in our belief, has more immediate significance than the careful and detailed explanation by our Special Correspondent of the industrial conditions of Japan. It is based, not only upon elaborate recent inquiries, and upon comparisons with the knowledge gained in an earlier visit, but still more upon the experience of a lifetime largely passed in industrial investigations in many lands. The conclusions expressed are not altogether reassuring, and our Correspondent makes it clear that the industrial problem presses for early consideration. The section devoted to the cities and ports of Japan, also largely from the pen of our Special Correspondent, will be a revelation of steady and ordered development to those untravelled persons to whom Japan still only suggests thoughts of geishas and cherry-blossoms. Even more informing to such persons will be the contribution from BARON KIKUCHI, the learned President of the Imperial Tokyo University, who writes upon Japanese education with the advantage of unrivalled knowledge, and the account of religion in Japan, by the REV. ARTHUR LLOYD, which may be specially commended to attention as one of the most thoughtful and suggestive studies yet published of the inner life of the Japanese people to-day. The estimate of Japanese character by "A 43-Years Resident in Japan" presents a new and attractive portraiture of certain Japanese traits not always visible to the ordinary traveller. Its key will be found in the statement that to understand fully the Japanese character a knowledge of the language is essential, and it takes ten years to acquire it. We trust that the article by our Special Correspondent upon the Trans-Siberian Railway will have the effect it is intended to produce. England still thinks of the Far East as remote, and does not realize that in point of duration of journey Peking is as near as Bombay and Yokohama hardly further than Calcutta. Even so, wide travel is not possible for all; but all can read, and to read of a country is to travel in it in another way. In those alike who have visited it and those who have not, we trust that this edition may foster a closer and more understanding appreciation of the life and the growth, the problems and the prospects, of modern Japan.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE PACIFIC MAIL AND ITS PASSENGERS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Frequent paragraphs, the last few days, about the relations of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha and the Pacific Mail Company have interested the public, and it may be in order to call attention to a point in which the public will expect better treatment in future, and if this matter comes to the attention of Mr. Schwerin, it is to be hoped that he will see to it that we do not have to wait until the severance of relations between the two companies before the accommodation is furnished.

It has long been the policy of the Pacific Mail Company to give very little authority to its Japan agencies outside of Yokohama, in the matter of assigning rooms to applicants in advance of the actual advent of the particular steamer, for which application is made. One applies to the Kobe or Nagasaki agencies, and finds he must wait till his application has been acted upon by Yokohama; often the room and berth desired are refused, and no choice is offered of several possibilities, but a berth is assigned. If this is unsatisfactory, as it is very likely to be, you must submit to another delay for reference to Yokohama, and often end with the feeling that you have been arbitrarily dealt with. Why shouldn't a certain number of cabins be assigned to each agency in Japan, so that we may have an immediate choice when we apply for passage? Or, at the very least, why should not Yokohama send down a statement each time, when an agency applies for passage, of all cabins and berths not actually engaged, and give the public the privilege of choice out of all available possibilities? There is a feeling that the Pacific Mail Company has not been generous and obliging to the public at this point, and it is to be hoped that a radical change will be made. The Toyo Kisen Kaisha has been using the Pacific Mail Company's agencies, so that the same objectionable system has been applied to the Japanese boats. It is desirable that the Japanese line should inaugurate a more accommodating policy at Kobe and Nagasaki.

TRAVELLER.

"THE UNITY OF THE UNIVERSE."

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In your excellent review of Mr. Cosand's book, entitled, "The Unity of the Universe," you spoke of it as "A remarkable theory, succinctly and scientifically expressed." By a careful reading of the book I find that the author makes the theory of the electromagnetic constitution of matter the fundamental basis of his reasoning.

Hitherto, many scientists have been in doubt whether matter flows in the electric current or whether the energy is transmitted by means of waves only, and this doubt has been even stronger as relates to the transmission of energy along the magnetic lines of force, which are transverse to the electric current, the prevailing opinion being against the view that matter is conveyed along the lines of force; but Mr. Cosand, through observation of natural phenomena, boldly asserts, without further experimental evidence, that matter is transmitted not only in the electric current but also along the magnetic lines of force, the electromagnetic system being similar to that of the cyclone and its anti-cyclonic field.

It is a singular circumstance that so soon after the publication of "The Unity of the Universe" experimental evidence which largely proves the author's theory, and of which he certainly did not know hitherto, should be forthcoming. The "Scientific American" of July 2, 1910, page 5, says, "A very interesting research has been carried on at the University of Kieff by Prof. Kossogonoff, who has employed the ultramicroscope for the examination of liquids during electrolysis. The beam of light converged upon the liquid had previously traversed a solution of ammonium chloride, which absorbed much of the heat-producing rays. When the liquid was examined through the microscope, with the electric circuit broken, scattered bright points were seen, which in almost all cases, exhibited the peculiar Brownian motion. In a solution of copper, in which the current passed between copper electrodes, these bright points were seen to move in the direction of the electric current. When the current was reversed in an electrolyte, the direction of motion of the bright points was reversed also. When the current was allowed to flow for a few seconds, the number of bright particles between the electrodes increased. The appearance of these particles at first suggested the idea that they were particles of dust, but it was proved by many experiments, that they are something very different. On careful examination, similar particles were observed to accumulate at the cathode, where they formed fine arborescent crystals, which must be regarded as products of electrolysis. The strongest argument, however, against the dust hypothesis is furnished by the fact that the particles do not disappear gradually, as would be the case with dust, but that, on the contrary, they steadily increase in number during the flow of the current. When the liquid is placed in a magnetic field the lines of force of which are perpendicular to direction of the current, the paths of the moving particles are altered in accordance with Ampere's law." That is, if one stands facing the direction in which a current is flowing, these particles move in circles around the current towards one's right—clockwise; but if the current is reversed so as to flow towards one the particles move around it in the opposite direction—towards one's left, anti-clockwise. "Hence, it is inferred that these bright points bear some close relation to the flow of electricity and that they are probably the carriers of electricity, i.e., the ions. This view is confirmed by discovery that the velocity of the bright points is approximately equal to the velocities of ions, as measured by Kohlrausch."

The above discovery by Prof. Kosogonoff is likely, I think, to be of great value to the scientific world, and Mr. Cosand is exceedingly fortunate in that the discovery establishes the underlying principles of his book almost beyond controversy.

I am sir, yours truly,
Karuizawa, August 5, 1910.

CHINA AND TIBET.

The Temps discussing the situation in Tibet says that China is pursuing a policy which is to all appearances disguised, a protectorate being still the object of Imperialist ambitions. It adds that Imperialism is Chinese, and that it is doubtful whether or not it is too late to avert consequences which will be disagreeable to neighbouring powers.

U.S. VICE-PRESIDENT ACCUSED OF FRAUD.

SCANDAL IN CONNECTION WITH LAND DEALS.

At the Congressional inquiry regarding the sale of Indian lands in Oklahoma, Congressman Gore and Senator Creagher testified that they were offered bribes by prominent Republicans not to oppose the thirty million dollar land deal, from which the promoters were to get 10 per cent. They named certain Senators and Congressmen, also Vice-President Sherman as being interested in the deal. Sherman denies the statement.

THE MANCHURIAN QUESTION.

"THE TIMES" ON THE RUSSO JAPANESE CONVENTION.

London, August 7.

The Times, in a leading article, urges that, although the Russo-Japanese agreement must be welcomed as tending to the preservation of peace, the position in Manchuria is still obscure in some respects. It would be a great satisfaction to learn definitely the whole of the conditions under which Japanese and Russian control of the railways is to be exercised in future. The lack of such statement is the sole cause of the fears which have been occasionally expressed for the interests of third parties. Moreover the persons interested in the Chinchow-Aigun railway are entitled to be told how it infringes the Russo-Japanese rights. The same mistiness applies to the Canton, Hankow and Szechuan railways, regarding which China remains reluctant to carry out her undertakings.

THE NEW AND OLD CHINESE MINISTERS.

The Kaiser has received in farewell audience General Yinchang, the former Chinese Minister at Berlin, and also in introductory audience the new Minister Liancheng. The former has been honoured by the Kaiser with the First Class Order of the Red Eagle.

HOLLAND.

Heinrich, Prince Consort of the Queen of Netherlands, has met with a bicycle accident, by which he broke his collar-bone.

The Berliner Tageblatt reports from Holland that General van Daalen has been appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Army in Netherlands India.

The Tribuna announces that King Manuel of Portugal will pay a visit to Rome next Spring.

Berlin, August 5.

The fracture of the collar bone of the Netherlands Prince Consort, the result, as reported yesterday, of a bicycle accident, causes no anxiety, as it has been set and is taking a normal course.

Mr. Lu Cheng-hsiang, the Chinese Minister at The Hague, has gone on furlough. The affairs of the Legation have been taken over by Mr. Tang Tsaifu, the First Secretary of Chinese Legation at Paris.

THE CHINESE MINISTERS.

General Yinchang has further been honoured by the Kaiser with a portrait, bearing the Kaiser's own autograph. The new Minister Liancheng has been received in a very cordial manner.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE CONGRESS.

The International Peace Congress at Stockholm has declared its sympathy with the new Russo-Japanese Convention, but regrets the treatment which Finland has to undergo at the hands of Russia.

PERSIA.

Berlin, August 6.

The Persian hostile parties have come to an agreement with regard to any danger threatening Persia from foreign countries. Full tranquillity is prevailing at Teheran.

THE CROWN PRINCE'S TOUR.

It has been officially announced that the German Crown Prince will start on his visit to the Far East in November and that he will also touch India on his way out.

The rumours, which have been spread and according to which a change of the German Minister at Peking was reported to be imminent, are officially contradicted.

Berlin, August 7.

The Kaiser and Kaiserin, after a short visit to Hannover will take their usual summer holiday at the Chateau of Wilhelmshoehe, near Cassel.

STRIKES IN SHIPYARDS.

A strike of workmen has broken out in all shipyards of Hamburg, the reason being the refusal of an increase of wages. All shipyards have planned extensive restrictions of work.

An old lighthouse at Pakefield, Suffolk, has recently been moved back about 100 yards owing to the erosion of the coast at this point. The framing and outside covering are of iron, while inside there are brick divisional walls and plaster ceilings. The complete building, which weighs 60 to 70 tons, was moved bodily upon a cradle constructed for moving Lowestoft Low Light, the haulage being effected by a crab.

RECENT investigation has shown that Korea instead of being the undeveloped country that it now is, could become a valuable addition to Eastern Fields of Supply. The great tracts of wild land in the north are well suited for the cultivation of sugar, while southern Korea is adapted to the growth of a staple much needed in this part of the world, namely cotton. This latter industry has already been developed to a certain extent.

DR. TSUMAGI, of the Financial Department, in an interview regarding the harbour work at Fusan says that a great effort is being made by the authorities, and that the work should be completed by the end of next year. When the work is completed as planned, two ships will be able to anchor alongside the steel pier, and the depth of water in the harbour will be four fathoms at ebb-tide. A number of warehouses are to be constructed, and the pier is to be connected with the railway station.

When this work is completed it is a question whether Fusan will not deprive Chemulpo of a considerable amount of freight which now goes through the latter port.

THE official full speed trial of Torpedo Boat Destroyer Sergipe built for the Brazilian Government by Messrs. Yarrow & Co., Ltd., of Glasgow, took place on Friday the eighth of July on the Skelmorlie deep water measured mile at the mouth of the Clyde, and the contract speed of 27 knots carrying a load of 100 tons was easily exceeded. The actual speed obtained was 27.676 knots on the mile and 26.605 knots during a continuous run of 3 hours duration. The Sergipe is the last of the ten Destroyers ordered by the Brazilian Government from Messrs. Yarrow. The dimensions of the Brazilian Destroyers are:—Length 240 feet: Beam 25 feet 6 inches. They are propelled by two sets of four cylinder reciprocating engines 8,000 horse power collectively.

THE hottest period of the summer having passed, the so-called Risshu (the beginning of the autumn) on the 8th inst. According to a report of the Central Meteorological Observatory, there will be no great change in atmospheric pressure for a few days hence, a depression being felt in the south-east of Formosa and a high-pressure area to the east of Chishima. It is expected that there will be some rain in the southern districts of Shikoku and Kyushu and along the coasts of the Tokaido; while in the Sanyo and Sanin districts it will be cloudy in general. Easterly winds are expected in the north-eastern part of the Main Island and in the Hokkaido, with rain in most districts. In the provinces east of Osaka and Kyoto, thunderstorms may arise and cool weather will continue for the present.

THE INDUSTRIAL BANK OF JAPAN LIMITED.

SEVENTEENTH REPORT PRESENTED AT THE HALF YEARLY GENERAL MEETING.

The following report was presented to the Shareholders of the above bank at the half yearly general meeting held at the Head Office, Tokyo, on the 3rd inst.

GENTLEMEN:—The president has now to submit to you the Balance-Sheet and Profit and Loss Account of the Bank for this half year ended 30th June, 1910.

The net Profits for the period, including yen 67,604.157, balance brought forward from last account, after making necessary payments and deductions, amount to yen 921,630.527.

Out of the net profits, yen 110,000 was transferred to the Reserve Against Losses, and yen 20,000 to the Dividend Equalization Reserve. After making these transfers, I recommend the payment of yen 406,250 as a First Dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. The amount now available is yen 385,380.527 out of which yen 25,000 will be appropriated for remuneration of the officers, and of yen 243,753 will be paid as a second dividend at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, besides yen 50,000 being transferred to the Special Reserve. Balance yen 66,630.527 is to be carried forward.

CUTICURA CURED
NURSE'S ECZEMA

Small Spot of Humour Grew Gradually Larger—Suffered Great Pain for Two Years—Doctors Could Not Help Dreadful Eruption.

SAYS CUTICURA EFFECTED
"MOST WONDERFUL CURE"

"I suffered great pain on my leg and arm more or less for two years. It appeared in a small spot, gradually getting larger. Then I saw a doctor but did not derive any benefit. After that I went to another with the same result, still suffering. Then I tried Cuticura Ointment which I washed off with a strong lather of Cuticura Soap. In a few weeks it gradually disappeared and at present there is not the least sign of that dreadful eruption, eczema. Many of my patients as well as myself consider it a most wonderful cure, especially after suffering as much pain—also spending money. Nurse Warren, 23, Roslyn Rd., Redland, Bristol, England, Aug. 22, '09."

SKIN PURITY

Is Best Promoted by Cuticura Soap and Ointment.

The use of Cuticura Soap, assisted when necessary by Cuticura Ointment, not only preserves, purifies and beautifies the skin, scalp, hair and hands of infants, children and adults, but tends to prevent clogging of the pores, the common cause of pimples, blackheads, inflammation, irritation, redness and roughness, and other unsightly and annoying conditions. In the treatment of eczema, rashes and other skin affections that torture, disfigure, itch, burn and scale, Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment are unrivaled.

Cuticura is the most economical treatment known for affections of the skin and scalp. A single tablet of Cuticura Soap and box of Cuticura Ointment are often sufficient to cure. Sold throughout the world. Depots: London, 27, Charterhouse Sq.; Paris, 10, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin; Australia, R. Towns & Co., Sydney; India, B. K. Paul, Calcutta; So. Africa, Lennox, Ltd., Cape Town, etc.; U. S. A., Potter Drug & Chem. Corp., Sole Props., Boston.

HABUTAE.

Fukui:—Prices all round have declined. Business, especially for America, has been exceptionally dull. Kanazawa:—There has been some decline in prices owing to the slackness of business. Kawamata:—In these goods also a general decline has been experienced as a result of slackness of business. The general tendency of the market is weak.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, AUG. 20TH, 1910.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

It was announced in Wednesday's Official Gazette that a government shrine called the Karafuto Jinsha has been established at Toyohara-cho, Karafuto.

A JOSHIN cable to the Asahi states that cold weather was experienced in North Korea and people have been obliged to put on their winter clothes. On some of the mountains snow has fallen.

A FUSAN telegram says that dysentery and typhoid fever are widely spreading, and that leading citizens held a conference on the 12th instant to discuss the means of preventing the epidemics.

CAPTAIN SHOJI wires to the Naval Department that the cruiser Koma left Portsmouth at p.m. on the 10th instant for Plymouth. The vessel is expected to lie at anchor in Brest harbour until the 16th.

At 9.59 p.m. on the 13th instant a slight earthquake shock was felt in Yokohama, lasting two minutes and seven seconds. The oscillations were principally in a south-easterly and north-westerly direction.

THE number of soldiers who have been killed in the operations against the Formosan aborigines is said to have reached one hundred and sixty. The authorities are thinking of giving special honour to the memory of the dead.

THE Osaka Shosen Kaisha and the Russian Volunteer Fleet Agency have concluded an agreement with regard to freight between Tsuruga and Vladivostock, which was signed a few days ago. The conventional rates will be carried into effect on and after the 22nd instant, and are 20 to 30 per cent. higher than previous competitive rates.

THIRTY students of the Waseda University are reported to have arrived at Shanghai on the 13th inst. After staying for three days, the party will visit the Nanking Exhibition, and is expected to return to Shanghai again via Suchow on the 19th inst.

A SEOUL despatch reports that the 14th of August being the memorial day of the establishment of the Korean Empire, the function of its celebration was held at the Imperial Palace as usual. The national flags were put up in the Korean streets.

LIEUT.-GENERAL TSUCHIYA, Commander of the Fourth Division, will shortly be placed on the retired list, being simultaneously promoted General. Lieut.-General Ando, Commander of the Tenth Division, will probably be appointed as his successor.

JULY 25 is reported to have been the hottest day in Chicago for nine years. The Weather Bureau thermometer on the street-level registered 102 degrees at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. The thermometer at the Government weather-station on the Federal building registered 97 degrees.

VARIOUS Japanese papers express the opinion that the crop has already been seriously impaired and that unless warm clear sunshiny days come soon the situation will become very serious.

This is all the more serious from the fact that practically the same situation prevails over a large portion of China.

IN accordance with the Chinese Bank Regulations small banks are prohibited from issuing banknotes. As the result the Great China Bank has decided to increase its capital from 8,500,000 to 18,500,000 taels, one half of which will be invested by the Government, the balance to be raised among the people.

A HANKOW telegram states that the indemnity of 110,000 taels for damages sustained by Japanese in Changsha in consequence of the recent riots, is to be delivered to the Yokohama Specie Bank on the 19th instant at Hankow by the Great Bank of China. The negotiations regarding damages to British and other foreign residents have not been closed.

FIVE NEGROES were killed and two others were mortally wounded at Elliott, Miss., on July 21st when the seven took issue with Deputy Sheriff Cauley, who was endeavoring to arrest them on a minor charge. As Cauley and two citizens approached the negroes ceased their work in the field and, grabbing pitchforks, made for the deputy. Cauley then opened fire with two revolvers.

QUEEN ALEXANDRA on the afternoon of the 28th inst. made her second public appearance in London since the funeral of the late King. Her Majesty drove from Buckingham Palace to Marlborough House, in order to give personal direction to the various arrangements to be made in order to prepare the royal residence for her occupation when the King and Queen have removed to Buckingham Palace.

ACCORDING to the investigation of the Residency-General, the number of foreign residents in Korea at the end of June was 13,381 in all. They are 11,533 Chinese, 490 Americans, 183 British, 89 French, 48 Germans, 21 Russians, 12 Greeks, 3 Italians, 7 Norwegians, one Belgian, and two Portuguese. Being classified according to their occupation, they are 99 officials, 453 missionaries, 3,757 merchants, 335 manufacturers, 989 agriculturists, 138 miners, one fisherman, and 6,611 of other occupations. The Chinese are largely merchants, manufacturers, and agriculturists, while of 136 miners, 104 are American. The missionaries are as follows:—306 Americans, 90 British, 50 Frenchmen, 3 Germans and 4 Russians.

PRINCE TSAI HSUN, the Chinese Naval Envoy to the United States, left Peking on Wednesday On his way to America. His Highness will visit incognito Nagasaki, Kobe, and Yokohama, but not have an audience with the Emperor until he comes to Tokyo on his way back. Captain Mori, Commanders Sakamoto and Masuda, and Mr. Asano, Master of Ceremonies, have been appointed to receive the Chinese Prince.

HIS MAJESTY the Emperor being extremely anxious regarding the disasters caused by the recent floods, it has been decided to despatch a chamberlain in a few days to the worst districts. His Highness the Prince Imperial, staying at Nikko, sent Chamberlain Arima on the 13th instant to the scene of disaster in Tochigi prefecture to inspect the condition of affairs. The officer returned to the Tomozawa Palace the next day.

A HONGKONG telegram says that in connection with the recent British demand for the withdrawal of the Chinese Emigration Inspector from Hongkong, in view of the absence of such treaty stipulation, the Viceroy of Kwantung has requested the Hongkong Government to permit the stationing of the Inspector, on the ground that it is necessary in controlling Chinese emigrants to Peru. It is rumoured that Viceroy Yuan of Kwantung will be dismissed.

On the 15th instant it was reported from the meteorological station that as there was no conspicuous depression felt in the neighbourhood of Japan, the weather would probably be calm for some days. But on the 16th slight low pressure areas extended to the north-west of Kyushu. Also a slight depression was felt in the district of Tokyo and Yokohama, which proceeded very slowly towards the south-east, so that there was some rainfall. Nothing serious is anticipated, however.

The Meteorological Station of this prefecture reports that the marked low temperature experienced on the 18th inst. in this district was due to the rising of atmospheric pressure felt in North China in contrast with the depression which occurred in the Okhotsk Sea.

WE take the following from the Manchuria Daily News of the 6th inst.—Mr. James Catto, Foreign Secretary, S.M.R. Co., who was in the Railway Hospital under treatment for a complication of various complaints expired peacefully at 1 a.m. this morning at the age of 9 years. A circle of his intimate friends was beside the death bed. The deceased entered the service of the Company in May last year as its first foreign secretary, and commanded by his ability, integrity and refinement the respect and affection of those who came in contact with him. His sister Miss Catto who happened to be with her relations in Yokohama is expected to arrive here by the Takeshima Maru to-morrow. His loss is a deprivation to the Manchuria Daily News, to which the deceased lent invaluable assistance ungrudgingly. We beg to join many friends of his in tendering our heartfelt condolences to the bereaved relations.

CHINA.

It appears to be recognized in Peking that a new situation has arisen in Mongolia as the result of the Russo-Japanese Convention, and that this new situation calls for some countervailing measures. Accordingly the Military Council held a meeting to discuss the matter, and arrived at the following decisions. Firstly, that, two new divisions of the Army must be organized for the defence of Mongolia; secondly, that a new educational system should be instituted without delay; and, thirdly, that a railway should be constructed as soon as possible, bringing this vast region into direct communication with the capital.

Possibly there may be some connection between this meeting in Peking and the report appearing in various papers to the effect that the Viceroy of Manchuria has just received instructions from the Central Government to devise such measures as he can for the strengthening of Chinese military power in the Three Provinces. The message somewhat cynically adds that, no matter what financial embarrassment the Viceroy may find himself in, as the result of this new departure, he is on no account to raise a foreign loan for the purpose. This certainly looks like a case of being asked to make bricks without straw.

According to telegrams received in Tokyo, the Viceroy of Manchuria has asked the Provincial Assemblies to take steps towards rendering possible the construction of the Chinchow-Aigun railway at China's own expense. The Waiwupu, however, has intervened with counsels of precaution. It is pointed out that the Chinchow Aigun railway is one in which various foreign Powers are more or less directly interested, and that the attention of the whole civilized world, practically speaking, is focussed on this question. The Assemblies therefore are admonished to approach the matter delicately and with due deliberation.

The Government of Hongkong is said to have addressed a protest to the Canton authorities on the score of the proposed establishment in Hongkong of a Chinese Emigration office, under the management of a Chinese official. The ground of the protest is that the existing treaties contain no clause which could be construed as permitting the establishment of such an office.

It is reported from Tsitsihar that the unfortunate Chinese who emigrated from Hupeh to the Amur region have thought better of their venture. They showed a disinclination to engage in farming, and the Chinese authorities resorted to pressure. This only had the effect of infuriating the people, and a mob of several score attacked the Governor's office, demanding that money to cover the expenses of their return to Hupeh should be given them without delay. The riot was however suppressed and several of the ring-leaders were taken into custody.

A curious story comes from Yinkow. It is said that the Chinese Government was about to levy a tax on the East Asia Tobacco Company trading at that port. Against this action the Japanese Consul protested; but, says the telegram, to no purpose, and the matter was then referred to Mukden for settlement.

If telegrams from Mukden are to be credited, the Hunghutz are showing renewed activity on a considerable scale. Bands of various strengths from 10 to a hundred have appeared in several parts of Manchuria, and reports of pillage and robbery at their hands are daily arriving. In not a few instances farmers have been ruthlessly murdered, and the whole countryside is in such a state of unrest that even a stroll in the outskirts of Mukden is attended with danger.

According to a special message from Peking to the Jiji Shimpō the members of the Central and Provincial Assemblies held a conference on the 11th. The following resolutions were adopted:—

1. All Provincial Assemblies shall take common action in political affairs.

2. By canvassing the members in the other provinces the movement shall be resumed with a view to the speedy opening of parliament. Occasion will be taken of the opening of the Central Assembly to establish a political party.

3. A committee of investigation shall be appointed to examine into the Russo-Japanese Convention, with a view to attacking the Government regarding the same. The local people will be encouraged to frame opinions about current affairs.

The leader of this movement is Mr. Liu Koso, Vice-President of the Provincial Assembly in Fokien. The United Assemblies propose without delay to publish a newspaper, to be called the Kokumin-koho, as their official organ.

An unsettled feeling is said to pervade political circles in Peking. Apparently, for once, the origin of this uneasiness is from within rather than from without. One Minister of State, the Grand Councillor, is alleged to have been taken seriously ill; and another, the Minister of Communications, shows signs of discontent with his position. It is rumoured that the latter is on the eve of being transferred to one of the remoter provinces; and the rumour derives additional weight from the announcement, on the part of the Minister himself, that he intends to be absent from his Department for the space of 5 days. Moreover the arrival of the Vice-Minister in the Capital, at the present juncture, is not unnaturally looked upon as significant in the extreme.

The idea of a Central Assembly seems to be taking practical shape. On the 12th instant the first formal meeting of the combined Provincial Assemblies was held, and a Committee consisting of President, Vice-President and nine members was elected. It is understood that this body will hold several meetings for the purpose of discussing the measures to be presented to the Central Assembly which, according to one report, is to commence operations on October 3rd. Another duty assigned to the Committee will be that of finding matters whose scope and interest shall be common to all the Provincial Assemblies, so as to foster a spirit of unity. In the formal meeting above mentioned, however, no more than twelve of the Provinces were represented.

In this context it may be added that instructions have been sent to the heads of the various Provinces to furnish financial reports and be prepared to submit them to the Central Assembly at its opening meeting. Some of these reports, it appears, have already been sent in, and each of them, curiously enough, shows a deficit of about a million taels. When to these are added the deficits of the Army and Navy Departments, the total shortage is estimated to reach as much as 35,000,000 taels. In these circumstances it is generally anticipated that the first care of the Central Assembly will be the financial condition of the Empire.

A Dairen telegram gives particulars of a serious affray with the Hunghutz bandits. At 1 p.m. on the 12th instant a body of a hundred desperadoes appeared at a place 1 li distant from Kinkoshi station, and a small battle took place between them and the garrison at that point, numbering 20 men. No fatalities occurred, but 6 bandits and 2 of the Japanese soldiers were wounded. On receipt of the news at Kaigen, a force of 40 soldiers, with 20 Chinese police and 20 mounted infantry, proceeded without delay to reinforce the garrison.

A later despatch says that the number of the bandits has increased to 340, and that Mr. Yamada, the officer in command of the battalion stationed at Tetsurei, is leading a strong body of troops to the disturbed area.

The activities of the Hunghutz bandits are certainly not on the wane. A telegram dated the 14th inst. from Changchun says that a Japanese patrol of two soldiers was ambushed by a party of 20 bandits on the night of the 10th. One of the soldiers was killed and the other left for dead. Three days later a force of two hundred bandits made their appearance in the same district, but encountered this time a stronger force of troops. They were, however, driven off after inflicting a loss of 1 killed and four seriously wounded. The bandits are reported to have suffered severely.

Floods are reported from Northern Manchuria. Owing to continuous and heavy rains, the Sungali has risen alarmingly. In the vicinity of Petro the width of the river has increased to thirty times the normal distance between its banks. Tsitsihar and Kilin are more or less inundated in consequence, houses and fields being everywhere submerged. At Harbin the river has risen 5 or 6 feet, and is continuing to rise, to the extent of 7 or 8 inches daily. All possible measures are being taken by way of precaution.

Mr. Stamenovitch, a Servian athlete, who is on a walking-tour round the world, arrived recently in Harbin from the west, and has left that city for Japan.

A curious story comes from Dairen of an attempt on the part of China to reassert that influence over affairs in Manchuria which seems to be fast slipping from her grasp. But it cannot be described as other than a back-door method, after all. The idea is, according to the telegram in question, to frame a series of regulations for the control of Chinese labour in Southern Manchuria, with a view to getting into Chinese hands the real power over the various industrial concerns financed by foreigners in that part of the Empire. The undertakings which are expected to be most affected by these prospective regulations are, of course, the Fushan collieries and the Mukden-Antung railway. But we strongly suspect that the whole story has its genesis in the brain of some imaginative correspondent.

A large proportion of the piratical horde recently unearthed in Colowan has, as might have been expected, sought refuge in the neighbouring British territory. Their respite, however, has proved to be of the shortest, for, according to a telegram from Hongkong a great number of the pirates have been arrested there.

In this context it may be mentioned that the Governor-General of Kwantung is in receipt of instructions from the Central Government to use such naval forces as he has at command for the purpose of suppressing piracy on the West River and its vicinity, and to extend all possible protection to the vessels engaged in the coasting trade of that region.

Changes are reported to have taken place in official circles in Peking. Two of the military members of the Grand Council were relieved of their posts, and Prince Ikuro and Mr. Joseisho were appointed in their place. It is also announced that Mr. Toshoji has been promoted to the head of the Department of Communications. The Peking correspondent of the Jiji Shimpō sees in these changes the handiwork of Princes Tsai-tao and Tsai hsun who, as our readers are aware, have recently returned from a tour of inspection in foreign lands. They are said to have made representations to the Prince Regent to the effect that China's frequent failures in the field of diplomacy are to be attributed to the absence of Yuan-shikai from the Council Board, and that his return should be one of the first measures in the direction of reform. The appointment of Mr. Toshoyi, who is a supporter of the exiled Yuan, is believed to have arisen out of these representations. The correspondent adds that at the time when the Russo-Japanese Convention came on the tapis, the Chinese Government was receiving sympathy and advice at the hands of the United States and Germany; and that the above-mentioned changes in the Council are not unconnected with this circumstance. We give this report for what it is worth—which, we fear, is not much.

The Chinese authorities at Tientsin are said to have handed a communication to the foreign Consuls at that port regarding the embargo on the export of live stock. The Japanese, American and Russian Consuls, however, protested against the measure, and it is understood that the prohibition will shortly be withdrawn.

A curious story comes over the wires from Mukden. The gist of it, so far as we can gather, is that the Chinese authorities appear to have conceived the brilliant idea of effecting the withdrawal of all Japanese and Korean immigrants from the unopened parts of the Three Provinces, and a report is already to hand of the expulsion of certain Korean settlers from the Timingtun district. This incident not unnaturally led to a remonstrance on the part of the Japanese Consul-General, who is said to have drawn the attention of the Viceroy of Manchuria to two circumstances; first, that these settlers were in reality engaged, in a humble way, in the development of world-commerce in China; and, in the second place, that such measures as were attributed to the Viceroy must certainly have the regrettable effect of creating ill feeling between China and her neighbour Japan, just as such an unfriendly policy as the expulsion of all Chinese residents from Korea would produce a like disagreeable effect on the relations between the two countries. In reply to this remonstrance, the Viceroy is represented as saying that the removal of the Koreans from Timingtun was done by the local authorities without his cognizance. We very much question whether the Chinese authorities have really set their heart on any such foolish policy as this message attributes to them.

The mischievous activity of the bandits in Manchuria is alleged to have engaged the attention of Peking. Orders have been issued to the Viceroy of Manchuria to appoint a high military commander for the purpose of subjugating the Hunghutz and effecting reforms in the military administration of the Three Provinces. The Viceroy is reported to have requested that the project be held in abeyance for the present, on account of the general financial embarrassment which prevails.

A serious charge is brought against a British steamer in a Dairen telegram. The vessel in question is the Tamsui—belonging, if we are not mistaken, to the China Navigation Company; and the charge is one of attempting to evade payment of export duty on some 6,000 kin of salt, which apparently had been secretly smuggled on board. The master of the vessel was duly warned by the Customs officials, and ordered to remain in port, but at 11 p.m. on the 16th, says the telegram, he weighed anchor and left for Shanghai. We venture to think, however, that the incident will be found to lend itself to an explanation which will rid the story, as now received, of its more unpleasant features.

THE PRIZE-FIGHT FARCE.

It appears, says a London journal, that Jeffries, the defeated pugilist, like the majority of his countrymen, is unable to take his beating in the proper spirit. He now claims that foul play was used to defeat him in the fight on July 4. As might have been expected, the press is making much of the allegations and that part of the public interested in the ring are said to be "considerably agitated over it." The ex-boiler maker's trainer has apparently come forward with a demand that another match with Johnson be given Jeffries to vindicate his claim. We very much doubt whether any such project will be allowed to materialize. Unless we entirely misread American opinion on this subject, a strong revulsion of feeling has set in against the whole sordid business of the prize ring. The disagreeable fact that, as the American papers confess, the announcement of Johnson's victory was everywhere the signal for brutal clashes between negroes and whites, in which the latter were almost always the aggressors, is doubtless responsible for this awakening of the American conscience. "Compared with the wanton brutality with which men of African blood were hounded through the streets of many American cities and villages on Monday night by white thugs, the prize-fight in which a white man was beaten by a negro was, says one American paper, exalted in its refinement. . . . The white scoundrels who formed themselves into gangs for the purpose of beating and torturing, in some cases slaying, whatever black they could corner, pleaded the necessity of vindicating the superiority of their race as their motive. They have, in fact, placed upon their race an execrable blot."

The immediate aftermath of this much-advertised prize-fight, in which a negro successfully defended his title to the heavy-weight championship of the world against the retired white champion who tried in vain to "come back," was, writes the Literary Digest, a disgraceful outbreak of race riots in almost every section of the country. The secondary result promises to be some interesting litigation between the syndicate which controls the moving pictures of the fight and the various State and municipal authorities which have put a ban upon their exhibition. In general, the American press shows up very badly over the whole affair. They are freely charged with having promoted the fight in the first instance, and in having then united with the white champion to make a race-issue of it. Thus Jeffries is quoted as having said: "I am going into this fight for the sole purpose of proving that a white man is better than a negro." Is it any wonder, people are now asking, that, the negro having won the battle, the coloured people should become exuberant over the result? And a Kansas journal pertinently remarks that "the complete seriousness with which the gentlemen of the sporting fraternity have spoken of the fight as hinging the supremacy of the white race is a contribution to essential humour not to be lightly prized."

Of course, opposition to the anti prize-ring agitation is being raised by the picture syndicates and others who hope to make financial gain out of those degrading exhibitions; but the better elements in American society, disgusted with the business and alarmed at the extent of the racial plague-spot which it has disclosed to the view of the civilized world, are doing what is in their power to render correct the prediction attributed to the ex-pugilist, John L. Sullivan, that the Johnson-Jeffries contest will probably be the last big fight in the country.

THE MAKING OF CITIZENS.

Much has been written about the Japanese national spirit, and many are the "explanations"—wise and otherwise—of its inculcation. However, Sir Alexander Bannerman, in an article appearing in the Journal of the Royal United Service Institution comes as near the mark as can be expected. He finds the key to the national character in the education of the child from the earliest in the idea of duty:—

In the elementary course it is laid down that the children shall be instructed by means of examples in filial piety, obedience to elders, affection and friendship, frugality, industry; modesty, fidelity and courage, and also in some of their duties towards society and the State. Here, at the very beginning of the child's education, meet the word "duty," and although it has been said before, it cannot be too often repeated that duty is the keynote of Japanese morals. The word "rights" does not appear in the syllabus. Even when treating of the franchise, it is not spoken of as the "Right to vote," but the "Duty of voting."

Everyone admits that not the least important part of a nation's training is the education of its girls, and the object which the Japanese have set themselves to attain is, in their own words, to convert their girls into "Good wives and wise mothers." Both boys and girls are to be trained so as to "Make them value public virtues, and foster the spirit of loyalty and patriotism."

The general purpose of the system is to begin by teaching the infant its duties at home and in everyday life, and as its intelligence develops to go on to more advanced social questions, keeping all the time in the foreground the dominant ideas of deference to superiors, filial piety, loyalty to the Emperor, and duty to the nation. The teaching is aided by giving examples from history of the various virtues which are to be fostered.

KOREA.

There has been a recrudescence of activity on the part of the insurgents in Korea. Ever since the 29th ult., it appears, the district of Mozan, Haiyando province, has been in a state of turmoil, owing to the depredations of a band of twenty desperadoes. The disturbances culminated, on the 6th inst., in an organized attack on the village of Kakusen. After intimidating the headman into surrendering all the money-orders in his possession, the rioters set fire to and destroyed thirteen houses, and killed six of the defenceless inhabitants. A troop of soldiers from the Tokkusen garrison has been ordered to the scene to restore order.

According to a telegram from Seoul the ringleader of the anti-Japanese movement among Korean students in the vicinity of the capital was arrested on the night of the 9th inst. This misguided youth, whose name is Yi-Seizan, has been, up to the present, a student of the Meiji University in Tokyo, and we gather that he was taken in charge on his arrival at Seoul.

Another Korean paper, the Chosen Shimbun, has been ordered to suspend publication on account of the indiscretion of its recent utterances.

A Seoul despatch dated 11th instant reports that Mr. Yi Yong-ku, leader of the Il Chin-hoi, left Chemulpo on Wednesday for Fusan. It is believed that Mr. Yi will have a conference with Mr. Pyong-chun, ex-Minister of Home Affairs, with regard to the present situation in Korea. Much importance seems to be attached, at the present juncture, to the movements of the Il Chin-hoi leader.

The Resident-General has invited to his private residence the Vice-Ministers of Agriculture, Commerce and Engineering; and has elicited from them detailed information as to the working of their several Departments.

Political circles in Seoul appear to be imbued with a sense of impending events. The various Ministers of State are said to have exchanged an attitude of passive expectancy for one of bustling activity—whatever that may mean. At all events, there has been much going and coming of Ministers since the 11th inst. The heads of the Department of Home Affairs and of Agriculture called at the residence of the President of the Privy Council, and there held a secret conference which lasted several hours.

Arrests continue to be made of seditiously-disposed students, in numerically increasing ratio. On the 12th inst. 6 students were taken in charge at the Northern Police Station, and on the 13th inst. 37 more were arrested. It is currently believed that the plot in which these misguided young men are presumably implicated was hatched in Tokyo.

The Chinese Government is reported to have established 13 police-stations along the line of the Yalu for the purpose of protecting the frontier. This measure is not unnaturally regarded by the Residency-General as an infringement of the already existing agreement; and a request for an explanation has been addressed from that quarter through the medium of the Japanese Consulate at Antung.

Arrests of Korean students continue unabated. Since the night of the 12th instant, 27 more of these restless spirits have been compelled to surrender their liberty for a season into the hands of the police.

It is reported that, when these last arrests were made, the students were in the act of telephoning to their fellow-conspirators the details of their seditious schemes. Thus they may be said to have been taken in flagrante delicto, and under such conditions as place their guilt beyond doubt.

A curious story comes from Seoul with regard to the Vice-President of the Progressist party, Mr. Yi-kihon. He is said to have approached a high Japanese official with an appeal for funds on behalf of his party,—the amount in question being, according to the report, 3,000 yen—and then to have employed the money for his own private purposes. The natural consequence of the disclosure of Mr. Yi's peculation has been his removal from office.

The sedition in Korea appears to be spreading from the students to their teachers. A Seoul telegram reports that on the night of the 15th inst. five persons were arrested on a charge of conspiracy. Four of these are either head teachers or assistants in the Fusei middle and preliminary schools, and the remaining one is the principal of a private school in the same place. They are said to have been already proved to be active participants in a serious conspiracy.

A Korean spy, who, acting under the instructions of Mr. Yi-hanin, is reported to have set out from the capital for the Russian coast in the vicinity of Possiet Bay, has been arrested by gendarmes in Northern Korea before reaching his objective. This instance, according to the message, is but one out of many, as the eastern and north-eastern districts of the peninsula are said to be infested with such gentry. The main object of their endeavours is to ascertain detailed information of the frontier defences.

The Christian propagandists in Seoul are witnessing a fresh accession of activity. A new church has just been founded and a band of forty Korean evangelists have been appointed to carry the Christian message to various parts of the country. This expansion and activity is currently believed to have been rendered possible by the recent return from America, of Mr. Yin-chigu, who has been very successful in raising funds for mission work in the Hermit Kingdom.

The Korean Premier repaired to the Residency-General on the 16th inst., and expressed his condolence regarding the disastrous floods in Japan. Subsequently, says a message from Seoul, the Premier had a prolonged private interview with His Excellency General Terauchi. On leaving the Residency-General, a little before noon, the Prime Minister summoned the Minister of Agriculture to his house for a consultation on matters of importance.

The peninsula has not escaped the inclement weather. Floods and storms have occurred at Gensan, since the 15th inst., with the result that the greater part of the foreign concession is now under water.

Telegrams from Pyongyang unite in asserting that the South Haiyando province is afflicted with a plethora of private educational establishments. The number given is over three hundred, which certainly seems in excess of requirements—particularly if such unsupervised institutions, or any of them, become nurseries of sedition. The superintendent of the district is now said to be seeking powers, from the Educational Department, to effect a reduction in the number of these schools by means of amalgamation.

The Korean Government, says a Seoul telegram, has decided to set apart the sum of 40,000 yen for the purpose of drainage and other allied works.

An interesting ceremony is reported to have taken place at Kanjo on the 15th inst., namely, the celebration of the conferring of posthumous honours on three distinguished Koreans, who, on the strength of their liberal views, may be described as the apostles of enlightenment, on Occidental lines, in their own country. However, up till the present they seem to have shared the fate of the prophet who had no honour in his own country. Two of these forerunners of civilization in the Hermit Kingdom suffered assassination at the hands of their own countrymen during the troubles of 1896; and the third, escaping to America, died there an exile. Tardy honours have, however, at length been accorded them. The Korean Emperor sent three chamberlains to be present at the ceremony, and some 300 other persons paid homage to the memory of these departed patriots, who even at that date recognized the dependence of Korea on her eastern neighbour in the awakening which they foresaw.

The report published by the Mainichi Dempo, in an extra yesterday, to the effect that preliminary negotiations on the subject of amalgamation had been opened on the 16th inst., does not appear to be founded on fact. It is understood, however, that the matter cannot be delayed much longer, and the 20th is commonly spoken of as the date for the formal opening of the question. Nevertheless, while the Mainichi's report may fall into the category of intelligent anticipation of events before they occur, there is no official information on the point.

Meanwhile the comings and going between the residences of high officials continue to form food for the imagination of enterprising correspondents.

TIBET.

The Chinese representative in Lhasa appears to have addressed a somewhat plaintive appeal to Peking. Although there is an entire absence of disturbance, the British Government, he alleges, has despatched 2,000 troops to the frontier, and, should an opportunity occur, these troops intend to advance and occupy the open trading-stations. As a protest to the British commander was ignored, the Resident has appealed to the Waiwupu. The complainant advocates the opening of negotiations with the Indian Government for an agreement protecting British and Chinese interests alike; but, if this cannot be obtained immediately, he suggests that the British authorities be requested to restrict the number of troops to two or three hundred.

A FINE ART GALLERY.

The Education Department is said to have approached the Treasury with a considered scheme for the construction of a new Fine Art Gallery. The site of the proposed building adjoins that of the Fine Art School in Uyeno Park. The cost of the scheme is estimated at yen 600,000, which amount would be spread over a period of three years. The building will be a two-storied one, covering a space of 1,500 tsubo.

ANTI-LIQUOR AGITATION ENDS IN MURDER.

Public opinion in America seems to be much exercised over the lynching of a white man in Newark, Ohio, in the sequel of an anti-liquor movement in that State. "Why should Ohio have railed against Reno," asks the leading newspaper of a Western State, "when lawlessness was going on unchecked in Newark for months, a lawlessness that finally led to lynching?" The events which culminated in the outrage of July 8 are thus set forth by the Cleveland Leader in an editorial:—

"Newark, plainly, had cut loose from the law. In the last local-option election Licking County as a whole decided against the saloons. But Newark, the county seat, went 'wet' by 1,556 votes. The saloon-keepers, and enough of the heavy anti-prohibition majority to give their determination effect, decided among themselves not to abide by the result of the election. They made up their minds to set the law at defiance. The natural results came quickly. The saloons put up but a thin pretence of selling only non-intoxicating drinks. The Mayor and the Chief of Police refused to interfere. The protesting leader of the 'dries' was waylaid and beaten into insensibility. An effort to defeat the reelection of the Superintendent of Schools because he was an anti-saloon man nearly succeeded. Intoxication of boys became common. The 'tenderloin' flourished as never before. Two Chicago brokers who were threatened were advised by the Mayor, when they appealed to him for protection, to buy revolvers. Members of the Chamber of Commerce and a minister of the gospel to whom they went for counsel, gave them the same advice. Apparently police protection was not to be thought of. A newspaper reporter to whom they told the story admitted that he did not dare write it for fear bodily harm would come to him. Decent people were compelled to carry weapons for self-protection."

As to what happened in Newark on the day of the riot, it appears that a number of private detectives, hired, not by the Anti-saloon League, but by the Licking County Law Enforcement League (we quote from a summary in the Literary Digest), were raiding several drinking resorts in Newark. A hostile crowd gathered and put them to flight. One, Carl Etherington, a twenty-two-year-old Kentuckian, was attacked near William Howard's place, "The Last Chance," in the outskirts of the city. In the scuffle which seems to have ensued, Etherington drew a revolver and shot Howard. He was promptly lodged in the county jail. Howard had been Chief of Police and was a man of a good deal of popularity. When the news of his death was reported that evening, a mob forced the jail doors, pulled out young Etherington, gave him a drubbing, and then hanged him to a convenient telegraph-pole. Most of the Newark citizens and the State officials who have been interviewed by the press believe that the Sheriff is in a large measure responsible for the lynching, on the ground that he could have prevented it, inasmuch as the mob were working for two hours at the prison gates before breaking in. The Governor of the State has done something towards upholding the cause of order, after the event, by removing the Mayor and Sheriff from their offices. But the affair has prompted several Southern editors to suggest that the "finger of scorn," so often pointed southward, could be directed quite as frequently toward Ohio and Illinois, and one journal is also reminded of a "famous Guildhall speech" which laid down this rule for the English people:—

"It is your first duty to keep order. Where the people treat assassination as the corner-stone of self-government they forfeit all right to be treated as worthy of self-government."

THE AMERICANISATION OF CHINA.

Dr. Dillon's studies in European politics, and particularly those of the Near East, usually form a valuable feature of the monthly reviews. We question however whether his dicta relating to the Far East can claim for themselves the same authority.

In an article entitled "China and the United States," contributed to the Contemporary Review this publicist sets out by declaring that the American Government has alienated Japan, but it is making up to China for all it is worth. "Friendship is being cultivated by the Washington Government with assiduity, perseverance and ingenuity, and with a considerable degree of success. By refunding £90,000 in 1886, on the ground that it exceeded the amount rightfully claimed as damages, the American Government created a very good impression in China, which was deepened two years ago when Congress waived its claim to £220,000 due to the American Government for the cost of the expedition against the Boxers." Such consideration, thinks Dr. Dillon, has touched the Celestial heart in its tenderest spot, and the Chinese have shown their gratitude in various practical and more or less remarkable ways:—

The interest on that capital sum has since been applied exclusively to a work which in the long run will repay the people of the United States a hundred fold. It defrays the expenses of a number of carefully-selected young Chinamen who are sent to the States to American colleges, universities, technical high schools, there to finish their education. Every year one hundred Chinese youths take their places in American educational establishments, where they will remain not less than four years. At the end of the first four years, therefore, there will be four hundred Chinamen from this source alone absorbing American ideas, conversant with American modes of thought and methods of action, and linked with Americans by bonds at once pleasant and durable. And parallel with this training of Chinamen in the States a widespread educational movement is being successfully conducted by Americans in China. Here the type of Chinaman catered for is more plebeian. There are about two hundred American "universities," schools, and colleges now scattered throughout the Chinese Empire, including fifty seminaries for theologians and twenty-one medical schools. Among establishments of the highest type are the Pekin Methodist University with several hundred students, and the Yale College in Changcha, to which an excellent hospital is attached. Among the students of this establishment are numerous relatives of the highest and most influential functionaries of the Celestial Empire. There are at present thousands of Chinese children and youths under the care of American teachers in the Celestial Empire, besides six hundred carefully selected youths, who are pursuing their studies in the United States. Among these are twelve female students, of whom one is a niece of Li Hung Chang. This distinguished lady is said to have outshone her male competitors and won a prize under circumstances which do her credit.

The studies to which the Chinese students devote themselves are for the most part engineering, chemistry and electricity. The new China, according to Dr. Dillon, is buoyed up with the hope that under the wing of the American Eagle she will realise her future destinies. And yet one hears talk of a Chinese-American boycott!

QUEER WORDS FROM VENICE.

If we are to believe circulars which reach us from Italy from time to time, the "Queen of the Adriatic" is seething with anarchy. Quite recently, says one of these documents, the futurist painters Boccioni, Carra and Russolo and the futurist poets F. T. Marinetti, Paolo Buzzi, Aldo Palazzeschi, Armando Mazza, having gone to Venice, climbed the clock-tower, from the top of which "they threw down on the howling agitation of the enormous crowd filling St. Mark Place, 200,000 multi-coloured manifests, thus conceived":—

We repudiate the ancient Venice extenuated by morbid secular voluptuousness, though we have loved it long and possessed it in the anguish of a great delightful dream.

We repudiate the ancient Venice of strangers, market to fraudulent antiquaries, magnetical pole for all the snobs and imbeciles of the world, the sunk in bed of innumerable caravans of lovers, precious gemed tub of cosmopolitan adventures.

We want to cure and cicatrize this rotting town, magnificent wound of the past. We want to enliven and ennoble the Venitian people declined from its former grandeur, morphised by a disgusting cowardice and abased by small dishonest traffic. We want to prepare the birth of a commercial and military Venice, able to brave and affront on the Adriatic Sea our eternal enemy: Austria.

Hasten to fill its small feid canals with the ruins of its tumbling and leprous palaces

Burn the gondoles, those swings for fools and erect up to the sky the rigid geometry of large metallic bridges and manufactories with waving hair of smoke, abolish everywhere the languishing curves of the old architectures!

May the dazzling reign of divine Electrical Light at last free Venice from her venal furnished room's moonshine.

May it indeed!

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The late King Edward, says a writer in a well known ladies' magazine, was known by his grandchildren as "Grandpapa King":—

"Grandchildren," laughed the King, "are just as great a pleasure to one as one's children, whilst the responsibility of bringing them up is yet shifted off on to other shoulders."

Grandpapa King used to tell with much appreciation this among other stories about his grandson, now Prince of Wales:—

Prince Edward accompanied His Majesty to Sandringham for the first time after his accession to the throne, and at St. Pancras Station among the crowd, an old woman cried out, "There goes little Prince Edward," and the child, turning quickly to his grandfather, exclaimed, "Did you hear her? She ought to have said, 'There goes little King Edward!'"

The young prince is said to have been very devoted to his grandsire. Although glad to welcome his parents from their Colonial tour, he is said to have remarked to a dean, "But mother's rather tiresome sometimes. And I don't want to leave Grandpapa King."

HYGIENE DURING AND AFTER FLOODS.

Mr. Kubota, Chief of the Sanitary Bureau, says that from previous experience it is feared that epidemic diseases of dysentery and typhoid fever are liable to break after the subsidence of floods. The great reason for the prevalence of epidemic diseases after floods is found in the virus which is spread by the overflowing streams where houses have been submerged. Great care must be taken not to leave deposits which may contain virus in and about the houses. At the same time it is absolutely necessary to remove the mud which accumulates on the streets or in sewers. As a most important hygienic step, prohibition should to be put on drinking from rivers and wells, and cities which do not have water works must use extreme care. The custom has hitherto been followed of sprinkling carbolic acid generally, wherever floods have prevailed, but recently, disinfection has been restricted to infected spots alone. In such low-lying districts as Hongo and Fukagawa, where the inhabitants are for the most part poor, the most stringent hygienic measures must be enforced, no one being allowed to enter the houses before they are thoroughly dried. In the meantime shelter will be given in official relief-stations established for the purpose.

AN ACADEMY OF ENGLISH LETTERS.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 13)

IN view of the vast amount of indifferent matter poured out from the printing-presses of innumerable publishers, more especially under the guise of fiction, the formation of an association in the interests of pure literature cannot be regarded as a superfluous step. In the case of only too many of the novels produced at the present time, the critical reader is led to wonder how a sufficient number of such books can possibly be circulated to make the process in the least degree remunerative. But still the steam—only too often a degrading stream—issues to feed the maudlin sentimentality or the sensation-thirst of a decadent age.
Among those social influences which, in the opinion of so shrewd an observer as the Earl of MEATH, follow the direction of an unwise sentimentality and tend to a weakening of the moral fibre of the nation, thus becoming a serious danger to the State, the influence of the so called society novel must be accorded a high place.
Since the outcry which greeted the publication of Mr. H. G. WELLS' Ann Veronica last year—which general protest had the salutary effect of showing that the mere fact of a writer having an established reputation does not permit him to produce a poisonous book with impunity—there has been a notable diminution in novels of this class. Nevertheless the general character of the literary output of the day continues to be compromised by the kind of book evolved by writers of the type of HUBERT WALES, FERGUS HUME and Mrs. L. T. MEADE. In fact, it is time that the literature-loving people of England set their faces against the novelist who has no real message to give, and the novel merely written to sell. Abuses usually suggest their own remedy—hence, no doubt, the movement to which we have alluded above. A Joint Committee was appointed last autumn by the Royal Society of Literature and the Society of Authors “to consider the best mode of creating a permanent body which may represent the interests of pure literature, without any regard to commercial considerations.” This Committee has now completed its labours, and has presented its report. As a result of its recommendations a body has been constituted, within the Royal Society of Literature, which has received the title of the Academic Committee. The new by-laws of the Society, ratified by the General Anniversary meeting, provide that the Academic Committee shall consist of not more than forty members, twenty-seven of whom have already been elected as “original members” at the nomination of the Joint Committee of the Royal Society of Literature and the Society of Arts. The province and duties of the Academic Committee are thus defined: (a) To take all possible measures to maintain the purity of the English language, and to hold up a standard of good taste in style; (b) to encourage fellowship and co operation among those who are disinterestedly striving for the perfection of English literature; (c) by “Discourses of Reception” and “Obituary Addresses” to mark the current of literary history in this country; (d) to designate from time to time persons to become recipients of the medals of the Society; (e) to make Awards of Merit to particular literary works.

All subsequent nominations and elections will be made by co-optation of the now existing members of the Academic Committee, but so that their number shall at no time exceed forty. From the following list of the names of those who have been appointed original members of this Committee it will be seen that the new body is fairly representative:—

Alfred Austin.	Andrew Lang.
Laurence Binyon.	Sir Alfred Comyn Lyall.
Andrew Cecil Bradley.	John William Mackail.
Robert Bridges.	Viscount Morley.
Samuel Henry Butcher.	George Gilbert Murray.
Joseph Conrad.	Henry Newbolt.
William John Courthope.	Edward Henry Pether.
Austin Dobson.	Sir Arthur Wing Pinero.
James George Frazer.	George Walter Prothero.
Edmund Gosse.	Walter Raleigh.
Richard Burdon Haldane.	George Macaulay
Thomas Hardy.	Trevelyan.
Henry James.	Arthur Woollgar Verrall.
William Paton Ker.	William Butler Yeats.

At the first meeting of the Academic Committee, as thus constituted, which was held on the 15th ultimo at 23 Hanover-square, a considerable number of those named above were present; and, the chair being taken by Mr. S. H. BUTCHER, M.P., the names of MAURICE HEWLETT and ARTHUR CHRISTO-PHER BENSON were added to the roll of original members. Lord MORLEY of Blackburn was elected president and Mr. E. H.
PEMBER, K.C., perpetual secretary. In the above list of members we miss such names as those of WILLIAM WATSON, CLEMENT SHORTER, RICHARD LE GALLIENNE, BERNARD
SHAW, G. K. CHESTERTON and Sir QUILLER
COUCH—not to mention Sir A. CONAN DOYLE and Mr. RUDYARD KIPLING; but possibly it may be urged against some of these that they have worshipped at the shrine of Mammon—in other words, of mere popularity.
However, there are still ten vacancies to be filled before the Committee is complete, and doubtless some of the literati we have mentioned will be admitted ere long. For the rest, the mere fact of the formation of so authoritative a body augurs well for the prospects of keeping our mother-tongue “a well of English undefiled.”

OBSESSION.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 13.)

WE note that our “rationalist” contemporary, the Japan Herald, ever since its now famous All-missionaries-are-liars syllogism, has developed a perfect craze for the detection of that logical obliquity, the suppressio veri. Indeed, the keenness of its scent for this fallacy is only exceeded by the ease with which it falls into the graver error of the suggestio falsi, as when—to select one example out of several—it makes unwarrantable assumptions regarding the identity of our correspondents and builds ingenious theories thereon. But, after all, an unique capacity for the detection of the suppressio veri is clearly our contemporary's forte.

Judging from a leading article in its issue of the 9th inst., it has triumphantly run yet another to earth—or, at least, lays to its soul the flattering unction that it has performed this feat, and has thereby proved that the Japan Mail, in common with all missionaries, is sunk in iniquity. The enormity of which we have been guilty, declares this local dispenser of defamation, is that when discussing, in an article entitled “Preference as the Basis of Empire,” Mr. BALFOUR'S advocacy of inter-Colonial or inter-Imperial preference, we did not quote his allusions to the Japanese Tariff. Now we are well aware that the Leader of the Opposition, in the debate in question, alluded to the proposed changes in the tariff of this country; but what in the world has that to do with preferential treatment of England by her Colonial Dominions, and vice-versâ?
Apparently the Japan Herald considers that, in any article dealing with the subject of Preference within the British Empire, it is necessary also to enlarge upon the French tariff, the German tariff, the Japanese tariff, and, in short, every tariff under the sun. Otherwise —says this champion of veracity—you will be guilty of the sin of suppressio veri, and, with all other like sinners, will be condemned to eternal perdition as liars.
Was ever a more ridiculous proposition advanced, outside of a refuge for the insane? We strongly recommend our contemporary, in view of the benefits commonly believed to be derived from a change of occupation, to turn its thoughts into other directions, lest the obsession under which it at present labours should become a mania.

Before leaving this subject, we feel it to be our duty to expose, and to protest against, the methods of controversy to which the Japan Herald has stooped on more than one occasion of late. In its anxiety to find a stick with which to beat the Japan Mail, it does not scruple to base more or less irrational attacks on utterly false assumptions, conceived from no other source than its own imagination. In the article on our alleged “versatility,” to which we have above referred, it resorts to the objectionable device of attempting to pervert our statements in the eyes of undiscerning readers. Thus, after reproducing at length Mr. BALFOUR'S allusion to the Japanese tariff, which it attacks us for not including in an article dealing with preference within the British Empire, it appends our remark “We do not think Mr.
Balfour's warning is uncalled for.” The inference it apparently wishes its readers to draw from this misleading juxtaposition is difference between these two kinds of realistic novels is perfectly patent, almost at a glance. This type of novel will not live, not only because its influence is for evil, but also because, contrary to the real novel, the motives of the author are evil. Too much cannot be said in condemnation of this type.

Another type of novel is that written by the author who not only does not possess talent as a writer of fiction but has not the courage of his convictions. He has a message to deliver to his readers, but this message requires a little plain speaking, and he hesitates for fear of offending Mrs. Grundy. Consequently, his or her novels are futile.

Lastly, there is the novel which is written for no reason (and read for no reason) excepting that the author, or authoress, as is generally the case, perhaps has nothing else to do and in an unhappy moment, for the reading public, decides to "write a book." It may be the case that one of her friends, in an unthinking moment, has said "you ought to write a book," not imagining for one moment that her suggestion will be acted on. These productions, published, in most cases, at the writers' own expense, in due course of time reach the shelves of the circulating library from which they are occasionally extracted by the unwary or hurried subscriber, much to the latter's annoyance and disgust. Of course, a certain artificial demand is set up for these books by the friends and relations of the proud authoress. This type is quite harmless, has always existed since the inception of the novel and is likely to exist. We do not condemn it but, nevertheless, it seems a pity that the fair writers expend so large an amount of energy and application on so vain a thing.

After a reaction, the dawn of a new era in the history of the novel is without doubt approaching out of the chaos of the present. The novel will not die; its potentialities are too great. In the hands of a master it is still the greatest medium between the thinker and the people, but above all, the novel of the future will have to be real.

KOREA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Korea has passed another stage in her political progress by the arrival of Viscount Terauchi. Officials and those in office have seemingly greeted his coming with every expression of gladness, but underneath it have been, no doubt, ominous forebodings as they heard the heavy guns barking out his welcome with reverberations that seemed to shake sea and land.

Three elements of discord would seem to accompany his arrival, one: the question of change. The Korean abhors change of any kind. "As it was and ever shall be" is a sort of Om mani pamdi hum that sings and drones eternally through his soul. Any departure from the existing rut of life's cart-way he dislikes horribly, and with the new Resident-General all sorts of changes are rumoured. "What is it?" "Where are we!" vibrate through the ether.

A second discord is the fact that he is a great war-lord, not a pen-lord or a man who writes poetry about the moon and the pine tree and the wild-goose going nowhere, but a man whose messages if need be, are accompanied with the rattle of gun-fire and explosions of dynamite. Truly this kind of governor is out of gear with Korea's every ideal.

Another and most sorely discordant element that enters is the expected annexation. To die individually is a sore and awful process, accompanied by the break-up of intelligence, nerve-response, voice, personality and what not, with all the cold uncanny conditions called death; for a nation to die how much sorer, how much more terrible, and to have one's death date fixed, and time of demise viewed by heartless sight-seers from the grand-stand. Till to-day however no changes have come, the Resident-General has been kind and no annexation has as yet been announced.

As to how much pain the annexation announcement will cause if it comes, depends on what is involved in it. If it means the deposition of the national flag, the stifling of every expression of national patriotism, it will indeed be a sore affair, and leave a gangrene that will long infect a portion of the nation; but if it preserves the semblance of individuality, though the truth of it be complete annexation, it will not be so bad or so hard to bear.

What a strange conflict of reality and make-believe it all is. Those in office from the highest down seem perfectly content with the new regime; unsuccessful office seekers are emphatically against the government; school-boys and youngsters who have had no experience, are loud in their clamorings for liberty, equality, and are opposed to all things Japanese. The great mass of the people are no doubt indifferent and in a way quite content with the new regime. The average or sum total of the nation's feelings is impossible to gauge or get at.

Recently, on a country trip, the writer called at a native village and after salutation and words of peace to the good man of the house, inquired as to how the world went. "You have a gendarme guard here, several Japanese among them have you not?" "Yes" was the reply. "No doubt you find them a trial in your town, and would be glad to get rid of them. There will be all sorts of oppression and wrong doing?" His reply was, "Not at all. The officer in charge is very kind and all the people like him. He and his men protect us against every kind of fear. We are very glad to have them." This is the opinion of a peasant, who has no political aspirations, and who desires most of all safety and quiet for himself and his family. Does he speak for a million other peasants?

When the writer sees almost the only men who have ever held office, or are prepared to hold office, like Pak Che-soon and Kim Yoon-sik, sitting in best accord with the so-called unloved rulers of the land, enjoying a view of wrestling-bouts, or the entertainment of some garden-party, he wonders where the truth does lie.

I suppose it might be summed up thus: All thinking Koreans would like to be independent, have a prosperous country, raise an army, build a navy, and take part in the councils of nations; but few Koreans, alas very few, fewer perhaps than in any other northern country of the world, would be willing to climb the arduous road of self-denial, hard labour, persistent effort, perseverance, submission, obedience, law-abiding self-restraint, necessary before we can think or talk of national independence.

The writer would like to see Korea great as Switzerland is great, as Holland is great, as Denmark and other clean, self-respecting, self-governing countries, but past history not only gives no such promise but makes such a thought a vain foolish dream.

When the average idle hours of the Korean are less than the average idle hours of the Japanese; when the average Korean is a more proficient and more efficient man than the average Japanese; when the base of integrity and truth in the average Korean's soul is broader and wider than truth and integrity in the soul of the average Japanese, we shall see this peninsula rise in the estimation of the world and in the councils of the Far East, not till then. All unfaithful praise of the Korean, all encouragement to have him shout for empty independence, all consolations that tell him that he is good indeed and has been badly treated, are the words of the enemy that can never help him in this his hour of need.

NOTES ON THE RECENT DISASTERS.

Saturday, August 13.

Further reports of disasters caused by the recent heavy rains are continually coming from all parts of the country.

According to a report issued on Friday morning railway traffic on the following sections was still suspended:—

Tokaido Line:—Omori-Kamata, Koyasu-Higashi-Kanagawa, Hodogaya-Totsuka, Ofuna-Fujisawa, Kozu-Matsuda, Numazu-Shizuoka, Iwabuchi-Kambara, Yaitsu-Shida, and Kakegawa-Fukuroi.

Central Eastern Line:—Tatekawa-Toyoda, Asakawa-Yose, Uyenohara-Torisawa, and Hatsu-kari-Hatsukano.

Shinyetsu Line:—Kumanohira-Kennagai.

Sobu Line:—The whole line.

Oou Line:—Kurihashi-Koka.

Nikko Line:—Tsuruta-Kammu, Utsunomiya-Tsuruta, Kurihashi-Nakata and Akabane-Warabi.

At Utsunomiya over 3,000 houses were submerged owing to the overflow of various rivers and nearly all the bridges were washed away on the 11th instant.

In Chiba prefecture the damage at Sakura and neighbourhood is most serious. Troops of No. 57 Regiment of Infantry stationed there are exerting themselves to the utmost in order to prevent further calamity.

The Abukuma River which runs through the city of Fukushima has risen over 15 feet, so that several hundreds of houses were submerged and destroyed. The Fukushima Electric Light plant having been destroyed, the whole city has been in darkness for two nights.

At Yugahara Hot-springs, Sagami Province, the Fujitaya, Fujiya, and Sakuraya Hotels were swept away by the flood on the 11th instant.

On Thursday about one-third of the city of Tokyo was under water, even such highland wards as Hongo and Koishikawa being more or less submerged. At Yanagi-cho, Koishikawa, the muddy water reached some two or three feet above the tramway line, and the traffic between Suidobashi and Hakusan terminus was suspended. Owing to the overflow of the Edogawa, a bridge gave way, and tramway service along the river was temporarily interrupted. A corner of Atago Hill collapsed and five persons were more or less seriously injured. Similar accidents occurred at Kanda, Kojimachii, Yotsuya and other wards, and the loss of two lives is reported.

In Yokohama there have been over 20 landslides since the 10th inst., while in Yokosuka accidents of this kind have been even more serious, the loss of many lives being reported.

Railway traffic between Yokohama and Yokosuka was restored yesterday, and some communication by land with Tokyo is expected to be effected during the course of a day or two.

The steamer Umegaka Maru, which was expected to arrive at Yokohama yesterday from Hakodate, proceeded hurriedly to Shimizu, Shizuoka prefecture, without calling at this port. The vessel is to carry passengers from the Shizuoka district to Atsuta near Nagoya.

From to-day steamship connection between Tokyo and Yokohama will be as follows:—

Leave Tokyo	4.30	6.30	8.30	9.30	10.30	a.m.
	Noon	2.30	4.00	5.00		p.m.
Arrive Yokohama...	7.00	9.30	11.00	a.m.	Noon
		1.00				p.m.
	2.30	5.00	6.30	7.30		p.m.
Leave Yokohama...	5.00	8.00	10.30	a.m.	Noon
	1.00	2.00	3.30	4.30		p.m.
Arrive Tokyo.....	8.00	11.00	a.m.	1.30	3.00	p.m.
	4.00	5.00	6.30	7.30		p.m.

The steamer Matsuyama Maru, which left Yokohama at 4 p.m. yesterday for Kobe, carried on board mails going to the western provinces. The Benten Maru will follow at daylight. The Chikuzen Maru arrived here yesterday afternoon carrying western mails.

FURTHER DISASTERS.

Monday, August 15.

In spite of some improvement in the weather on Wednesday and Thursday, news of further disasters caused by the recent heavy rains still continue to come from various parts of the country.

On Friday the Mikasa Hotel at Karuizawa was completely washed away. Baron Shibusawa, and several foreign and Japanese guests in the hotel, took refuge on a hill near the place. A part of the Mampei Hotel was also destroyed by a torrent of muddy water.

Owing to the rapid rising of the Tone River, which is three times as wide as the Sumida, the embankment of the Gogendo some 30 miles from Tokyo was in danger of giving way on Saturday afternoon. The consequence of the destruction of this embankment would be the submersion of nearly the whole city of Tokyo.

Asakusa Park in the metropolis is now completely under water. Tramway traffic between Kaminarimon and Ueno is suspended. At Mukojima muddy water is rushing almost on the same level as the bank of the Sumida, yet the inhabitants in this neighbourhood are taking quarters on this bank as the only place of refuge. At the request of Governor Abe, the Tokyo Garrison despatched a battalion of engineers to the bank at Mukojima early on Saturday. The houses submerged in Asakusa ward have reached over 38,000 and the refugees number over 130,000. The whole of Hongo is reported to have been inundated. Over 5,000 people of Shitaya have taken refuge at Ueno where a scene of great confusion exists.

While the city of Tokyo is being devastated by floods, a fire also occurred on Friday night at Sarue-cho, Fukagawa, resulting in the destruction of seven houses. The house in which the fire originated was submerged to the floor and there was no boat available for reaching the scene, so that five of the inmates were burnt to death, while three others were seriously injured. The same evening four houses at Hongo were destroyed by fire. There were also some killed.

I. Yokohama. The damage caused by the recent landslides and other disasters is so far as the city is concerned including the destruction of the Joshoji Temple at Minami-Ota estimated at some 12,000 yen.

According to the investigations made by the Railway Board, the damage sustained by the Tokaido and other lines aggregates in the amount to some 1,200,000 yen, which will reach over 1,500,000 yen in the event of the suspension of traffic lasting for a fortnight.

Tuesday, August 16.

The troubles in this and the neighbouring prefectures in the sequel of the recent rains have not abated to any extent. On Sunday night a report from Nikko stated that the upper streams of the Tone and Yedo rivers had risen over ten feet, insomuch that various parts of Chiba prefecture were threatened with submersion.

In Gumma prefecture there are at present over 50,000 refugees who can hardly obtain food in consequence of the insufficiency of rice, which has to be brought from other provinces.

On Saturday night landslides occurred at many places in Miyagi prefecture. Over 200 persons were killed and about 30 are missing.

According to a Karuizawa report dated the 14th instant, Marquis Saionji, who had been staying at the Mikasa Hotel, escaped safely from the flood. The villa of Marquis Katsura and the Banzai Hotel, in which the Italian and Austrian Ambassadors are staying, is at present safe. The dwellings of the U. S. Ambassador, Mr. O'Brien, Dr. Egi, and Dr. Aoyama are isolated by the water. The railway between Kutsukake and Shinonoi is under water some three feet deep. Marquis Katsura, who has been spending the summer at his villa, is reported to be returning to Tokyo via Nagano and Matsumoto, making a detour to Nagoya, thence to Atsuta and to Yokohama by water.

At the request of the Minister of Home Affairs, 154 marines under the command of Lieut.-Commander Uyetaki of the Yokosuka Naval Station started on Saturday night for Shinagawa to render assistance in preventing the inundation. These marines first tried to proceed from Yokohama to Tokyo by train, but, finding it impossible, left Yokohama the next morning by a steamer owned by the Ueno Forwarding Agency.

The Rokugo River which continued rising on Sunday morning caused several sections of its embankment to give way, and the districts of Yaguchi, Kamata, Rokugo, Haneda, and Omori were submerged to a greater or less extent. Consequently, railway traffic between Tsurumi and Omori was again suspended until noon on Monday, when traffic on the single line was restored. The railway break at Totsuka was repaired yesterday morning.

Reports from various parts of Kanagawa prefecture, which have so far reached the local government, state that up to the 13th inst. 20 persons were killed, 12 injured, and 4 are missing. As to houses, 50 were entirely destroyed, 36 partially demolished, 29 washed away, and 5,809 submerged. The total number of houses damaged to date is probably over 10,000.

In Shizuoka prefecture, Inaba-mura, Kamitaki-sewa-mura, and Shimotakisawa-mura, of Suita-gori, are found to be entirely destroyed, all the houses having collapsed or been buried under the landslides etc. Nearly all the inhabitants have apparently been killed. The amount of damage caused by washing away of bridges, breaking down of embankments and inundating of fields is roughly estimated at 6,000,000 yen. In some parts of the prefecture it is stated that the fields will be unfit for the cultivation of rice for at least three years.

A Shizuoka telegram says that the weather became fair at 4 a.m. on the 14th instant.

According to a Nagaoka report to the Railway Board, the Shinano River having risen 15 feet, the embankments have broken at three places, and a large part of the city has been inundated. About 9,000 houses are submerged.

The Mitsui family of Tokyo sympathizing with the distress of thousands of poor sufferers, has arranged to provide portions of rice to sufferers in Asakusa and other wards. The family of Iwasaki immediately followed this example by donating 1,000 bales of rice to relieve the sufferers.

Steamship connections between Tokyo and Yokohama were altered yesterday as follows:—

The steamer Umegaka Maru, which encountered the storm on Saturday on her way from Hakodate to Atsuta, arrived at the latter port at 3.30 a.m. yesterday, 19 hours overdue. The vessel left Atsuta at 10 a.m. the same day and is expected to arrive at Yokohama via Shimizu at 11 a.m. to day. The Egesan Maru left Yokohama at 8 p.m. yesterday and arrives at Atsuta at midnight to-morrow.

Wednesday, August 17.

According to reports from various prefectures which reached the Home Department up to 9 a.m. on the 15th instant, the number of sufferers in Tokyo fu reached 203,761, and in the whole country there were 1,112 persons killed or washed away, 151,655 houses submerged. 497 embankments broken down, 418 bridges washed away, 115 landslides, and 20,731 cho of land inundated.

In Saitama prefecture 59,911 cho of rice-fields, some 10,000 cho of Mulberry-fields, and 63,231 cho of other fields have been inundated. The loss is estimated in all at over 20,000,000 yen.

In Chiba prefecture the area of damaged fields covers 15,000 cho and the loss sustained taken with expenses for repairing broken embankments, comes to the sum of over 10,000,000 yen.

A Urawa despatch reports that on Sunday night rumblings were heard in the Chichibu mountains, and the ground in the neighbourhood of the mountain range was cracked. The inhabitants in the vicinity took refuge in Shiratori Village.

In the district of Nikko there has been much rain, but the damage sustained is comparatively small. On Monday morning Lake Chuzenji rose four feet, but the houses beside the lake are all safe.

A report from Hakodate says that over 2,000 houses have been submerged in various parts of the city. Telephonic communication between Hakodate and Uzunokawa has been interrupted on account of a furious storm.

In Ishikawa prefecture the entrance of the harbour of Ataka in Nomi-gori, has been blockaded by an accumulation of sand and earth. The neighbouring fields for 80 cho are submerged. One thousand coolies are engaged in dredging.

On the 11th instant Mr. Suzuki Saburosuke, a contractor of the War Office, of Tokyo, forwarded from Yokohama imported nitric acid and soda to be used in manufacturing gunpowder, in a number of lighters, to the Oji Gunpowder Manufactory, by way of the Sumida River. When these boats came to Teshimakashi, ten of the vessels with a large number of bales of these materials were washed away by the flood. The loss is estimated at 100,000 yen.

The Yokosuka Naval Station has despatched four torpedo-boats to the mouth of the Rokugo River and Shinagawa Bay to render assistance in saving those in danger of being drowned.

On Monday the Home Office telegraphed to the Governors of Shizuoka, Gumma, Chiba, Ibaraki, Saitama, Miyagi, and Yamanashi prefectures to the effect that as a large quantity of tinned food, soyessence, domyoji (dried rice) etc. is kept in the Ujina Military Storehouse, the War Office will transport these articles on receipt of request.

The War Office having donated 15,000 bags of domyoji and 6,000 cans of tinned beef to the Tokyo sufferers, these articles were distributed on Tuesday afternoon.

A Nagano telegram says that a special telegraphic service has since the 13th instant been opened between Tokyo and Karuizawa to accommodate visitors staying in the latter place. Marquis Katsura was to leave Karuizawa at 6 a.m. yesterday, and is expected to return to Tokyo at 4 p.m. to-day.

Baron Hirata, Minister for Home Affairs, who has been staying at Yokohama on his way home from Hayama, returned to Tokyo on Monday. The next morning the Minister reported to His Majesty the Emperor the condition of affairs in various provinces. Soon after he retired from the Palace, the Minister accompanied by Mr. Kamei, set out for a tour of inspection of the flooded section of Tokyo.

The fisherman of Tsukudajima, Tokyo, have since the first day of the recent flood volunteered to supply 300 boats manned with 800 men.

SHIPPING ACCIDENTS.

The Formosan liner Jingu Maru (3,200 tons), which left Yokohama on Friday evening for Atsuta, encountered a furious storm off Kuwana, Ise province, and ran aground on a shoal near the mouth of the Kiso River. There were 134 passengers on board, of whom 62 were taken to Atsuta by the Rokugo Maru passing by. In the meantime the vessel was apparently in danger, so that the other 72 passengers went on board cutters and took refuge in a neighbouring village. Subsequently, 60 of these passengers were rescued by two small steamers which came from Atsuta, while the remaining twelve left on board a cutter for Yokkaichi. Nothing further is yet reported of these latter passengers. The cargo was to be discharged and forwarded to Atsuta and Yokkaichi. The damage to the vessel is thought to be serious.

An Osaka telegram says that on the 13th inst., the steamer Hokuroku Maru (1,300 tons), owned by Messrs. Baba & Co. of Nanao, Noto Province, ran on a rock and sank in the Tsugaru Strait. The crew are all missing.

LOCAL NEWS.

The Tokyo Gas Company is now able to supply gas, for light and motive power, to the submerged districts.

The Chinese Government is reported to have effected the affiliation of the China Red Cross Society with those in various other countries.

His Majesty the Emperor has ordered the sum of 350 yen to be bestowed on the families of persons who were victims in the Tetsurei Maru.

Being aware of the fact that the price of lumber may go up on account of the increased demand in the flooded districts, the Home Office asked the Department of Agriculture and Commerce to supply lumber to these ill-fated districts at an especially low price, and the latter Office has consented.

A general meeting of the Bank of Korea was held on the 15th inst. at the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce, when a dividend of six per cent. per annum was declared.

Mr. Wang, the new Chinese Minister in Tokyo, will be received in audience by the Emperor on the 15th inst., when His Excellency will present his credentials to the Throne.

The flagship Charleston of the U.S. Asiatic squadron with Rear-Admiral Harber on board, accompanied by the cruiser New Orleans, arrived at Yokohama at 10 a.m., on the 15th inst., from Jinsen.

On Tuesday morning an extraordinary Cabinet council was held to discuss the recent disasters. Not only the Ministers of various Departments but the Vice-Ministers of the Home, Finance, and War Offices were present.

The Investigating Committee regarding the construction of the Tokyo Public Hall and Fine Art Gallery held a meeting on the 11th inst., and it was decided that the building should be designed by an engineer of the Tokyo-fu as well as by an official of the Municipal Office.

His Majesty the Emperor who is extremely anxious regarding the disasters caused by the recent floods, on the 16th inst. after receiving a report from Baron Hirata ordered Chamberlain Hino to proceed to the scene of disasters in various parts of Tokyo and suburbs.

The Tokyo Gas Company having used its utmost efforts to make repairs to its plants which have sustained damage in consequence of the recent floods, will be able to supply gas for light and motive power to all sections, except portion of Honjo, Fukagawa, Shitaya and Asakusa.

The N.Y.K. steamer Awa Maru which left Seattle on the 1st instant for Yokohama, is reported to have sustained damage to a steam-pipe on the port side. It took two days to make repairs at Victoria, so that the vessel is not expected to arrive here until the 20th instant.

On the 15th instant Baron Saito, Minister of the Navy, sent cordial telegrams to the First Lord of the British Admiralty and the Commanders-in-Chief of Naval Stations, thanking them for kind receptions accorded the Ikoma everywhere the vessel visited in England.

Mr. Yamamoto Inosuke, a habutae-merchant of Yokohama, has brought an action in the Yokohama Local Court against the Yokohama Branch of the Mitsui Bank for obtaining goods valued at over 70,000 yen by fraud. The details are at present being investigated by Public Procurator Hattori. Sato Kinichiro of the Mitsui Bank is said to be deeply involved in the matter.

The U.S. armoured cruiser New York (8,200 tons) arrived at Yokohama on Monday evening from Manila. The cruiser is to be the flagship of the U.S. Asiatic squadron, taking the place of the Charleston now lying in this port.

A Chinese cook on board the Charleston has been attacked by smallpox. The man was immediately taken to the American Naval Hospital on the Bluff.

The Tokyo Gas Company, having its factories at Omori and Senju submerged, had only the Sarui factory in Fukagawa left, but even this plant was approached by the floods on the 16th, and is now also submerged, so that no gas will be supplied until the flood subsides. Besides the three plants mentioned, the company has a plant in Shiba, but this can only supply Shiba-ku. It will take about a week for repairs to be made.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent)

St. Petersburg, July 28.

Sir Arthur Nicolson will present his letters of recall to the Emperor next week and leave immediately afterwards for England, to spend a few weeks' leave at Harrogate before taking up the duties of his new post as Permanent Head of the Foreign Office. The British Colony of St. Petersburg, to whom Sir Arthur Nicolson has endeared himself during his four years residence as Ambassador, will hold a banquet in his honour on Saturday, at which a piece of plate in the form of an ancient Russian loving cup will be presented to His Excellency on behalf of a large number of subscribers in token of the deep regret that is felt at the loss of one who amid all the weighty cares of State that have rested upon him during years of exceptional strain yet found time and energy to devote to the well-being of the local British community.

The Novoe Vremya has entered upon yet another crusade against Austria, whose policy and aims are now being daily attacked in a series of leading articles. It calls attention to the aggressive designs of Austria upon Montenegro, as evidenced by the internal ways of communication of the small State whose sea-front is an object of desire. "Austria will spend seven or eight million kroner on these fortification works on disputed territory commanding Montenegro, and this expenditure will be ample excuse, for Austria, to base a claim to the territory. It is the weakest link in the chain of Montenegrin defences. This act of gross violence in seizing alien territory, although it is being carried out on the quiet, may yet lead to very sad consequences. Possibly Austria in face the complications likely to be caused may find the game not worth the candle and wisely abstain from carrying the matter to an extreme." To-day's article deals with another point: the relations between Austria and Serbia, especially pointing out how the stronger Power uses its geographical position to squeeze the commercial life-blood out of the little Slav State. Serbia is cut off from the sea and dependent on Austrian railways for the output of her productions. Austria by treaty has forcibly limited the quantity of exports allowed from Serbia. But, on the other hand, Austria has suffered in a considerable loss of her imports into Serbia. The advantage of the whole situation has been reaped, says the Novoe Vremya, by Germany, which encouraged Austria to annex the Turkish Provinces and then proceeded to put into German pockets all the trade with Slav States that Austria lost owing to the annexation. Germany has secured the import trade into Serbia at the expense of Austria.

Persia has been some three weeks without a government, and to all intents and purposes, matters have been neither much better and no worse than hitherto. Worse, perhaps, in all essentials of State well-being, they could not become. The formation of a new Government is announced, consisting of extreme nationalists and a few pure fanatics. Prince Salar-od-Dowleh, who was recently arrested at Enzell, has been allowed to leave the country. The well-known leader of 'constitutional' ideals, Taghis-adch is about to leave Persia, but will doubtless be adequately replaced by his friend and lifelong intimate who holds the office of Minister of the Interior. Official circles in Russia regard it as proved that the presence of Russian troops on Persian soil is beneficial by the very fact that in the absence of any form of government whatever no serious outbreaks have occurred in a period of three weeks. This is due it is claimed to the steady effect of the presence of a small body of Russian troops in Persia.

The Finnish Diet will assemble this Autumn and immediately set about the consideration of the local regulations concerning the election of Finnish representatives on the Upper House and the Duma. The Finnish Senate has considered the scheme for building a railway through East Finland to link up with St. Petersburg and the Russian railways. Orders have been issued that all the surveying work is to be completed before next winter sets in. The plan contemplates an electric traction section between St. Petersburg and the frontier, the power for which is to be derived from the famous waterfall at Inatira.

Referring to the incident of the "Onward" trawler, recently arrested illegally and brought to Archangel, the Moscow organ of the Octobrist Party insists that an international conference must be summoned to reconsider the whole question of territorial waters. It points out that the existing three miles' limit might have been all very well in the days of sails, but with the advent of swift steam trawlers and the improved machinery for catching fish now in use it must be generally acknowledged that some wider margin of safety is needed to secure the integrity of territorial waters. I notice, by the way, that nearly all the English papers that have dealt with the question have fallen into a serious error in saying that the entrance to the White Sea, which Russia desires to hold a mare clausum, is "forty or fifty miles wide." Russia claims much more than the part of the sea which is inside the comparatively narrow neck "forty or fifty miles wide, for her contention is that Russian territorial waters begin at an imaginary line drawn three miles north of the line joining Capes Svjatov and Kanin. These capes are about a hundred and fifty miles apart, and it is the whole of the White Sea, and not merely the southern bight of it, that Russia claims as inland waters.

The official figures give 110 new cases of cholera to-day and 30 deaths, with 546 patients in hospital. A fatal case of Asiatic plague has occurred at Odessa.

The passion of the Russians for little crosses, medallions, and breloques of every description has been curiously utilised in Odessa by the authorities of the exhibition there. A rumour was spread about that the directorate of the exhibition were minded to fête gloriously the happy individual who chanced to be the 250,000th visitor. The numbers were judiciously published from day to day until it became plain that a certain evening would settle the lot of the happy quarter millionth visitor. All afternoon people crowded in and came out again as quickly as possible to bring up the numbers and secure a place in the queue likely to contain the lucky number. One by one all other entrances were closed and only a single turnstile left open. Frantic offers to buy a hundred or more tickets at once were sternly refused, and chance finally decided that the insignificant daughter of a steamship stoker should get the 250,000th ticket. A certain amount of champagne was drunk by the happy few and the lady received a little breloque—the exhibition getting an admirable advertisement and more entrance money than it has been thought advisable to publish. The idea might be worth transplanting, but it is doubtful if any other nation has the same passion for pretty bits of gold, silver, enamel and base metal souvenirs for all possible occasions. Certainly nowhere in the world are these little tokens so admirably and artistically made.

Some years ago an old friend of mine, a Russian Admiral who had held the command in the Far East and spent a great part of his service there, told me a terrible story which he heard from the officers who enacted the final scene of the tragedy. This story has apparently been resuscitated in a new form, and is going the rounds of the press as a new and up to date horror. The real story relates to a long past state of things before railways were dreamt of east of Moscow. There was at Irkutsk in those days a pie-woman whose productions were celebrated far and wide, known not only to all the townspeople of Irkutsk, but to all the soldiers and convicts who passed that way, as well as to more exalted travellers. The woman lived with her husband a few miles outside of the town on the highroad running east. The couple were secretive and mysterious at home, where it was supposed the husband slaved at the pie-making while the woman made the most of her charms and her pies in the town day by day. Now along that weary weary road eastwards used to come, in ones and twos, never more, and mostly one by one, not only runaway convicts and exiles but time-expired soldiers who all alike begged their way stage to stage—the latter category probably because they had spent the money given for their trip home in a debauch before starting. The pie-makers' house was a regular house of call, by reason of its situation, and though many had been seen from time to time to enter it for the customary supper and night's lodging (which in those days was as obligatory on the Siberian householder as it is on the Australian outlying farmsteads to-day) yet no one remembered ever having seen anyone leave the house except the pie-man and woman. But these Siberian guests generally shunned observation, so little was thought at the time of this significant discrepancy. Some circumstances led to the awful discovery that the couple had long been in the habit of murdering their chance guests, and making their renowned and tasty pies out of the human flesh so procured. Under their house was found a godown such as Siberian peasants kept for the winter store of potatoes and there was evidence enough to hang a dozen men. But Russia in those days did not hang even for many murders. They had a more horrible form of doing to death by "running the gauntlet," and, if I remember aright, both the man and woman died under this treatment. The man certainly, for the officer in charge of the party told off to form two lines, each man armed with a stout stick (not to exceed the thickness of a man's thumb, said the regulation) down which the wretch was to be dragged, not only gave the customary military commands for this horrible scene, but significantly added "and don't forget the 'time-expired' pies, my lads." The man, unluckily for him, was a stout rascal, and only succumbed after several repetitions of the "gauntlet-running," the doctors stopping the punishment when the man collapsed, and curing him in hospital until he was fit to undergo a further instalment of the three thousand strokes to which he had been condemned. This tale was told to my friend in the 70's of last century, when the officer who had commanded the punishment party was already a colonel: the affair probably therefore happened in the early sixties. It is impossible in these days of railways, but there is no doubt about the fact then.

WOMAN MURDERED IN YOKOHAMA TEA-HOUSE.

MURDERER ATTEMPTS SUICIDE BUT IS STILL ALIVE.

At four o'clock yesterday afternoon a woman named Imai Kane, aged 22 years, was murdered by a fellow servant, Fujitani Yasujiro, at the Kawamoto Tea-house at Ishikawa Ichome.

The pair were working together and had been quarrelling. The woman was buoying up some clothes in an upper room when Fujitani suddenly drew a large carving-knife from under his kimono and stabbed her several times. She fell screaming to the floor, and the murderer, crossing the room and kneeling, attempted to kill himself by harakiri. Failing in this he then attempted to cut his throat.

In the meantime word had been taken to the Kotobukicho Police Station. Sergeant Nakajima accompanied by Officer Ono ran to the tea-house, where they found both the murderer and his victim covered with blood and apparently dying. Both were conveyed at once to the station and given every possible attention, which however was in vain in the case of the woman, who died at 7 in the evening.

It is said that Fujitani will live.

The interment of the remains of the late Mr. James Catto, who died at Dairen on the 6th inst., will take place at the Yokohama Cemetery on Saturday, 20th inst. The Funeral Service at Christ Church will be held at 3 p.m.

WAS IT A MIRACLE?

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

[What I have to tell my reader will take him to the darker corners of the seamy side of life in Japan. It will I trust be none the less interesting for that. It is a very human story and all that is human is interesting, or may be made so by the skill of the story-teller. Should I therefore fail to interest you, I shall know that it is not due to the poorness of the material at my hand, but to my own want of skill in spreading out my wares. I am indebted for my facts to a series of articles which appeared in a Tokyo newspaper, the Yorodzu Chōhō, during the month of May, 1910.—A. L.]

I.—THE WOLF-PASTOR.

Towards the end of last year, a man in a little street at the back of the theatre in Ōji, stuck up in front of his house a sign-board informing the world that he was a fortune-teller, and that his name was Oshima Sotarō. Fortune-telling is, as a rule, the last ditch for the man on the verge of ruin. It requires no capital and no elaborate paraphernalia,—nothing but a few sticks, a tattered book, a solemn face, and possibly a pair of spectacles, and it is in fortune-telling, therefore, that the adventurer who finds himself in almost hopeless straits makes his last desperate stand before falling over the precipice of misery.

The fortune-teller's sign, therefore, set up in the midst of those sordid surroundings was a flag of distress rather than an advertisement of good articles for sale, and we need not be surprised to learn that for some weeks Oshima earned very little and that, many a time and oft, he and his little O Kei, a puny little creature of four years old, had to go hungry.

I have said that fortune-telling is the last ditch of the desperate. My statement is true as a general proposition: in Oshima's case there was a last ditch beyond the last, and when fortune-telling failed him, he put up a notice announcing that for a very modest fee he was prepared to teach English to the children of the neighbourhood. And, strange to say, his advertisement produced good results, and when I last heard of him he was doing well.

Now I will tell you his story.

His father was a samurai, of the Hikone fief, on the shores of Lake Biwa, a retainer of the great Ii Kamon, Prince Minister of the Shogunate, who made the treaty with the Americans and was assassinated for it. He himself went up to Tokyo at the age of nineteen, attended the Presbyterian School, the Melji-Gakuin, where he became a Christian, and then going to the Dōshisha in Kyoto, graduated in divinity. But he did not enter the Christian Ministry. He said that he did not care to preach Christ for a salary. When a man says that it often means that he has experienced no call, and that he is conscious of not being worthy of his hire.

But he was a skilled accountant and auditor, and soon got a job. A large silk merchant at Ashikaga had failed for a considerable amount, and Oshima was employed to bring order out of the chaos. This occupied him nearly four years. He did his work to everybody's satisfaction, and this was the brightest period of his life. When the business was completed he went up to Tokyo, and there got married. His wife's name was O Sada: she came from Hachioji, which is also a silk-producing centre, and her father was a wealthy silk merchant whose acquaintance Oshima had made over his Ashikaga work.

His next piece of work was not so happy in its ending. A project (now happily accomplished) was on foot for erecting a memorial statue in honour of the great Ii Kamon, and Oshima, the son of a prominent retainer of the former lord of Hikone, who had just given proof of his capabilities by his skilful adjustment of the Ashikaga affair, seemed to be just the man to work up the scheme. He was therefore put on the Committee as a working organizer.

But the project was not a popular one, and funds came in slowly; for Ii Kamon, in spite of his great services to the country in opening Japan to foreign intercourse and commerce, had been branded as a chōteki, or traitor, and men with a stake in the country shrank from associating themselves with an enterprise so dangerous to their worldly reputation. The Committee entrusted with the work were obliged to devise other means than the mere soliciting of contributions, and after much consultation it was decided to acquire a coal mine and work it for the benefit of the memorial. The late Mr. Tsuda Sen was one of those who favoured this idea.

When this resolution had been arrived at, Oshima went one day to call on a friend, the native pastor of a Church in Tokyo. (I will not mention his name. It has, I believe, disappeared from the list of native pastors). The pastor warmly commended the idea. It was most undesirable, he said, in a case like this, to go touting round the country for subscriptions. "And, indeed," he added, "I know of just the very thing you require,—a coal mine near Taira in Iwaki, which I can get for you for a small commission—say a thousand yen, and which you can work for the benefit of your most laudable scheme." Oshima jumped at the idea, so did the Committee; in a few days the transfer of the mine was accomplished and the pastor got his thousand yen. Then the committee, having purchased a "poke," set themselves to investigate the "pig" inside. It was an old mine that had been worked before, and was quite played out. And the pastor, with his thousand yen, had disappeared. It was not the first time that he had played havoc with the guileless sheep of Christ's fold. He had indeed earned the soubriquet of the "wolf-pastor."

II.—DESTITUTION AND ILLNESS.

Sōtarō (the reader will remember that this was Oshima's personal name) had failed at coal-mining, but he was still determined to accomplish something for the Ii Kamon Memorial. But he had to work by himself now, for the Memorial Committee, whose fingers had been burnt through following his advice, would have nothing more to do with him.

It says a great deal for him that he was at this time almost without capital. A good deal of money had passed through his hands during the time that he was arranging the affairs of the bankrupt silk-merchant, and again, later, during the few months of his connection with the Memorial Committee. It would have been no wonderful thing, as things go in Japan (and perhaps elsewhere), if a few hundred yen had contrived to stick to his fingers. Nor would the world have blamed him if he had given up all idea of trying to serve the Memorial Committee. He was not a wise man, though he was always a man of good will, and he clung to his ideal with pertinacity. A Milk Hall craze, a pious device for cheating the brewers and at the same time satisfying the desires of thirsty souls, was sweeping over Tokyo at the time. (We have had many such crazes, it would be an interesting psychological study to write a history of them). Oshima was carried away on the crest of the wave, and set up a Milk Hall. A few tables and chairs, some bright tin cans, a few glass pint-bottles with mechanical tops, a plate or two, a few loaves and buns, some lump-sugar, some daily papers,—and a tap:—this was his modest stock-in-trade. But rents are high in Tokyo, especially in Nihon-bashi-ku where his venture was made, and milk-drinking students and apprentices are comparatively rare. Neither Sōtarō nor his wife had any experience in the management of a business of this sort, and at the end of a few weeks they found themselves hopelessly floundering in a sea of debt.

The creditors were impatient and clamoured for their money. Sōtarō had nothing to give them, but he had in his possession the seal of a friend, one of his colleagues on the Memorial Committee, and he was full of that happy or unhappy optimism which makes a man blind to the far-off consequences of his actions, which sometimes plunges him into the most reckless of actions, and sometimes steels him to the triumphant perseverance of the man that did not know when he was beaten. So, having his friend's seal in his possession, he affixed it to a piece of paper on the strength of which he borrowed five hundred yen from a Bank, with a promise to repay at the end of three months. Like Mr. Micawber (who must, I believe, have been a small Japanese samurai), he was confident that something would "turn up" before that date.

Alas! nothing "turned up," and when the bank pressed for its money, and the fraudulent use of his friend's seal came to light, poor Ōshima found that he had fallen in a world which knows no mercy. His friends turned their backs on him, and left him severely alone. "The man that has lost his money," says a Latin poet who had had many opportunities of testing the truth of what he said, "the man that has lost his money finds no one coming towards him as a friend."

And "it never rains but it pours." In the midst of his troubles his wife bore him a daughter. And one morning, after sleepless nights and anxious days, he found himself coughing blood. He knew what it meant. His health had never been good, and it required no doctor to tell him that it was consumption.

When his wife,—poor faithful Sada—took it all in, she rose from her bed, fastened her babe on her back, and trudged off to Hachioji to make a last personal appeal for help to her own people. She had not been gone more than a few hours when a couple of policemen arrived at the house and arrested her husband on a charge of fraudulently misusing a personal seal.

III.—A WIFE'S FAITHFULNESS.

Sada's quest was not altogether a fruitless one. Her friends at Hachioji gave her a small sum of money, enough to tide her over present difficulties, and with this she hastened back to Tokyo.

To her great surprise, the house was empty. She waited for a few hours, hoping that her husband would return, and then began making enquiries among the neighbours, who informed her of the visit of the policeman and the arrest of Oshima. It was a terrible shock to her. She knew that her husband was quite sincere in his profession of Christianity, she knew that his wrong deed had come from sheer despair and from no badness of heart. And she had done her best to ward off the punishment, though with want of success. Weary, dispirited, broken-hearted, she sat down and wept. For three days she could neither eat nor sleep, and her soul refused comfort.

And then her husband returned to her. He was pale and death-like, and coughed painfully as he seated himself on the threshold of his own house.

"My dear," he said, refusing to go further than the door, "the Judgment of Heaven has fallen upon me at last, and I must not repine at it. I have been arrested, tried and found guilty of misusing a private seal and obtaining money on false pretences. The Court has released me on bail, because I am too weak to stand the hard discipline of prison life. I have been ordered to go to some quiet place in the country until my health is restored, and then I am to go to prison and serve my time. But I am a dying man, and have but a few more days to live. I am also a condemned convict. It is not fair to ask you, who have still your world before you, to go through life as the wife or widow of a convict, and I have come therefore to release you from your bond to me. Henceforth you will go your way, and I mine. I have made my own bed and will lie on it, but I do not want to drag you down with me."

But Sadakō (Kō is an honourable suffix used in speaking of ladies of respectable families) would not hear of this suggestion.

"You are sick and afflicted, and have none to nurse you in your sickness and misery. Do you thing I am going to forsake you now when you need me most? No, No," she continued, smiling through her tears, "I promised before God to take you for better and for worse, for richer and for poorer, and there is virtue in a Christian marriage. I mean to stay by you, to help you in your hour of difficulty, to nurse you back to health. Pray God I may succeed. You must not think of trying to send me away."

It is in the sordid surroundings of a miserable life that nobility of heart finds its best opportunities for expressing itself.

The next morning, the Ōshima family, miserable and poor, yet rich in the possession of a love capable of self-sacrifice, started for Hachioji, the feeble husband leaning heavily on his wife who was now become the pillar and stay of the whole house.

They found shelter in the house of Sada's stepbrother, who had now succeeded her father in the headship of the family. But their coming brought trouble to their kinsfolk. It was soon noised abroad among the neighbours that Ōshima Sōtarō was a convict out on bail, and the neighbours resented having such a man in their midst. It soon became evident that Sōtarō must move elsewhere if he would save his wife's people from a popular boycott which might entail disagreeable consequences to everybody. And his wife's people let him know it.

Sōtarō had no sooner announced his intention of going away than Sada's mother declared, much to Sōtarō's perplexity, that she would remain no longer with her stepson but would follow her daughter, Sada, and her son-in-law Sōtarō in their wanderings and poverty.

IV.—FILIAL PIETY.

Sōtarō did not know what reply to make to this suggestion. It would have been a different matter, if he had been prosperous and in good health and residing in a house of his own; but he and his wife and child were at the moment mere dependents on the charity of others, and it was rather too much of a good thing at such an hour to have thrust on him another mouth to fill, and another frail life for which to care. He set before the old lady as clearly as he could all the disadvantages of her scheme, and urged her not to leave a house which she had a right to consider as a home, and where she could dwell secure and free from daily anxieties. But the old lady was obdurate. She had her own views about the behaviour of her stepson, who, for fear of his neighbours, was cold-shouldering her daughter and son-in-law out of his house, and she declared that nothing should induce her to remain any longer under so inhospitable a roof. She insisted on accompanying Sōtarō and her dear Sada. There would, it was true, be one more mouth to feed, but there would also be one more pair of hands to care for the beloved grandchild, and Sada would be more at liberty to work for money, if she were freed from the responsibility of the baby. She carried her point, and the next morning the little party set out from Hachioji, the grandmother adding her scanty savings to the general stock. They went by train, thanks to Granny's contribution, and the train landed them at Iidamachi. Their first care was to find a cheap lodging, and if the reader is acquainted with the geography of Tokyo, he will understand the difficult nature of their undertaking when he hears that they had walked right across the city to the suburb of Omori before they found what they required.

The house they found was a small shed belonging to a farmer. They were weary and footsore, and threw themselves down on the mats without further ado. But they were also very hungry, especially the old lady who was almost fainting for want of food, and the cottage stood in the midst of fields of sweet potatoes.

"I tell you what, Sada," said Sōtarō presently; "you and I can manage to make shift till morning, but I can't bear to let Granny die of hunger. I'm going to dig her some potatoes and bake them in the ashes."

So out he slipped in the twilight, looked furtively this way and that to make sure that no one was looking, and then stepping into the field began uprooting the tubers with a sharpened stick and throwing them into his hat.

In the midst of his work he was startled by hearing a voice behind him.

"You beggarly thief!" it said. "Get out of that."

V.—A KIND PROVIDENCE.

Sōtarō looked up and saw the farmer looking at him over the fence.

"I beg your pardon, Sir," he said, "but, you see, we've had nothing to eat the whole day, and—"

But the farmer took no head of his apologies. He snatched the stick out of Sōtarō's hand and gave him a sound thrashing. Then he disappeared in the darkness, leaving Sōtarō to his own reflections and to the painful contemplation of his bruises.

The next morning the farmer came to see them at an early hour. He was not going to have thieves in his house, he said, and promptly bade them begone. They had gone supperless to bed: they now went breakfastless forth into an inhospitable world, without knowing where to turn or whither to go.

We need not follow the family in all their wanderings. It is sufficient to say that for the next few years they lived as tramps in the slums of the metropolis, sleeping sometimes in a hired room, sometimes in sheds and out-houses, sometimes in the waiting rooms of railway stations, and sometimes in the cheap doss-houses of which there are so many in Tokyo. The little money that came in was for the most part earned by the devoted Sada, Sōtarō himself being far too ill to do much work of any kind. Two more children were born to them during this period of vagrancy, and Sōtarō was more than once on the verge of committing suicide from sheer despair, what restrained him being mainly the thought of Sadako in whose character misfortune was producing such splendid fruits of virtue.

But one night, sitting in a cheap doss-house, he chanced to take up a newspaper from which he learned that a certain Dr. Kikuchi, a specialist of some note, would give gratuitous treatment to indigent consumptives. The place was in Nakaroku banchō, and Sōtarō lost no time in presenting himself for treatment. He told his story to the assistant, a man named Sumita who received him in the waiting room.

"Your story," said Sumita "interests me beyond words. It is so precisely similar to what my own has been. I know what you must have suffered, and shall try to help you." And opening his purse, he gave him three yen. "This," he said, "will tide you over the distress of the moment." The distressed are often the most charitable.

It was some years since Sōtarō had received so generous a gift. He bowed his head to the ground in grateful acknowledgement, and worshipped his benefactor as though he had been a god. Then he went off to tell his family all that had happened.

VI.—ONE SHŌ OF CHINESE RICE,

Sumita's words gave Sōtarō great comfort and cheer, and when he told his good news to his wife and mother-in-law, they took heart of grace and cheered up.

It was not long before they were in a position to hire a small house, much to the delight of Sadako, who, woman-like, desired nothing more earnestly than a home of her own.

She led a busy life, while her husband went daily to the hospital for treatment, she spent her days working at Mr. Kobayashi's "Lion" Tooth-powder Factory, and her evenings in sewing for neighbours and employers. Her earnings were not great, twelve sen a day, but they sufficed to buy food for the household, and occasionally Sōtarō would be able to supplement it by some small sums that he was able to earn at odd times. The twelve sen were enough to buy one shō, measure of cheap Chinese rice, to which the rice-dealer, who was a kind, hearted man, would occasionally add the present of a little fish. Still, they were contented and happy, and it was only when the children begged for a few rin wherewith to buy sweets or a toy that the parents felt the pinch of their poverty. In the spring of the following year (1908) Sadako lost her job at the Tooth-powder Factory, but she was almost immediately taken on at a Hat-Factory in Kōshi Kawa, where her wages were considerably higher.

But in March of that same year they lost their eldest child, and a few weeks later they buried Sadako's mother. Two months less to feed, but man's happiness does not consist in the abundance of what he has to eat, and it was with genuine grief and sorrow that they put aside two of the objects of their care and labour.

One day in October, Sadako said to her husband, "I wish I had not to go out to work to day." But she went all the same, though with considerable effort. A few hours later they brought her home on a shutter. Her dress had caught in the wheel of a machine, she had been drawn in, and severely mangled. Sōtarō rushed at once for a doctor, but it was too late. When he got back to his house she was already dead, and Sōtarō was left alone to face the unequal struggle against the calamities of life.

VII.—THE SMELL OF MEDICINE.

A few hours after poor Sadako's death, his good friend Sumita Rokuro came to make enquiries. He had heard rumours of the accident, and had concluded that Sōtarō himself was dead. It was a great shock to him to find that it was Sadako, the strong and industrious, the brave heart, that fought a losing battle with so much perseverance, had been taken, while the delicate, weakly shifty Sōtarō had been left to care for the surviving children.

What was to be done? Sōtarō had no money to pay for Sadako's funeral. No more had Sumita, for he had left the employ of the hospital, and had been for a long time out of work, owing to asthma. Sumita bethought him of a plan and went off to beg for charity from a well-known philanthropist who had once known Sadako. But the philanthropist knew nothing of Sumita nor yet, perhaps, much good of Sōtarō, and, looking at the poor clothes in which Sumita pleaded the case of his friend, concluded that the story was an impostor's fabrication, and refused to listen. So Sumita returned to his friend, having accomplished nothing. Still, the dead could not remain unburied in the house, so the generous Sumita pawned some of his own furniture and clothes, and thus raised the small sum that was needed for the interment. They buried her the next morning and the rain that fell in torrents from the dull grey sky was not more gloomy than the hearts of the mourners.

What a sad house it was to which Sōtarō returned that evening. He laid himself down to sleep beside his two little children, and his heart ached as though it would burst as he thought that he alone must henceforth be the protector of those helpless lives.

And the children could not sleep. "Mother's medicine," they said, referring to the disinfectants, "mother's medicine smells so strong. Won't you take it away? We cannot sleep."

"Ah!" said the poor man, at the end of his wits for a proper answer to make. "Mother's medicine is the only thing of Mother's that we have left. We should pray for the smell to remain with us, that we may always have something to remind us of her."

III.—SOTARŌ'S CONSUMPTION IS CURED.

After Sadako's death, Sōtarō's despairing mind again turned to thoughts of suicide. His one happiness, the society of his loving wife, had been taken from him. What would life be to him without her? It was true, there were the children. But the children would be better off without him, for if he died some kind soul would surely step in to rescue them. Was not God the protector of the fatherless?

He almost persuaded himself by arguments such as these, to do what as a christian, he knew to be a crime. But the same christian faith showed him the comforting fact of God's providence, and he resolved to trust himself and his own once more to that good providence that had helped him hitherto.

He determined at this time to withdraw himself as far as possible from the world and to live only for religion. A Buddhist temple seemed to be the most obvious place of refuge, but he knew that in a temple he would find no welcome. He has been trained among Protestants, but he disliked the ways of what he called the "pulpiters" (who, perhaps, also had begun to see through him) and shrunk from turning to them for the help he needed. He turned to the Roman Church which in Japan, as elsewhere, is noted for its large heart of charity, and he was not disappointed. He called on a Roman Catholic priest (a Japanese) and asked for advice. The priest said to him, "you, with your children dependent on you cannot retire from the world and enter religion. Go forth again, and make another fight for success. I will help you all I can. You may leave your boy here, and I will take charge of him. And I will pray for you."

So Sōtarō left his boy with this truly Christian-hearted priest, and with his little four year old daughter, went forth once more to seek his fortune, knowing that now he would have to work himself for what he ate.

And then a strange thing happened. A very few days after his interview with the priest Sōtarō suddenly found that he was healed. He had had no medicine for a long time, and there was nothing to make a recovery probable. But he had gone forth to seek his fortune, and perhaps the priest's prayer had been joined to the priest's faith. And another strange thing happened. He went, with his courage renewed, to call on a friend whom he had not seen for many long years. The friend was a novelist of the fleshly school which pretends to expound nature, and Sōtarō's expostulations in the past had caused an estrangement.

When he reached his friend's door, the man came out. "Mr. Oshima," he exclaimed, "I am glad to see you. I have long wanted to tell you that my heart is changed and that I have given up writing those fleshly novels." He did not help Sōtarō, but Sōtarō gave him much advice and encouragement, a fact which may have had something to do with the closing of the novelist's pockets.

The rest that remains can be spoken in a few words. He found a home ultimately at Oji with his firm friend Sumida. But Sumida was very poor, and it was at Sumida's instance, and in order to do something towards keeping the pot boiling, that he put up the fortune-telling signboard with which this story began. The fortune-telling has not been a success: but the English school has, and Sōtarō is now able to live without anxiety.

Several of his friends have urged him, now that he is doing well to remove the Fortune-teller's signboard that still adorns his gate post. But he always refuses to do so.

"No," he says "I will not take it down. Every now and again somebody comes to consult me. I take no fees, and when people come I am able to give them some very excellent advice."

Excellent indeed, so far as it goes; but there is a further question behind it. That sudden recovery from a long, standing sickness, supposing it to have been genuine, and not the voluntary laying aside of a faked complaint, may it not have been sent in order that the recipient might be able to serve out the sentence pronounced on him by the Court of Justice, and then postponed? And would not the voluntary surrender of himself to the authorities be the very best way of securing for himself rehabilitation and permanent prosperity?

An explosion took place in Hiogo harbour on the morning of the 8th inst. A tin of petroleum blew up in some way in the engine room of the S.S. Oro Maru (1910 tons), belonging to the Tatsuma Shokai, which is anchored in Hiogo bay. The crew succeeded in extinguishing the flames. It appears that a stoker was transferring to the tank the contents of ten tins of petroleum which were purchased yesterday morning, and stupidly lit a candle. The stoker, a man named Iwata Soichi, was badly burnt about the face and hands.

NOTICE TO MARINERS.

TIBET.

London, August 12.

It is reported that the situation in Tibet is improving. The activity of the Chinese is decreasing. It is doubtful whether British troops will cross the frontier.

MAYOR GAYNOR.

Mayor Gaynor is progressing favourably. STRIKE IN GERMAN SHIP-YARDS. The strike at Hamburg is developing great proportions. There is a lock-out at Bremerhaven affecting the progress of 15 warships.

THE "TERRA NOVA" OVERDUE.

The Antarctic exploration ship Terra Nova is eleven days overdue at Cape Town. There is some anxiety, though the delay is possibly due to the fact that she is proceeding principally under sail.

CHINESE POLICE SYSTEM.

The Chinese Minister Lientai is raising a loan with a view to remodelling the Chinese police system on English lines.

THE JAMESON RAID.

DEFENDED BY ITS LEADER.

London, August 11.

Dr. Jameson, Premier of South Africa, speaking at Durban, and referring to the Raid, said that although it was badly carried out and thoroughly deserving of punishment, it was, nevertheless, a step in the direction of federation. It was not sought by the Raid to replace Dutchmen by Englishmen.

Later.

Dr. Jameson's speech is regarded as a tactical error. It has pleased neither British nor Dutch.

MILITARY TRAINING.

SWISS SYSTEM ADVOCATED.

Mr. Smuts, Minister of Defence, speaking at Pretoria, advocated the military training of citizens on Swiss lines.

ATLANTIC FISHERIES CASE.

HEARING AT THE HAGUE CONCLUDED.

London, August 13.

The hearing of the arguments at The Hague in the Anglo-American arbitration of the Newfoundland Fisheries, which have been proceeding since the 2nd June, is now concluded. Judgment is expected to be delivered on the 1st prox.

FOREIGN ADVISERS FOR PERSIA.

Reuter's Teheran correspondent reports that the Cabinet is proposing the employment of foreign advisers, and suggests that Frenchmen should be attached to the Department of the Interior, Italians to the gendarmerie, and Egyptians to the Department of Justice.

LIEUT. SUTOR RELEASED.

HIS PAMPHLET SELLING FREELY.

London, August 13.

Lieut. Sutor, who was arrested on the 7th inst. for publishing a pamphlet on War Office mismanagement, has been released from close arrest. The pamphlet is selling freely, and is in great demand.

AERONAUTICS.

A NEW HEIGHT RECORD.

The aviator Drexel has attained an altitude of 6,570 feet, a world's record.

A PILGRIMAGE OF LOVE.

LIEUT. ALEXANDER'S FIANCEE TO VISIT HIS GRAVE.

The fiancée of Lieut. Boyd Alexander, who was murdered on the May 20th by natives in the Western Sudan, has sailed from England for the purpose of placing a marble cross on her lover's grave near Lake Chad. The young lady is a daughter of Sir Reginald McLeod. The journey is one that no white woman has ever accomplished.

BROKER FRAUD IN NEW YORK.

New York.—The broker Wintemale has been arrested on a charge of fraudulent use of mails in connection with the Gold Run Mining Company of Colorado, whereby he is alleged to have cleared over a million dollars. There are many English people among his victims, some of them members of the aristocracy.

London, August 15

The armoured cruiser Duke of Edinburgh, which ran aground on a shoal off the Isle of Wight, has been refloated, it is understood, undamaged.

OBITUARY.

Miss Florence Nightingale.

[The heroine of the Crimean War had reached the ripe age of 90. It will be remembered that she was enrolled by King Edward in 1907 as one of the original members of the Order of Merit.—ED. J.M.]

A FLEET OF AEROPLANES.

FRENCH WAR MINISTER ORDERS FIFTY.

The French War Minister has ordered 50 aeroplanes of various types, and is organizing a legion of aviators. A credit of 2,000,000 francs is asked from the 1911 budget.

FIRE IN THE BRUSSELS EXHIBITION.

London, August 15.

The British, French, and Belgian sections in the Brussels Exhibition have been annihilated by fire, and other buildings partly destroyed. Twenty or thirty persons were injured. The British loss includes a loaned collection valued, for insurance purposes, at hundred thousand pounds.

SPAIN AND THE VATICAN.

There is marked dissatisfaction among leading Cardinals in that Cardinal Merry-du-val failed to consult the congregations respecting the policy of the Vatican towards Spain. There was even thought of presenting a collective remonstrance to the Pope, but after deep consideration this project was abandoned.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT IN FRANCE.

Thirty-two persons were killed and fifty-five injured when a collision occurred between an excursion and a goods train at Sanjon, France. The first two coaches, which were full of girls composing a school party, were splintered and the occupants mangled.

AMBASSADOR NICOLSON'S SPEECH.

At a farewell banquet to Sir Arthur Nicolson at St. Petersburg, the retiring Ambassador said that he was leaving St. Petersburg feeling perfectly assured of the relations between Russia and Great Britain which, in his opinion, could not be more friendly. Both governments, he added, were determined to work for their common interests.

GERMAN SECRETARY FOR COLONIES LEAVES FOR JAPAN.

London, August 16.

Herr Dernburg left Berlin to-day for Tokyo overland via Vladivostok.

THE FIRE AT BRUSSELS.

The Italian section is partly destroyed. 460 other sections are slightly damaged. All documents of the Judging Committee have been burned.

Later.

Strong boxes containing jewels valued at £600,000 in the Belgian section have been found intact.

Fortunately a number of priceless pictures were housed in a special exhibition two miles away.

The British losses fall chiefly on Lloyds who compute the loss at not more than half a million pounds. One estimate places the total loss at four millions pounds sterling.

THE GRAND VIZIER AT MARIENBAD.

The Grand Vizier at Marienbad conferred with Baron Aehrenthal one and a half hours.

MUTINY OF PRISONERS AT ALEXANDRIA.

The mutiny of four hundred prisoners at the Hadra prison in Alexandria has been suppressed rigorously, one prisoner being killed and six injured.

GERMAN STEAMER WRECKED.

London, August 17.

Lloyds at East London reports that the German East African liner Khedive struck at Cape Morgan and was abandoned. The steamer is thought to be a total loss. All of the crew were saved except the Third officer, who was drowned.

BRITISH SECTION AT BRUSSELS EXHIBITION.

A consultation is in progress regarding the rebuilding of the British section at Brussels.

CHILEAN PRESIDENT DEAD.

President Pedro. Montt of Chile died suddenly, at Bremen, of heart failure.

THE REPUBLICAN CRISIS IN U.S.

The New York state committee unanimously appointed Vice-President Sherman temporary chairman of the state convention, to meet at Saratoga, Sept. 27th, rejecting a motion to appoint ex-President Roosevelt.

AN ANGLO-GERMAN FUND.

It is announced from Berlin that Sir Ernest Cassel has given £200,000 sterling for a remembrance to King Edward, to be used to assist indigent Germans in England and indigent Britishers in Germany. This has been given in the hope of improving Anglo-German relations. The trustees named are their Majesties the King of England and Emperor of Germany.

BURIAL OF MISS FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

London, August 17.

There is a strong desire among the men of the British Army that the remains of the late Miss Florence Nightingale be buried in Westminster Abbey. Miss Nightingale's own desire was that the character and place of burial should be of the quietest description.

TERRA NOVA ARRIVES AT CAPETOWN.

The Terra Nova, reported overdue on the 12th inst., has arrived safely at Capetown, all well. The vessel was delayed in taking magnetic observations.

THE "IKOMA" AT BREST.

Brest.—An official dinner was given in honour of the officers of the Ikoma, and toasts of the two navies were exchanged.

GERMAN TORPEDO CRAFT IN COLLISION.

Kiel.—The torpedo-vessel A 32 rammed the destroyer A76 and both sank. The crews, however, were saved.

THE AUSTRIAN EMPEROR.

CELEBRATES 80TH BIRTHDAY.

Later.

The Emperor Francis-Joseph held the celebration of his 80th birthday at Ischl which culminated yesterday evening in blazing bonfires throughout the Empire.

QUEEN VICTORIA DECORATED.

Madrid.—The Cabinet has conferred the Grand Cross on Queen Victoria for her public benefices and particularly in recognition of the charity shown by her to the wounded and dead at Melilla.

PROPOSED STRIKE OF SAILORS.

Copenhagen.—The leader of the sailors' and firemen's union has announced that, at the International Congress here on the 23rd inst., a fortnight's strike of European sailors and firemen will be declared. The strike is necessary owing to the desperate conditions under which the men are working. They are willing, however, to negotiate with the shipowners.

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE TOKYO "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

THE GERMAN CROWN PRINCE.

London, August 11.

Berlin.—The forthcoming tour of the Crown Prince to the Far East is everywhere favourably received. It is stated that during his stay in Tokyo for a fortnight His Highness will be the guest of the Japanese Emperor. The German authorities apparently desire the tour to be regarded as devoid of any political purpose.

NATIONALIZATION OF MINES.

Brussels.—The International Miners Congress has unanimously approved the nationalization of mines.

"THE TIMES" SUPPLEMENT.

YOKOHAMA AND KOBE HARBOURS.

The Engineering Supplement of The Times publishes detailed accounts of the harbour improvements at Yokohama and Kobe.

MAYOR GAYNOR.

POLITICAL EFFECT OF HIS ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION.

London, August 12.

New York.—Increasing suggestions are being made that Mayor Gaynor will be the next Democratic candidate for the Presidency. It is frequently remarked that the attempted murder will make him President. This is probably an exaggeration, but the value of the incident as a political asset is unmistakable.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S WESTERN TOUR.

Washington.—While in sober circles it is not believed that Roosevelt is likely to be disloyal to the President in his approaching western tour, it is thought that it will involve playing a difficult and dangerous game which for a politician less adroit than Roosevelt would probably end in further republican divisions.

GERMAN SHIPBUILDING STRIKE.

London, August 14.

Hamburg.—All private shipbuilding yards in Germany, except the so-called West-Prussian yards at Dantzig and Elbing, have struck, 35,000 men being affected. The labour guilds demand a 15 per cent. increase of wages. Both sides are strongly organized and the employers favour reprisals.

FIRE AT BRUSSELS EXHIBITION.

Brussels.—The British and Belgian sections at the Exhibition have been destroyed by fire. The other pavilions are undamaged.

THE FRANCO-GERMAN FRONTIER.

Paris—Attention is drawn to the systematic development of the German fortifications on the left bank of the Rhine. Railways are being built along the Belgian (Luxemburg) frontier.

FIRE AT THE BRUSSELS EXHIBITION.

London, August 16.

The Brussels' fire has been extinguished. The entire British and part of the Belgian and French sections have been destroyed. Twenty people were injured.

LOSSES AT BRUSSELS.

London, August 17.

Reports from Brussels are to the effect that the losses by fire amount to about £2,000,000. It is thought the fire was started by a night watchman lighting his pipe.

THE NEW YORK CONVENTION.

ROOSEVELT REJECTED AS CHAIRMAN.

The New York Republican State Committee rejected the suggestion that Ex-President Roosevelt be appointed Temporary Chairman of the State Convention and recommended Vice President Sherman.

SIR ERNEST CASSEL'S ENDOWMENT.

Sir Ernest Cassel has proposed to establish as a memorial to King Edward an Anglo-German Institute for finding employment and assisting Englishmen in Germany and Germans in England and offers to donate £2,000,000.

CHOLERA IN RUSSIA.

St. Petersburg reports that the cholera is fast declining in the city. Passengers for Moscow are required to show a medical certificate. The epidemic in the provinces is unabated and reports show 81,000 cases.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

London, August 18.

Japanese securities are well supported. Nagoya stock has risen.

THE NEW TURKISH BATTLESHIPS.

EFFECT ON THE NAVAL SITUATION.

Paris.—Le Temps points out that the addition of four German battleships to the Turkish Navy must prove detrimental to Greece both on sea and land. Russia will also have to consider the possibility of a naval movement from the Bosphorus.

ASIATIC EXCLUSION IN B.C.

Later.

Vancouver.—A deputation of the Labour Union has asked Sir W. Laurier to raise the Chinese poll-tax from $500 to 1000, urging that all future legislation should tend to the exclusion of all Asiatics.

Sir W. Laurier replied that the Government is forced to consider diplomatic relations with the Orient and the general welfare of Canada, besides the peculiar labour requirement of British Columbia.

"THE TIMES" ON JAPAN'S DEVELOPMENT.

The Times liberally compliments and reviews in high terms of praise a history of the political development of Japan by Etsujiro Uyehara, which it describes as absolutely trustworthy, though scarcely doing justice to the great services of Ito, who transformed Japan, formerly called a nation of poor fishermen, into a world-power and a pacific rival of the mightiest realms.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.) LONG-CONTINUED RAIN IN CHIENTAO.

Chientao, August 17.

Owing to the long-continued rain since the 12th instant in this district, the rivers have risen and ferry-boat traffic on the Tumen River has been suspended since the 14th. Postal service between Kwaiyong and Chientao has been interrupted, while telegraphic communication is not affected. As the weather has cleared since yesterday, the rivers will subside in a few days.

THE FIRST LORD'S ANSWER.

Baron Saito, Minister of the Navy, sent a few days ago a telegram of thanks to England with regard to the kindness accorded the men of the Ikoma. The First Lord of the British Admiralty, replying to the above, wired yesterday a long telegram to express his deep gratitude at the receipt of the Japanese telegram, and stated that the visit of such a powerful warship as the Ikoma was heartily welcomed by the British navy. He also stated the pleasure he had derived from his interviews with brave Japanese officers and men.

[SPECIAL TO THE "JAPAN MAIL."] THE FLOODS AT KARUIZAWA.

MUCH DAMAGE: THE FOOD SUPPLY RUNNING LOW.

Karuizawa, August 14, 4.40 p.m.*

The rain for the past five days can only be compared to a continuous cloud burst. The destruction is far greater than formerly, i.e., in August three years ago. The east side of the village has been partly washed out, but the flood in the main street has been stopped. Pedley's, Klingman's and some Japanese houses have been destroyed. Big landslides and broken bridges are reported from Yokogawa. At Karuizawa some lives have been lost and the citizens are continuously at work building dams. A public meeting was called to-day and a committee appointed to investigate the scarcity of provisions. Food is needed but the flood is subsiding.

The Turkish Minister of Finance will remain at Berlin during the coming week to negotiate with German financiers.

THE NEW MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Herr. von Kidelin Waechter, the new German Minister for Foreign Affairs, has given a banquet in honour of the Press, at which he made a speech emphasising the great bearing of German financial successes at Paris on the relations of both countries.

A DIFFICULTY WITH TURKEY.

The crossing of the Bulgarian frontier by Macedonians is still continuing. All Bulgarian attempts to induce the Powers to intervene in favour of Bulgaria against Turkey have been without any success until now.

MEETING OF MINISTERS.

Aehrenthal, the Austrian Minister for Foreign Affairs, will have a meeting with Marquis Giuliano, the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs, at Salzburg on August 29th. The latter will be received by Emperor Francis Joseph at Ischl on September 1st.

CHINA.

Berlin, August 13.

The agreement of the Chinese Government to take part in the Hygienic Exhibition, which will be held at Dresden next year, has been received very favourably in Germany.

A RUMOUR CONTRADICTED.

The Koelnische Zeitung very strongly contradicts the statement of the Novoe Vremya, according to which the German Minister at Teheran, Count Quadt, is said to have determined to prevent all further blood shedding between the two hostile Persian parties.

HOLLAND.

Preparations are being made in grand style in Holland to celebrate the thirtieth birthday of Queen Wilhelmina on August 31st.

BELGIUM.

The King and Queen of Belgium will pay an official visit to Sofia on Sept. 14th and attend the Bulgarian manoeuvres.

PORTUGAL.

Berlin, August 14.

Prince Friedrich Leopold will go to Lisbon on Aug. 24th to present the High Order of the Black Eagle to the King of Portugal.

SIBERIAN MAILS.

Siberian mails, will dates up to July 30th, arrived at Berlin on August 19th.

TURKEY.

A peaceful outcome of the tension between Turkey and Bulgaria may be expected.

THE CROWN PRINCE'S TOUR.

The diplomatic representatives of Japan and China have expressed their Governments' great pleasure in the coming visit of the German Crown Prince to Tokyo and Peking.

DEPARTURE OF GENERAL YIN-CHANG.

General Yin-Chang, the former Chinese

Minister at Berlin and new Minister for War, has left Berlin for Peking via Siberia, being accompanied to the station by the new Minister Liancheng and practically the whole of the Chinese colony. Secretary Wang is accompanying the General to Moscow.

THE FLOODS.

The German Press reports extensively the great inundations which have taken place in Japan.

BELGIUM.

Berlin, August 15

A great fire, caused by a short circuit in the lighting apparatus, has destroyed a great part of the Brussels Exhibition. Great excitement prevailed amongst exhibitors and visitors, but no loss of life is reported. The stands and exhibits of Belgium, Italy, France and Great Britain are completely destroyed. The German section is as yet untouched by the conflagration, which is still raging.

Later.

According to later reports the departments of Denmark, Norway, Austria, Japan and China were also destroyed by the fire at the Brussels Exhibition, those of Germany and Spain being fully and that of Italy partially saved. The so-called Old Brussel Quarter was completely wiped out. The Exhibition will probably not be closed, and attempts will be made to replace the exhibits as soon as possible.

Later.

According to latest reports from Brussels the pavilions of Japan, China, America, Austria and Russia, besides the International Machine Hall, have been saved, but the archives of the Exhibition are lost. The King returned to Brussels immediately after having been informed of the conflagration. The magistrates of the city of Berlin expressed their sympathy to the city of Brussels and to the Belgian Government.

AUSTRIA.

The Karer Lake Hotel in Tirol has been completely destroyed by fire, 400 guests of the hotel being homeless.

FRANCE.

A special train, carrying the girl students of a boarding school, collided with a goods train between Bordeaux and Royau, the result being that 60 of those in the passenger train, were killed.

The programme of the visit of President Fallières to Berne has been curtailed owing to the railway accident near Bordeaux, by which so many lives were lost.

GERMANY.

Ex-Secretary of State for the Colonies Dernburg has left for the Far East.

Berlin August 16.

The Kaiser has sent a telegram of sympathy to King Albert of Belgium as to the loss suffered by the conflagration at the Brussels Exhibition. The German Government has also expressed its sympathy with the Belgians through the German Minister. The part of the Exhibition which has not been destroyed by the fire has been reopened to-day. The scene of the conflagration will be converted into a park.

German and French celebrations on the battlefields around Metz have been held in memory of the battles of 1870.

Between the Kaiser and President Fallières very sympathetic and grateful messages have been exchanged as to the latest railway accident, which has taken place near Bordeaux.

TURKEY.

Djavid Bey, the Turkish Minister for Finance, on his way back from Berlin to Constantinople, has paid a visit to Hakki Bey, the Grand Vizier, now staying at Marienbad, with whom he had an extended conference. The rumour, according to which he was said to have suggested the convocation of a Crete Conference at Berlin, is not based on facts.

RUSSIA.

The Tsar and Tsaritzza have ordered a crown to be made at Moscow for Prince Nikita Montenegro, who will be invested with royal honours this October.

The Russian Minister for Commerce has instituted an information office to impart knowledge of Russian trade with foreign countries.

SIR ERNEST CASSEL'S FUND.

Berlin, August 17.

Sir Ernest Cassel, in memory of King Edward and as a token of respect for the Kaiser, has given 4 million marks for the support of indigent Englishmen in Germany and Germans in England, who are seeking employment. The trusteeship of the foundation has been offered to the Kaiser and Kaiserin and to the King and Queen of England.

TURKEY.

Turkey and Bulgaria have come to an understanding as to Macedonian fugitives to Bulgaria.

A RICA.

The steamer Khedive, of the Deutsch Ostafrika Line has run aground at Cape Morgan and has had to be abandoned.

The King and Queen of Belgium have returned from Brussels to their summer residence. The Exhibition will be continued.

FRANCE.

The aviator Leblanc has won the 100,000 francs prize in the French aeronautic circular flight competition.

RUSSIA.

Cholera and plague are still further increasing in many parts of Russia.

DESTRUCTIVE FLOODS IN KARUIZAWA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Karuizawa, August 12th.

Karuizawa has just been visited by what may probably be regarded as the most destructive flood in its history. The volume of water was not so great as the flood of three years ago, but the streams were more concentrated and the results consequently much more destructive.

The rain began on Sunday evening, and until Thursday morning it poured with a fury that can only be likened to a continuous cloudburst. On Wednesday afternoon the water began to rise; and while the volume coming down the valley by the Mikasa Hotel was great, it was soon seen that the main danger lay not in the place of former destruction, but in the valley North, running from Fujimi to the village; and by nine o'clock on Wednesday night the village itself was threatened. Every man, both foreign and Japanese, turned out to make an attempt at damming the water out of the new course it had formed bearing in upon the village. At first it tried to make down the main street past the English Church, but that being stopped, the volume of water in the ravine in front of Mr. F. Sale's residence so increased that it was now apparent that it would soon make a way through the village instead of across the plain past the Mampei Hotel, its old course. After some hours of intense endeavour the volume seemed to be turned in the direction desired, but about ten o'clock the dam burst with a tremendous rush of water and the flood made down the main street of Karuizawa village. Nearly every house and shop on the south-east side of the village was almost instantly under water up to the first story. The authorities sent men around rousing the people but most of them did not have time to save all their moveables. In a short time the water had undermined several houses, chiefly the dwellings of Karuizawa residents, and one or two were carried away. During Thursday the residence of the Rev. H. Pedley fell, and most of the people in the southern part of the place had vacated their homes. The Karuizawa tennis courts are buried under some six feet of gravel and most of the houses in that vicinity have from two to four feet of sand on the floor. But the experience of some hundreds of people in the midst of the furious downpour on Wednesday night, flying for their lives and seeking refuge among their neighbours in the northern part of the village, was pathetic in the extreme.

During the whole of Thursday and Friday the village was in a great state of excitement, as it was not yet known what course the water might take next. It rushed like a mill-race down the main street of the village all the forenoon of Thursday, but by evening it had lowered considerably in the main stream, and had been quite turned off the main street of the village. There was still danger, however that it might again invade the village, taking the main street near the English Church. The men worked a great part of Thursday night making a dam to prevent this, because if the full force turned down the street the entire village would be wiped out in a short time.

A good part of Friday was spent in trying to dam the current so as to turn it once more into its old course; for if it were allowed to make a new course behind the village instead of going across the plain by the Mampei Hotel, the future of the village and all the property in that vicinity would be greatly endangered. This was the most difficult undertaking of all; and during its operation there were some hair-breadth escapes from drowning. Some of the men grew more excited than men are wont, and plunged in where it was folly to venture. One foreign gentleman got caught between the full force of the current and a heavy piece of timber that was thrown across to back up the dam under construction, and only the bravery of two policemen who ventured after him, saved his life. The degree of sacrifice shown by foreigners and Japanese alike was truly admirable. Most remarkable of all was the crowd of foreign ladies engaged in the work of passing stones and carrying branches for the building of the dams. The amount of work done by these ladies, most of it under a blazing sun, was astonishing, and indeed it is difficult not to believe that so much extraordinary effort could have been maintained as long as it was, only at the expense of health. Other ladies prepared coffee and tea, and had it passed to the men who had for hours been standing in the cold rush of water, and were almost exhausted.

The flood of three years ago left but little mark on the village proper, but this flood having gone through the heart of the residential centre, will considerably change the appearance of this part of the village. The tennis courts, buried as they are beyond recognition, can never be restored in so attractive a form; while the main street of the village has a valley cut down the middle about four feet deep. This of course can be filled in, but it might probably be cheaper to lower the level of the whole street. The grounds of all the pretty residences on the South and East sides of the village are covered with sand and gravel, and it will be some years before they can resume their former appearance.

The flood ought to impress on Karuizawa residents more than ever the wisdom of building on the higher slopes of the district. From the experience of three years ago, as well as from the present one, it is clear that only at a tremendous risk can houses be erected on the plains, especially in the vicinity of streams. In spite of the danger threatened by the former flood, as well as the damage actually done by it, several foreigners bought land and built houses on the plains this year; and some of these were damaged by the present visitation. Of course it might be a great many years before another such misfortune; but people said that three years ago, and here we have another flood more menacing than the last.

The railway line has now been interrupted for nearly a week and provisions are running short. We have had no mail for some days. There was a report that letters and the more important postal matter were being carried over the Usui Pass from Yokogawa, but we have seen nothing of it. The people of the village have been so excited by the damage done by the flood that they have had no time to think of anything. As all the wells and streams were killed with mud, no water could be had for the boiling of rice, and many of the people have had to go hungry. On Wednesday when the water began to rise, many of the foreigners, remembering the inconvenience of the last flood, went into the village and bought up a great part of the stock of canned goods, such as butter, milk and meat, while others, not so wide awake, had to go without. Now that the flood is over, the latter will have the satisfaction of living on fresh food, while those overstocked with canned goods will have to live on these or sell out at a discount.

Trade goes slowly in Karuizawa; it went slowly before the flood and it will probably go more slowly after the flood. At the opening of the present season a foreign lady had the misfortune to arrive in the village with nothing smaller than ten yen notes. She went out to make purchases to stock the pantry but no one in the place could break so large a note. In fact her position was such that although she had plenty of money it was no more use to her than it would have been to Robinson Crusoe. The happy thought struck her that she would go the post office and write to her husband to send up some small change; but the post office could not, or would not, make change for so enormous a sum as ten yen, so the unfortunate lady was cut off from that resource. Then she went to the station and attempted to go to Komoro to get the bank there to break the bill; but the station master could not break so large a bill, and she was again defeated. At last in her extremity she met some one who agreed to lend her the price of a ticket to Komoro, and by this expedient she at last succeeded in getting change for a ten yen bill. This experience could hardly be duplicated elsewhere, I venture to say. There is no doubt that at the present moment if some of the merchants were enterprising enough to get certain goods and provisions across the pass they could make something on the speculation. There is no danger of being thrown into straits, however, as there is plenty of food of a kind. "SEMPER IDEM."

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

In the middle of last month three articles appeared in the Tōkyō Nichi Nichi Shinbun signed "Akamon Chinjin" entitled "The Lifelessness of the College of Literature in the Imperial University." For the last few years we have heard constant complaints among High School teachers of the inferiority of literary students to all other classes. According to the Nichi Nichi Shinbun this subject was discussed at the Conference of High School Directors last year, when Mr. Iwasaki, Director of the Seventh High School, said that among literary students entering High Schools there were occasionally men of first-class ability, but men of second-class ability, or third-class ability were wanting. The majority of those who entered were fifth-rate or sixth-rate men only. Notwithstanding this, while students of medicine, law, engineering and the like enter High Schools in the proportion of one to every five or even one to every ten applicants, the literary students are entering at the rate of one to every two or three applicants. The writer we are quoting is of opinion that though the spirit of the age does not favour literary pursuits, though literature as a profession is by no means a lucrative one in this country, the lack of vitality in the College of Literature attached to the Tōkyō Imperial University is to be traced to the teaching Faculty there. Whatever influence they may have exercised in past times, according to this authority, who is evidently connected with the University, Doctors Inoue, Nakajima, Tsuboi, Hoshino, Ueda and Mikami are now behind the age and are no longer regarded as leaders of thought: (Shoshi wa konnichi ni oite wa mohaya jidai wo shidō suru no chikara wo shōshitsu shite shimatte oru). This may be seen by examining the books in which professors of literature allow their names to appear. These works will certainly be forgotten two decades hence. If the Literary College has any ornaments to-day, they are to be found in the personalities of Professor Koeber and Dr. Mōtoro, in Dr. Shiratori's Tōyō-shi, Dr. Mikami's Kokushi, Dr. Ueda's Kōshin Hikitate and Dr. Haga's Isshū no Rakuten.

Another cause of the present unprosperous state of the College of Literature is the unpopularity of the President. The Professors under him say that he lacks common-sense, that at the meetings of the Faculty it often happens that no resolutions are passed after discussion, and that when they are passed, they do not go into operation because they are not properly stated to Dr. Hamao, the President of the University, and so on.

The means for carrying on learned investigations connected with the College are according to "Akamon Chinjin" quite inadequate. The rooms are not provided for special study and there is no money available for paying assistants when extensive research has to be made. Another thing complained of in the articles we are reviewing is the small salaries received by talented lecturers in the employ of the College. Apparently these men are expected to be content with the honour attached to the posts they occupy. Dr. Murakami Sensei (the eminent Buddhist scholar) receives about 20 or 25 yen a month. Comparatively young men like Hayashi (Koyanagi), Sasaki, Katō, Hatano and Hidehara have allowances granted to them ranging from 30 to 20 or even 15 yen a month. But there are lecturers at the University who get no compensation at all, not being certain even of an allowance for jinrikisha hire (Kurumachin ni mo naru ka naranu shimatsu). It is no wonder then that such lecturers should absent themselves as frequently as possible and make money in other ways.

Another grievance at the College of Literature is the attitude of the College authorities to the younger generation of lecturers, which is oppressive in the extreme (Kōshin wo yokuatsu suru koto hanahadashiki koto wo nobenakereba naranu). There is much that is objectionable in the favouritism shown in the selection of young lecturers. Though many of them are unpaid, were they used differently, they would in most cases be willing to deliver lectures for the sake of making a reputation, but as matters are now they are discontented. One thing they and others complain of is the neglect of the Professors to examine the essays they have sent in with the object of obtaining Doctors' degrees. The reason given for the delay in doing this is that the work of the examiners has been allowed to fall so much in arrear that they have not yet passed judgment on essays that were received by them four or five years ago. Among the men waiting to hear the verdict of the examiners is a favourite of Dr. Inoue, Mr. Yoshida Kumaji. It is said that promising young men have ceased to send in essays for the Doctor's degree to the Professors of the College of Literature, since there seems to be no hope of their being dealt with promptly.

As things are now there is no promising future for graduates in Literature at the Imperial Universities. Positions in provincial Middle Schools are the best they can hope for, and without the aid of Doctors Haga and Ueda they find it by no means easy to get appointed to Middle Schools. As for promotion to the rank of a University professor,—waiting for that is "like waiting for the clarification of the Yellow River." According to "Akamon Chinjin" the situation at the Imperial Universities, as far as literature is concerned, is just this: there is little attraction offered to students either of a material or mental kind. The old Professors have grown sleepy and younger men are given no scope for the exercise of their powers. Things are no better in Kyōto than they are in Tōkyō. It is said to be doubtful whether the number of literary graduates entering the University this year will be equal to that of the Professors employed there.

In an article on the circulation of capital in Japan, which appeared in a recent number of the Tōkyō Keizai Zasshi, it is asserted on the best authority that it is only in the great cities of the Empire that money has become cheaper. Very high interest on loans is still paid in the provinces. To meet this situation agricultural and industrial banks have been established hither and thither. An official belonging to the Home Office is quoted by the Keizai Zasshi as asserting that these banks confer no benefit on small farmers, that it is only big property-holders that obtain loans from them at low rates of interest. But this assertion is denied by the Finance Department, which asserts that in certain cases small farmers have had money supplied to them on easy terms. In this that our endorsement of Mr. BALFOUR'S warning related to the Japanese tariff. As a matter of fact, the sentence quoted from our article occurred in the following context:—

It was inevitable that the same pressure which had driven Canada into negotiations with foreign Governments must, sooner or later, be felt by the other Dominions, and the consequence of this would be, the ex-Premier was certain, that such advantages of Preference as we now enjoyed at their hands would gradually be whittled away, faster or more slowly, until they vanished altogether. We do not think Mr. Balfour's warning is uncalled for. With things going as they are now, the day cannot be far distant when Great Britain will be to Greater Britain as a foreign Power.

We do not think that by such jugglery the Japan Herald will advance any cause it has at heart—if indeed, it has a cause at all, other than that of attacking a journal which defended it when it was damned—as it was recently—by its own nationals.

ON CALUMNY.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 15)
(COMMUNICATED.)

JUST as most men are disposed—if not of reason, then of instinct—to believe in the existence of a Supreme Being who marshals and inspires the forces of Good, so humanity is wont to concede the existence of an Evil Principle, exercising no little sway over the things of this world. The Evil Principle is personified in Holy Writ as one who delights in detailing, to their Creator, the sins and weaknesses of mankind. Hence the universal Vilifier has been called the Devil, because he maliciously accuses men before the God who made them. Unfortunately for the peace of the world and the happiness of mankind, the Devil has many human imitators. There are a multitude of men and women who have enrolled themselves as Companions of the Diabolic Order—ministers and handmaidens of the Father of Lies. It would be well if these servants of the Evil One were openly to declare themselves—if they wore some badge, in red and black, and suitably inscribed, to proclaim their true character and mission in life. However, they prefer to work in the dark—their weapons the secret stiletto and the poisoned cup, lest perchance, even in this mortal life, they should be called to account for their devilish deeds. Hence it comes that they prefer to choose for their victims, men and women too poor and weak, too disabled perhaps by circumstance, to pursue them with the horsewhip or the suit-at-law. Thus the spawn of Apollyon flourish greatly on the Earth, breeding in dark places, overwhelming every now and then some poor victim with their foul and hell-borne breath. Yet sometimes, greatly daring, they aim their poisonous shafts at some exalted one of the Earth, and revel in the richer dirt they raise. Strange, indeed, that the present-day history of England should have to chronicle the doings of the Diabolic Order, and mention, in its pages, aspersions cast upon a King. Even to such height of infamy have the whispering tongues of the Devil's Own risen in this year of grace, that they would besmirch, from its outset, the reign of a new Sovereign and drag his good name in the gutter of their own digging. Thus, say these purveyors of slander, King GEORGE of England is a bigamist. Far back in his life, there lurks the spectre of a morganatic marriage which Royalty has ever since conspired to hush up and bury in oblivion. This spectre it now pleases them to drag into the light of day. And more than that. Lest one dark lie should fail to damn the KING in the eyes of his four hundred million subjects, they circulate with their foul whispered breath, another—likewise wrought in the hellish factory of their own minds. The King is addicted to drink. Let us say now, while tracing the history of these lies, that for once the Companions of the Diabolic Order have over-reached themselves. They have injured their own abominable cause. It were better had they confined their vileness to the dark alley-ways of life than attempted to do the foul work of the pit in the fierce light that beats about a Throne. So monumental is the false structure they have rashly raised that the crash of its ruinous fall has drawn the attention of the world to the dark ways of those whose "feet make haste to shed innocent blood," and in consequence Apollyon himself must hide for a while his snakish head. This is the greater lie (we quote from a special article in the Review of Reviews on the King's Character):—

Prince George was married to an Admiral's daughter at Malta at a time when he never expected to be called to the Throne. The admiral is sometimes Admiral S—, Admiral T—, or Admiral L—. The marriage is declared to be canonically valid, as it was celebrated, so the story goes, in the English church by an Anglican chaplain in the presence of the whole ship's company, under whose crossed swords the young couple, who had just been made man and wife in contravention of the Royal Marriage Act, walked in bridal procession from the church. By this marriage, which is represented as one of passionate affection on both sides, the storytellers declare the King has had two children, and they were all living as happily as little birds in a nest when the death of his elder brother confronted Prince George with the horrible necessity of committing bigamy, according to the law of the Church, in order to provide the Empire with an heir who would be legitimate under the provisions of the Royal Marriage Act. The Queen Alexandra, in this elaborated romance, is said to have flung herself with tears at the feet of Queen Victoria, imploring that relentless old lady to waive the objection to a marriage with a subject. But she implored in vain. The Malta marriage was ignored. The Admiral's daughter and her two children were banished to some remote fastness in the wilds of Scotland, sometimes described as a lunatic asylum, where after a time the unhappy lady died. According to some versions, her father had previously committed suicide. But twice in every year the King is allowed to visit his two first-born children, who, however, are carefully hidden from the prying search of the curious.

That the lie was in a measure successful when first propagated is clear from the following letter, written from an Oxford college and addressed to the Editor of the above mentioned Review.

Oxford, July 9th, 1893.

Dear Sir,—I am approaching you on a strange subject, and yet a subject to which you can be no stranger, and this is the unpleasant rumours that are in circulation on every side regarding Prince George. You have no doubt heard the report that he is already married—to a niece of Admiral S—, it is said—and that he is the father of two children by this lady.

If this rumour is true it is quite time for the English people to speak out and to make it clear that such wickedness has legalised bigamy will not be tolerated in the Royal Family or elsewhere.

You are the only man in England whom I can approach on this subject and approach in the hope that you may be induced to examine into these reports, and, in case you find them without foundation, to put an end to their vile calumnies on our Royal Family; but if on the other hand you find them to be well founded and true—well, in that case I need not suggest to Mr. Stead the course most suitable to adopt. I need only assure you that you will have the bulk of right-minded English people at your back in any righteous attack you may make on the immoral and irreligious action of the Queen in this matter.

I still hope, however, that your investigations will prove rumour to be a groundless slander.

I will not apologise for bringing this subject before you, for the moral interests of the nation are in some measure a charge committed to the great journalists of our time, and in an especial degree to the former Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette.—Very faithfully yours.

Furthermore, when the marriage of Prince GEORGE with Princess MAY was announced, the Archbishop of Canterbury "was snowed under with letters of protest from all parts of the world where the legend of the Malta marriage had penetrated." Needless to say, rather than that it should lend itself to the commission of a crime against morality and against the law, the most rigid enquiry was made, on behalf of the Church, into the whole story. It was proved to be a myth, a lie from first to last. No one could find the marriage register, the clergyman who performed the ceremony, the Admiral whose daughter was thus sacrificed, nor the daughter herself, nor anyone who was present at the affair. In fact, the nearest they could get to first-hand evidence was that "somebody's cousin had been there," but that somebody's cousin proved to be a most elusive personage, who has not been discovered up to this day.

As to the charge against the KING's sobriety, its vagueness renders it the more difficult to disprove. That is the kind of lie in which the Companions of the Diabolic Order delight. We have heard of a "society" woman who set herself to persuade people that a certain man in the same community as herself was addicted to drink. The calumny was circulated in the approved manner of the Diabolic Order, by whispered house-to-house suggestion. Finally one less gullible medium requested details, for confirmation or embellishment, as the case may be. It was known that the victim was not a habitué of clubs or hotel-bars, nor did he "drink" with his meals. But this female handmaiden of the Evil One was not to be daunted by trifles. "He keeps a whisky-bottle under his bed," said she, "and inbibes secretly by night!" So, the circulators of the slander regarding the new King's intemperance in reality know nothing of his way of life. They merely wished to play the Devil's part, in adding, if possible, their quota to the sum of human misery—but of knowledge, there was none. The KING is known to take at times, but by no means as a habit, a glass of wine to his meals. It is even said that he has taken a night-cap of whisky and soda before retiring.

These are small things—of no significance whatever in themselves. But men have been labelled drunkards, in this and other parts of the world, for less than these. Like the recent “libelling” of a local Thespian, the thing is almost too contemptible to contradict. Nevertheless the ugly fact remains that there exist in each community a number of persons whose chief purpose in life is to blacken and destroy. Every Society has its flies, laden with filthy bacilli, delighting in their distribution. This is a fact that the modern world must recognize and deal with. Is it jealousy, personal or professional, that drives them to their diabolical work? Envy at another’s success, spite at some imaginary affront? Or is mere wicked, devilish love of dirt, and the flinging of it? It is useless to enquire; and, indeed, the motive matters little. The friends of Truth must fight that the Truth prevail; they must seek out the begetter of lies, and expose him and each of his lies as it is born. Thus the calumniator will be known, and all his works. Men will treat him as they would treat a leper, and the world will be the purer for every such pest exposed, every such plague-spot purged.

A QUESTION OF FACTS.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 16.)
OUR attention has been called to two lengthy articles in our German contemporary, taking exception to statements which appeared in the Japan Mail of the 22nd ult., with reference to the naval situation. The writer in the Herald, who describes himself as “a layman interested in naval affairs,” conducts the controversy with a courtesy and moderation which one would fain see more of in local journals. Nevertheless he arrives at certain conclusions at variance with ours, and adds:—“We call upon the Japan Mail to refute our results; or, if it must admit their correctness, to support our efforts towards a fair understanding as to a limitation of armaments, which, despite all its leading articles, original and communicated, it has hitherto not done.”
It seems to us that the whole question—so far as the present is concerned—is one of facts, and, this being so, one would suppose that dispute is impossible. There is, however, one element of uncertainty, and it lies in the circumstance that, in any estimate of naval strength, one has to allow a margin of time on account of ships in various stages of completion. When a publicist thus begins to draw upon the future, so to speak, he necessarily enters upon the realm of conjecture—of probability, rather than of accomplished fact. We ourselves have always endeavoured, in discussing this subject, to confine ourselves, in the first place, to facts and, in the second place, to reasonable probabilities estimated from past performances on the part of the Powers concerned. We simply desire that our readers should be presented with a true estimate of the situation, not only at the present moment, but as extending over the next two or three years. We do not desire, and we do not propose, to impute motives or deny freedom of action, to any of the competing Powers in the great naval race. But we shall willingly coöperate with any student of affairs, no matter of what nationality, in arriving at a just estimate of the situation.

Our contemporary begins by quoting the lengthy telegram sent by Reuter à propos of the recent Navy debate in the House of Commons. That telegram, correct in the main, set out with a blunder, in that it spoke of a “Shipbuilding Vote of £44,000,000.” That, of course, is absurd. The shipbuilding vote of the current estimates is, in round numbers, £15,000,000: the total of the estimates is £40,603,700, and the increase under the head of new construction is £4,400,000. Possibly it was this last figure that caused some confusion and gave rise to the figure actually telegraphed. We note that our layman friend sets much store by this colossal total of forty-four millions, which he describes as an increase of nine millions over the total of last year. But the facts are otherwise. The deduction of 1½ millions for naval works—annuity for repayment of previous loans for this purpose—brings the net total of the estimates for the current year to £39,280,000, which sum is actually less by £340,000 than the amount spent on the British navy in 1904, when the high-water mark in naval expenditure was reached. British naval expansion, therefore, at the present time—judged by one of the most reliable of tests, that of expenditure—is in reality more apparent than real.
To pass to the question of comparative strength, the Japan Mail’s assessment of which is disputed by our contemporary’s correspondent, our method of arriving at that estimate was plain enough. Commenting on the widely different estimates arrived at by political extremists, on one side or the other, we took as our foundation the figures supplied by a standard publication, and added thereto the ships known to be ordered or projected by the several Powers concerned. What we wrote in our article of the 22nd ult. was as follows:—
From these conflicting estimates of the situation it will be a relief to turn to one uncoloured by political sentiment, tried and impartial. We refer to that well-known standard publication, the Naval Annual, edited by the Hon. T. A. Brassey, the new issue of which has just reached us. In the chapter on “Comparative strength,” written by the Editor, the following figures are given for four of the leading Powers:—

	Britain.	United States.	Germany.	Japan.
Built	9	4	2	1
Building	7	4	11	3
	16	8	13	4

As the above figures include battleships only, there must be added the “battleship-cruisers” of the Invincible type, which are also al-big-gun ships. This makes the four totals 22, 8, 17, and 4. To these must further be added the Dreadnoughts ordered or projected, which, being laid down towards the end of this year, may be expected to be completed by the end of 1912, or early in 1913. We thus arrive at the following table:—

	Britain.	United States.	Germany.	Japan.
Battleships (built and building).....	16	8	13	4
Battleship-cruiser (do.) } ...	6	—	4	—
Projected (either type).	5	2	4	1
Total (all - big - gun ships).....	27	10	21	5

Now the figure 16, given above, includes two ships, the Lord Nelson and Agamemnon, which most authorities decline to recognize as Dreadnoughts, on account of their mixed armament and inferior speed. Omitting them, the final figure of 27 falls to 25, but it may be permissible to reckon the two battleship-cruisers presented to the Empire by Australia and New Zealand, orders for which have just been placed on the Clyde, though it is understood that these vessels are to be stationed in Australasian waters and would consequently be of little use on an outbreak of war in Europe. Mr. Asquith’s estimate is therefore correct—allowing for the qualifications we have made above—while Mr. Barnes has arrived at his figures by the simple process of ignoring the vessels that Germany will bring to completion in the next 2½ years, while counting those that Great Britain expects to complete in the same time.
In other words, by a different method, we have merely confirmed the figures already arrived at by the Prime Minister—a Liberal Prime Minister—and his professional advisers. The Labour leader’s figures, it will be remembered, were 25 and 13, for the two Powers respectively. Our contemporary charges us with having reckoned, in the German total, ships for a year in advance of those in the British total. Perhaps it would remove all doubt if we submitted the names of the vessels ordered, so far as known:—

GREAT BRITAIN.
Capital Ships.	Date of Completion.
1. Dreadnought	December	1906.
2. Indomitable	June	1908.
3. Inflexible	October	1908.

15. E. Aegir	June	1912.
16. E. Odin	June	1912.
17. “I”	June	1912.

This was the situation at the end of 1909, the British list including the four extra or “contingent” battleships ordered in July of that year. But in the estimates of the current year, i.e., 1910, provision was made for five new Dreadnoughts on the British side, and, under the German Navy Act, for four new Dreadnoughts. These vessels have not been launched, or even named, but they may reasonably be expected to be completed by the end of 1912 or the spring of 1913, i.e., in a period of 2½ years. Our contemporary's correspondent contends that the German ships will not be built in that time, but, as he shows in his own article, the latest German Dreadnought, the Von der Tann, was completed in two years. Is it not a reasonable supposition that what German dockyards can accomplish in the case of one ship they can do in the case of others? At any rate, can the British Government—a Liberal Government—be blamed for taking into consideration the possibilities of such acceleration? Entrusted as they are with enormous interests for which the Navy constitutes the sole defence, would it not be reprehensible in the highest degree if they ran any unnecessary risks? Germany's position is happier far; her navy is not her only, or even her principal, line of defence. She is already equipped with the finest Army in the world. On the other hand, Britain has no such defence. We are forced to the conclusion, after careful review of all the circumstances, that the present Liberal Government has by no means been prodigal in their provision for the national security, and that, when the PRIME MINISTER pointed out that the margin of safety was not excessive, he was not wide of the mark. As we have already observed, the Opposition, which has been accused of making exaggerated statements as to the relative weakness of the British Navy, demanded from six to eight Dreadnoughts to be laid down this year. The Government, finally, laid down five; and its official spokesman, the First Lord of the Admiralty, has expressed his conviction that any less number would be insufficient to give security. It must be admitted then, that the British Government has done no more than the least it could do, without endangering the safety of the Empire.

RACE-ANTIPATHY AND THE SOCIAL SCALE.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 17.)

“WHAT is the secret of racial antipathy?” is the question which a writer in a London review endeavours to solve, in discussing the social and psychological aspects of the Reno fight and its riotous sequel. The psychologists, he maintains, have no satisfactory explanation, and overlook some salient features of the phenomenon. So saying, this writer proceeds to draw the following parallel between the racial antipathy revealed by lynching episodes in the United States and the almost universal Anti-Semitic feeling. “In each case the disturbance has its focus in the lower strata of society. In each there is an unreasoning ury of emotion which only religious differences seem able to provide in equal strength and blindness. Yet when the odium theologicum is analysed, there is a perplexing residuum which cannot be explained by any reference to religion at all. On the other hand, the peculiar quality which racial antipathy is considered to possess and which, as the above-mentioned analogy shows, is a kind of horror, never appears between equals, as between the English and the French. It is only shown by superior races to inferior, and then only in peculiar circumstances.” In other words, the proposition here advanced is that the attitude of a superior race to an inferior, which is the origin of race-antipathy, moves the lower orders of the superior race to violent expression of that antipathy. If this theory is put forward as an apology for racial antagonism in its various manifestations, we fear it must be regarded as belonging to that class of apology which condemns more than it excuses. For the “superior” race begins by despising and finishes by attacking. If not exactly adding insult to injury, this is certainly adding injury to insult. But in so far as the theory implies that the onus of the murderous and painfully frequent disturbances in the Great Republic must be laid upon the lower strata of American society, it will not find many adherents. On the contrary, it is coming to be recognized by those who have impartially set themselves to obtain clear ideas on this subject, that the main responsibility for the lynching of negroes in the United States lies upon the upper stratum of society; that expression being used as meaning the class which by education, wealth, and (in the South) old tradition is in a position to influence the mind of the public. As a recent resident in that part of the Union points out, changed as the constitution of society is in the South from the quasi-aristocracy which existed there before the Civil War, there is more than enough remaining of the old habit of respect for a certain social status to give to those occupying that status a great deal of power, and especially in matters that, like the practice of lynching negroes charged with violence against whites, stand apart from the machinery of politics, and are of the nature of social custom. The point might be considered proved if it were only true that the upper class countenanced lynching and encouraged it—and that they do so is surely beyond all question. But they do more than this: they participate in, and indeed organise, lynchings. We do not say that all lynchings are organised by men of the upper class; but it is certain that some are, and every such case necessarily carries enormous weight with the public. Only a short time ago a prominent professional man in a Southern State wrote to the Press giving an account of the lynching of a negro by himself and a number of others of his own class. The negro having killed this gentleman's brother, the small and select party took the murderer out of the hands of the law and hanged him—decorously and without any of the incidental barbarities of mob violence. They did it as a public duty, and allowed an account of their act, with their names given, to be published by their leader. The gist of the statement, which appeared without comment in the various Southern newspapers, was couched in the following terms:—

The lynching of Elmo Curl, at Mastodon, Mississippi, was a most orderly affair, conducted by the bankers, lawyers, farmers, and merchants of that county. The best people of the county—as good as the best anywhere—simply met and hanged Curl without a sign of rowdyism. There was no drinking, shooting, or yelling, not even loud talking. A more orderly assemblage could not have been imagined anywhere.

It has been represented, in some quarters, that race-antipathy is a kind of instinct evidenced in the alleged repugnance of the white man—and, even more, of the white woman—against the idea of marriage with a coloured person. In our opinion this repugnance is more imaginary than real. We rather incline to the belief that race-antipathy is a purely social, and therefore artificially created, prejudice, largely reinforced by the social disabilities under which the children of mixed marriages are made to labour. As to the lynchings in the United States, we fear it must be confessed that they are only in part attributable to racial antagonism. It is now almost as common an occurrence for a white man to be hung up to a lamp-post or a stake at the hands of a raving mob, as it is for a black man. Witness the extraordinary affair in Newark, Ohio, last month, when a young American was lynched in disturbances arising, not out of a criminal offence on the part of a negro, but out of a liquor-prohibition movement. Whether, therefore, it emanates from the upper classes or the lower, racial antipathy is a poor excuse at any time for such deeds as darken the face of the North American Continent, and there are many cases in which it plays no part whatever. The apologists of lawlessness in America must look elsewhere for extenuating circumstances.

MOUNTAIN RESORTS AND THE WEATHER.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 17.)

IT is the custom for the foreigner in this country—and the custom has a continually increasing vogue among the Japanese also—to betake himself to the mountains as the Doyo days descend upon the plains. It is an excellent thing to enjoy a change of air and scene, and recuperate one's low-running vital forces, amid pleasant surroundings two, three or four thousand feet above the sea; hence the journey is usually undertaken with a light heart and a careless mind. Nevertheless, as the unhappy experiences of this past week, and of another such week three years ago, have shown, the annual exodus to the mountains has become a risky and venturesome affair. It is now one thing to adjourn to the pleasure-resort among the hills, another thing to come back. It is one thing to seek the open life at Nikko, or Karuizawa, and another thing to be incarcerated in your hotel or your bungalow, wondering whether the building and yourself with it are, or are not, to be washed out of existence in a raging flood. Such untoward circumstances impart a new and strange complexity to the problem of the choice of a holiday resort. In that problem, the avoidance of confined valleys and of proximity to mountain streams become considerations of prime importance. Moreover, in these days of atmospheric depressions, the prospective holiday-maker, like a prudent general in command of a flying expedition, must duly ponder the entire route leading to his objective, lest he be cut off from his base. Wind and tide are no mean foes—and the line of communications (as recent events have shown) is painfully exposed to their attack.

It must be confessed that August is winning a sinister reputation as a holiday month. The torrential rains of the latter part of the month, in 1907, were attended with consequences serious enough; but the deluge which endured last week from the night of the 7th inst. to the morning of the 11th proved more disastrous still. Curiously enough, the summer-resort which, from all accounts, suffered most on both these occasions was that of Karuizawa. When high officials of State, not to mention your ordinary tripper, have to leave the shelter of a commodious hotel by night to take a refuge in a tree or on a neighbouring hill-top, one begins to wonder whether the delights of a summer holiday may not be too dearly purchased. The special telegram which appeared in our issue yesterday reveals a truly melancholy state of affairs, of which a possible shortage of food is not the least disquieting. From the point of view of possible results of weather-freaks, it must be confessed, Karuizawa is unhappily situated, and we fear that its decline as a pleasure resort must follow as an inevitable consequence of the dismal events of two disastrous seasons. It is sincerely to be hoped that the visitors now cut off from the world at the crest of the Usui-toge, as well as those in other mountain resorts, will speedily find a happy issue out of their distresses, even if deliverance is purchased at the cost of a increased respect for the eccentricities of the Japanese climate.

CRIME AND ITS DETECTION.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 18.)

THE month of July seems to have been remarkable in England for two things—an extraordinary diminution in sunshine, and an extraordinary increase in crime. The concurrence of these two things once again suggests the enquiry whether the epidemics of violent crime which arise from time to time in civilised countries justify those ingenious speculators who have sought to connect them with particular phases of the weather. Every day, laments a London journal, brings its fresh tale of murders and suicides—most of them sordid and commonplace enough. One crime, however, has excited widespread interest. This is the so-called “CRIPPEN murder,” which is arousing almost as much morbid enthusiasm as did the celebrated MAYBRICK and ARDLAMONT cases, though, as a matter of fact, the CRIPPEN crime has more relation, in its cold and calculated brutality, to those of the DEEMING type. The public interest in such crimes takes many forms, most of them merely silly, but some of them worse. Thus thousands of people have been writing to the papers to say that they have met, or spoken to, various persons “wanted” by the police. These people furnish examples of the merely silly class. But a harsher censure must be reserved for those who seize the opportunity of a very puzzling crime to make violent attacks upon the police because they do not choose to make public their discoveries. Everything must, of course, be done to solve such mysteries and to bring the criminals to justice; but it is far more important that the police should be allowed to solve the problem in their own way, unhampered by unnecessary publicity, than that the taste of a certain section of the public for morbid and nauseous details should be indulged.

On the other hand, the Spectator falls foul of the action of the Government in offering a reward of £250 for information “leading to the arrest” of the man known as Dr. CRIPPEN. This offer, says that sedate periodical, is a distinct and a regrettable break with a deliberate policy. Rewards used to be offered, but the practice ceased because it was found that it did more harm than good; and it is recalled that Mr. MATTHEWS, who was Home Secretary during the terrible series of Whitechapel murders in 1888, resolutely declined to offer a reward, in the face of much clamour, and gave excellent reasons for not doing so. “We would not,” says the Spectator, “shut out absolutely the principle of reward; it may be necessary as a last resort. But if the mysterious murders of 1888 did not require it, such a measure is certainly not required now. A reward encourages the police to believe—what they do not at present believe—that special efforts need only be made in response to the prospects of extra pay; it encourages the citizen to keep back evidence, which it is his duty to give at once to the police, in order to follow up his clues and try to earn the reward himself; it encourages ill-balanced people to flood Scotland Yard with vague information which obscures rather than clarifies detective work; and it is conceivable that it might cause false evidence to be manufactured against innocent persons.”

As for the sensational crime which has occasioned these observations, we do not find that it presents any very remarkable features, except as regards the detection and pursuit of the criminal. The murderer—for there seems little doubt that he is such—displayed a certain amount of cleverness, but, like most of his type, was merely clever up to a certain point. A righteous Fate decreed that his blunders should prove his own undoing. To bury the fleshy remains of his murdered wife—no matter how skilfully—on his own premises; to insert a bogus death-notice in an American paper which was certain sooner or later to be known to be a bogus notice; to linger in sublime self-confidence on the scene for months after the perpetration of the guilty deed; and then to flee to America (of all places) when suspicion was aroused—all these were blunders which show the American “doctor” to have been a very foolish criminal, after all. But the manner of his pursuit and capture presents undoubted features of interest. The pursuit of the C.P.R. steamer Montrose, which left Antwerp on the 20th ult. with “Mr. and Master Robinson” among its passengers, by the White Star liner Laurentic, which left Liverpool three days later, with Detective-Inspector DEW on board, and the part played by wireless telegraphy in the trans-oceanic chase, are novel features even in so diversified a record as that of crime. The advent of improved communications, and of such inventions as that of wireless telegraphy, must certainly have the effect of circumscribing perceptibly the criminal’s chances of escape; and thus of acting, in some measure, as a deterrent of crime. Anything which serves that purpose must accrue to the ultimate benefit of mankind.

JAPAN'S DEBT TO VOLCANIC ACTION.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 18)

I.

THE Japanese Islands, by virtue of their origin, boast a variety of scenic interest to which few other countries can aspire. “If contrast,” as RUSKIN claims, “increases the splendour of beauty,” then these Islands are fortunate indeed. For as “there is one beauty of the sun, and another of the moon,” so, in Nature’s scenic store-house, there is that which enthalls by its simple grace, and there is that before whose awe-inspiring force the spectator feels that the beautiful is lost in the sublime. There is a loveliness of tree-clad mountains and heaven-reflecting lakes; of cascades shimmering out of depths of foliage, of rivers rolling silently past moss-grown banks, of islands fairly set in sunlit seas. And there is a charm in grassy moorlands that give place to desolation culminating in the "grisly top" of a mighty cinder-heap. It is the magnetic influence of weird sublimity, brooding over the work of primeval fire. Hills there are in such a region, but they are hills of ashes. Air there is, but it has the reek of sulphur; and there are torrents which, like those immortalized by COLERIDGE, suggest a sudden halting at the instance of some mighty and imperious voice. Nevertheless, as we shall attempt to show, these two types of beauty are blended together in Japan's volcanic regions; and to this extent therefore it may be claimed that, as regards their most characteristic and striking formations, the Islands of Japan are what volcanic force has made them.

The popular fancy not unnaturally associates the manifestation of terrestrial energy with desolation and sterility. This may be true of the volcano in its impetuous youth, or in the sequel of a mighty outburst; but the cone whose life-history dates back to the dimmest mists of the geological past, though its summit may still forbid life, has long since wrapped its base in luxuriance. It is a scientifically accepted fact that the solid products of volcanic action yield in course of time the kindest of soils; and, as a consequence of this wise provision of Nature, some of the most pleasing scenery in a volcanic land is to be found in its volcanic districts, side by side with the most terrible. On the same mountain can be seen the primeval forest and the simmering crater-pit; in the same region can be heard the roar of subterranean force and the pine-wood's "soul-like sounds." This is true, in a quite remarkable degree, of these Far Eastern Islands. Japan's most beautiful lakes occupy what once were volcanic vents, her finest waterfall plunges incontinently into an ancient crater, her most famous mountain is a wondrously symmetrical volcanic cone.

If the ordinary visitor to Japan, or even the average resident of some years standing, were to be asked what are, in his opinion, the most beautiful parts of Japan, he would probably reply the Nikko, or the Hakone, district. Both of these, of course, are volcanic to the core. The scenery of the Nikko mountain-group now resembles in its general features that of any mountainous, profusely-watered district where the erosive agencies of nature have had full play and where the soil is of such a character as to lend itself readily to their action. But two of the most prominent peaks of the Nikko range are ancient "cinder-heaps":—the beautiful Nantaizan, without whose majestic presence Lake Chuzenji would be nothing; and Shiranesan, the loftiest of them all, still simmering in its hidden depths. The magnificent abyss into which the Kegon cataract plunges so abruptly is a parasitic crater of the extinct Nantaisan. Basaltic columns representing mighty lava-flows flank the principal gorges in the district, and sulphur wells hotly from the bowels of Shiranesan to the bathers at Yumoto, on the margin of the most beautiful lake in Japan. But the hour of Nikko's travail has long since passed. That once troubled land has felt the softening hands of Nature and her grand ally, Time. Earth's fires have here been finally banked, and verdure has usurped sterility.

It is the same, though in a less marked degree, with justly-favoured Hakone. This district lies precisely athwart the so-called "line of fire" which leads from the Pacific deeps, by way of the Isles of Izu, to Fuji and the great upfold of the Japanese Alps. Is there not a fuming gorge called Ojigoku, and a solfataro 4,000 feet up on the flank of Kamiyama, to remind us of this fundamental fact? Are there not several crater-lakes along the ridges, and does not the beautiful Lake of Hakone itself occupy such a bed? Indeed, if one might hazard a guess out of the geological past, it is that the mountains of Hakone were incandescent, lava-spitting cones before Fuji itself began to rear its colossal bulk. But in Nature, as in Life, every dog must have his day. It is at length the turn of vegetation unrestrained. Now in verdant valleys, toned and tree-clad, torrents, cascades, springs, rush and fall and bubble in their depths of foliage, making music for jaded travellers from all parts of the earth.

But those who been fortunate enough to extend their travels to remoter portions of this Island Empire would hesitate before awarding the palm either to Nikko or to Hakone. It is a case of primus inter pares. In the homeland the inhabitants of "Caledonia stern and wild" are wont to quarrel over the respective merits of Loch Lomond and Loch Katrine; and the people of the English Lakes can never agree whether Derwentwater or Windermere or Ullswater is the loveliest. So it would be no easy matter to decide which of Japan's dozen or more mountain or volcanic districts—the terms are practically synonymous—is the richest in natural attractions. It cannot be denied that the scenery of the Japanese Alps—and that in particular of the Kamikochi valley, over which the still active Yake-ga-take broods—is far superior to that of the Nikko district. The lakes at the northern base of Fujiyama, or those about Tarumai in the Hokkaido, can hold their own with Chuzenji and Hakone. Magnificent as are the forests that clothe the flanks of Nantai and Shirane—especially on the western slopes—they are fully equalled, if not surpassed, by those that drape for miles, and up to the height of 5000 feet, the once steaming slopes of the Kirishima range. And there are a score of streams now rushing deep in the sides of volcanic cones in various parts of the country that need fear no comparison with the Hayakawa, or the torrent that foams so hurriedly under the Sacred Bridge.

THE SOCIOLOGICAL ASPECT OF THE SUFFRAGE QUESTION

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 19.)
(COMMUNICATED.)

THE acceptance of the so called Conciliation Bill by the House of Commons, on the second reading of that unprecedented measure, has doubtless given a notable impetus to the Woman Suffrage movement. At the same time, however, it has imparted fresh life and vigour to the activity of that continually increasing number of people who regard the question of female enfranchisement as fraught with the gravest danger to the true interests of the Family, the State and the Empire. Ever since the remarkably successful demonstration of the feminists in London—successful, that is to say, from the spectacular point of view—and the affirming of Mr. SHACKLETON's Bill in the Commons by a majority which, if considerably less than that of 1908, was still substantial enough, the Army of the Franchise Militant on Earth has delivered itself up to jubilation. "Victory," says Miss CHRISTABEL PANKHURST, "is it sight." The tyrant male is sneaking from the field: the banners of Women's Freedom are floating triumphantly to the astonished air—and so on. On the other hand, the work is being taken in hand of organizing and giving effect to the real sentiment of the country, which is believed, in the best-informed quarters, to be overwhelmingly opposed to the ill-advised innovation. Thus, for example, an extensively signed "Anti Woman-Suffrage Appeal" has been sent to the National Review, which is of interest as showing the tendency of this counter-movement. Among those who have appended their names to this appeal we note a number of distinguished persons of both sexes and of many widely different phases of activity—Sir JAMES CRICHTON BROWNE, the eminent physician; Mr. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN, the veteran Imperialist statesman and "Missionary of Empire;" Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH, one of the leading figures in the recent world-conference of Missions at Edinburgh; Sir EDWARD CLARKE, the eminent advocate; the Earl of CROMER, greatest of British pro-consuls; Mrs. ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FELKIN (better known under her maiden name of FOWLER), the talented authoress; Canon HENSLEY of Westminster, the well-known ecclesiastic; Mr. RUDYARD KIPLING—whose name needs no supplementing, in any part of the Empire; the Bishop of MANCHESTER, Sir GILBERT PARKER, Mr. H. J. MACKINDER M.P., the Duke of NORFOLK, Lord ROBERTS, Baron ROTHSCHILD, Mr. J. St. LOE STRACHEY, Mrs. BEERBOHM TREE, Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD, and many others. The text of the appeal is in the following terms:—

The debate in the House of Commons on the Female Suffrage Bill, whether we regards the apparently favourable vote on the second reading, or the admittedly hostile vote on the proposal to send the Bill to a Grand Committee, does not either settle or advance the question. On the contrary, there is every reason to anticipate a renewed outburst of activity on the part of the supporters of the measure—a challenge which should impose an immediate and urgent duty upon those who hold the opposite view, all the more so that a large number of persons do not appear fully to understand the gravity of the issue, or to realise that modified and restricted enfranchisement can only lead to much bolder and more dangerous proposals at no distant date.

Being ourselves unalterably opposed to the grant of women suffrage in the interests both of women and of the State, and believing that our views are shared by the great majority of both sexes in the United Kingdom, we desire to make it known that a movement is being set on foot to give organised expression to this feeling. Only a small number of influential persons have so far been approached. But already a sum of over £13,000 has been promised, and we hope that as soon as the movement is widely known we may raise a fund that will enable us to identify and unite our sympathisers in all parts of the country, and to place our forces upon an effective footing.

Our idea is to form a large and comprehensive league, in which men and women will be equally represented, possessing central offices in London and branches in all parts of the United Kingdom, exclusively devoted to the propagation of this cause. The nucleus of this organisation is already in existence, and will be developed with as much rapidity as possible. We hope at an early date in the autumn to be able to announce the completion of these measures, and to provide an opportunity for work to all who may be willing to join us.

What now remains, both for the suffragists and the anti-suffragists, is to prove that their respective cases are backed by a preponderant body of public opinion. This the suffragists at least have made no attempt to prove, and till they have done so to the satisfaction of the country, it is impossible to take them seriously. Noise and threats and appeals to force count for nothing. A general demand for political equality and for a bi-sexual parliamentary register does not, at the present moment, exist at all.

There is one aspect of the question, however—and it is the fundamental aspect—to which suffragists persist in remaining blind. That aspect is based on the physical differences between the two sexes. No amount of argument can do away with these primary distinctions, or the inexorable laws of Nature which proceed from them. Man has to play his part in the scheme of life, woman hers—and the two parts are necessarily distinct. The militant suffragist appears to regard the mere existence of these distinctions as a humiliation. What she desires is to pool the diverse functions and activities of life springing from these fundamental differences and then draw, of the sum-total, what she pleases. There are some curious people, of course, who assert that to insist upon the grand and basal facts of life is indelicate. It is difficult to deal patiently with this compounded maiden-aunt-young-person style of argument; but, when all is said and done, is it not the suffragist who has brought it up, who has challenged, and would fain defy, the whole question of sex? The problem of political sex-equality must now be considered in all its bearings, practical as well as theoretical. And it is when we thus consider the proposed publicization of woman—her transference ex domo in forum—that the arguments pro pale visibly, and the arguments con gather force. What may be called the physiological side of the question—the importance of which in the national life must far transcend the importance of any female element in the world of politics—has been forcibly put by Dr. LEONARD WILLIAMS in a recent letter to the Times:—

In the discussions which have taken place on the subject of woman suffrage there is a side of the question—namely, the physiological—which seems by common consent to have been avoided. This is unfortunate.

It is a truism to say that Nature has cast upon woman the burden of perpetuating the species. The suffragists would apparently seek to make light of this burden. They represent it as an incident in woman's life, even as it is admittedly an incident in the life of man; and they contend that the intervals leave woman free to undertake duties and responsibilities which have hitherto been regarded as exclusively masculine. Now, the simple physiological truth is that these intervals do not exist. The whole of the physiological life of woman during the reproductive period, say from 17 to 50, whether she be married or single, whether she enjoy the privilege of motherhood or remain pathetically childless, is wholly and entirely given over to reproduction or to the preparation for, and physiological expectancy of, that function. The intervals which she seems to enjoy are not real intervals. They are apparent only.

The effect of dragging woman, so considered, into the political arena must inevitably have one of two results. Either she will become a physiological bankrupt, and hand down a legacy of physiological bankruptcy to her offspring, in the form of mental, moral, and physical degeneracy; or her reproductive capacity will be so gravely impaired that she will cease altogether to fulfil the function of reproduction which is her primary raison d'être.

It may seem ungracious to lay stress upon the part which Nature has called woman to fulfil, but in reality this is the only thing (we speak of essentials as opposed to emperals) which, by comparison, counts at all. Woman, paradoxical as the statement may sound, is the source of a nation's manhood. In the unceasing struggle between nations—which, like that between of individuals, resolves itself with an almost cruel simplicity into the survival of the fittest—it is a nation's manhood which has to bear the brunt. And not merely severally, but in the mass. Wherefore the nation, whose birth-rate is topped by its mortality, is already "marked to die." Weighed in these tremendous scales, where does the woman's parliamentary vote come in? Can it turn the nation moribund into the nation strong? No; looking at the matter from a strictly sociological point of view, the only women who in any circumstances should be entitled to enter the political arena are women who, by reason of their age or physical disabilities, can no longer be of service to the State as regards their primary functions. Considerations of sociology, irrespective of all other claims, would suggest no objection to the enfranchisement of spinster-occupiers over 45 years of age, or even of married women of independent means who had attained that age, and who had no children under, say, ten years of age. But in so far as Female Suffrage, with its attendant political aims and interests, would militate against the maintenance of the race in its full vigour and plenitude—and of the Family, which is the unit of the Race—the sociologist, whether on scientific or on national grounds, will have none of it.

PORT ARTHUR.

According to a report in the Asahi Shimbun, the Naval Department proposes to relegate Port Arthur to the rank of a secondary naval base. This step is to be taken as soon as the defences of Chinhai Bay are complete. Only the eastern basin of the Port Arthur harbour is to be used for naval purposes—mainly for the execution of urgent repairs to disabled warships. Presumably the idea is to develop the commercial side of Port Arthur, while equipping Chinhai to take its place as the principal naval station in those waters.

POLITICAL QUESTIONS.

[CONTRIBUTED.]

At the time of the last general election in England, a prominent London Clubman, who had been speaking bitterly of the "unfair methods" of the opposite party, was suddenly confronted with the question: "Admitting that England cannot adopt a tariff as an experiment to be changed after a short time, but that once adopted, it must be the confirmed policy of a number of years—suppose the whole question of Tariff or Free Trade were left to you to decide for the nation—which would it be?"

His reply, after a moment's hesitation, was: "I don't know!—The question is so stupendous; the issues involved are so vital to the very existence of the nation, that I would not dare to take the responsibility of a decision." There spoke a wise man, and a brave one. For the man in any country who has positive unchangeable, undoubting opinions on the tariff question is usually the man who has neither travelled nor read widely. The greatest statesmen in the world are in doubt about it!

President Taft pledged himself, in pre-election speeches, to a reduction of the American tariff. After election he certainly gave his influence to increasing it. Earnest, thinking Americans do not believe this was political dishonesty. They credit the great politician with having changed his mind—with having been persuaded by his colleagues to see the matter in a different light. He undoubtedly used his best judgment for the good of his country. He did not know—we still do not know! Recent telegraphic reports seem to indicate that the Payne tariff bill has been a great benefit to the country. No man can yet determine. If anyone of the great leaders in England to-day knew positively which were better, and had the courage which positive knowledge gives, he could win for his party. For it is remarkable, to the stranger within England's gates, how loyal the common people are in this discussion and how eager they are to see the country prosper.

It is a question of "Tariffs and Trusts" with attendant monopolies and Labour troubles, or "Free Trade and the Dumping Ground of Nations." Between the two the average intelligent business man, if the whole question were left to him, would probably, like the Clubman above quoted, hesitate before taking the awful responsibility.

YACHTING.

Stormy weather on Saturday interfered to a great extent with the yacht races which had been arranged. The 39-raters and the motor-boats did not attempt the courses laid down, but four of the 22-raters started—Pele, Edna, Valkyrien, and Winsome. Of these, only the first two managed to sail over the course, heavily reefed in view of the strong gusts from the east. The Pele, sailed by Mr. J. S. Curtis, outraced the Edna, sailed by Mr. Brockhurst, Senr., after a close contest.

One of the two Larks which started capsized shortly after leaving her moorings, but No. 1, sailed by Mr. Laffin, Junr., covered a short course inside the breakwater. Four men were on board to serve as ballast, and no further mishap occurred.

THE BOOKSHELF.

Helen of all Time, by W. HOLT-WHITE.
London, Fisher Unwin.

We suppose that any idea is good enough to serve as a peg whereon to hang the theme of the modern novel. No doubt, the more wildly improbable the idea, the more acceptable the tale—to some readers, at least. Thus when the dour McGregor (who, though a millionaire, elects to live in the remotest of the remote Shetland islands), receives a wildly improbable kiss in a wildly improbable vision and forthwith, in response to certain wildly improbable intuitions, crosses to the other side of Europe to find the fair owner of the lips that gave him that wildly improbable kiss, we are scarcely surprised to learn that the said owner of those marvellous lips was none other than Helen of Troy, once the bride of Menelaus, King of Sparta, whose wondrous beauty was the fons et origo of the Trojan war. And even in this more prosaic age, when men do not wage war for a face, that beauty is sufficient (when seen from a box in the Opera at Paris) to cause the whole house, from the conductor to the gallery-god, to forget the impassioned scene on the stage and gaze instead at the vision of Helen in the box. We must take it, on the authority of Mr. Holt-White, that in spite of all her lovers, Helen of Troy was never loved. Hence she is doomed to repeated reincarnation—she was Ophelia, and Dante's Beatrice, in her time—till she is really loved for herself, and not for her beauty. Pending the arrival of that happy day (of course it arrives in Mr. Holt-White's story) her beauty is foreordained to be a curse and a source of continual strife. We will not initiate the reader into all the wildly improbable things that happen in the troubled course of this narrative, but he will probably come to the conclusion that it would have been far better to have left the peerless consort of Paris enshrined in the pages of the Iliad. We fear that we cannot endorse the high praise accorded this book by our local German contemporary—in the terms, apparently, of a publisher's circular. Mr. Holt-White would probably be more successful if he adhered to the style of fiction he has laid down for himself in The Prime Minister's Secret.

Poppy Petals, by "D.R.C." Shanghai, Messrs. Kelly & Walsh.

To a new arrival or one who has not travelled in the Far East, these stories make very interesting reading. Poppy Petals, the title-story, and the only one which gives the authoress the right to designate her productions as stories, has for its principal character an Englishman, presumably an officer of good family, who, horribly maimed for life by having both legs amputated as a result, it is supposed, of an intrigue with a native girl of low extraction in the East, sinks into the most hopeless degradation and vice, living in utter squalor in the Chinese quarter of Hongkong, but is tended faithfully, all through, by a Chinese servant who, nevertheless, has faith in the ultimate regeneration of his master. In the end, this is brought about by the fact that a European woman of the demi monde, named Poppy, who had borne him a daughter, dies. The father, realising his responsibility, overcomes, after a hard struggle, the vices to which he had succumbed in his despair; and we are led to understand that he eventually returns to England and rehabilitates himself in society for the sake of his child.

The other stories, while distinctly possessing charm, have a certain disconnectedness and vagueness about them which detract from their value. The writer, presumably a woman, shows talent, but, in endeavouring to introduce an atmosphere of subtlety and mystery into her stories has overstepped the mark and become vague. However, in the writer's modest words, "as little tales to help pass a half hour or more" they are well worth reading.

Lady Susan and not the Cardinal, by LUCAS CLEEVE. London, G. Bell and Sons.

If you want to see an American, and moreover an American girl, from the eyes of the typical Londoner you find her in Lady Susan and Not the Cardinal. The author knows the world, social and otherwise, and knows that he knows, and yet the audacity of the man who thinks that he knows women, and above all, American women. And yet—does he? Somehow he brings before you traits you are bound to recognize. Lady Susan says to her husband: "I certainly have educated you well, no one would think you were an Englishman". Sounds like an American girl-wife, doesn't it? And you catch the atmosphere, too. You see her standing there, daring, alluring, wholly charming, flirting with her husband. But the author knows an Englishman, for the husband answers: "H'm."

"She knew that that grunt meant he thanked the Lord he wasn't a foreigner."

Again she is made to say: "I have always felt, all my life, as if I had to think I cared in order to enjoy life. . . . you get that way in America I think, you are so accustomed to always having a man about who's in love with you, that everything seems dull without one." The audacity! Does this writer think that because his London compatriots crowd about every pretty American girl who dances into London, until an American can't get within ten feet of his schoolgirl chum, that the American man is everlastingly doing the same thing?

Lady Susan is worldly-wise, naughty, saucy chic—almost as chic as an American girl—and she doesn't care in the least whether they love her or not, but they do—we all do, for with all her naughtiness, she loves her babies and their father—oh so much!—almost as much shall we say, as an English-wife—nay, forbid it, almost as much as the Anglo-Saxon she is.

The Carcase, by RONALD MACDONALD. London, George Bell & Sons.

The reformation of a drunkard, taken in hand by a good and courageous woman, is no new problem treated by the modern author of fiction, but has become, one might almost say so hackneyed, that the novel reader, on discovering that the particular work of fiction which he has commenced is to again inflict him with this subject, is inclined to throw it aside with disgust and impatience. However "The Carcase" although rather weak in the opening chapters does not certainly merit this treatment.

The plot to a certain degree is stereotyped, i.e. the good woman giving herself in marriage to the drunkard in the hope of accomplishing his salvation through her devotion; but contrary to the usual ending of the man after alternating periods of yielding to and fighting temptation eventually overcoming his enemy and emerging victorious from his trials, the drunkard is, notwithstanding valiant efforts, in the end vanquished by his enemy, who delivers the coup de grâce of death.

We are introduced to an old family named Vergoyne, well equipped with worldly goods but with an hereditary taint of drunkenness in the blood. The male representative, the father of our drunkard, has married a cold unsympathetic woman who, instead of helping him to fight his battle with the drink fiend, by her tactlessness and failure to appreciate the hardships endured from the self restraint imposed in the daily fight which has to be fought by the man in whose reins runs the tainted blood of generations of drunkards, helps to bring about his ultimate downfall, which is hastened by the knowledge that her act of sympathy is extended also to his son, whom he dotes on with all a father's love.

The father left a peculiar will by which his property, until his son reached the age of 25, was under the charge of trustees. On attaining his 25th year the son would have full control over the enormous fortune, but, in case of his death before that date, the property would be divided between a bachelor uncle, two aunts, and two cousins, a girl and a boy. The devices of these relatives, with the exception of the girl cousin, to bring about his death before his twenty-fifth year, and his resolve to circumvent them, form an interesting plot. The unexpected consequences of one of the machinations, to this end, of his uncle, the only one of his relations whom he does not suspect, are decidedly worth notice.

A son and heir is expected, or at least hoped for, within a few weeks. The doctor, realizing that the presence of her husband with the consequent anxiety will be detrimental to his patient, and consequently to the expected little one, orders that he shall travel for six months. On the other hand, away from his wife's influence for good, it is likely he will succumb to his arch enemy. The uncle steps into the breach and suggests that he shall travel in the company of a young medical man of high repute whom he knows and who is about to commence a world tour. The plan is carried out, but the uncle's design is quite clear when the medical man turns out to be a drunkard of the most bestial type. To the surprise and chagrin of his relatives the drunkard returns, however, obviously improved in health, the chronic state of besottedness of the medical man during the whole tour having inspired him with a healthy loathing and disgust, thus acting homeopathically upon his own craving. This plan proving abortive, a story of an intrigue between his wife, who was once a governess in his aunt's house, and cousin, was concocted. The mental anguish of first suspecting his wife and afterwards discovering that his uncle, whom he had admired and trusted from boyhood, was his enemy, drives him again to alcohol, the result of which is his death the day after his 25th birthday, after having disposed of his property to his own wish and leaving the following ironical message for his relatives, whom he had invited for the day of his death:—"Where the carcase is, there shall the eagles be gathered together—adding on his own account, "but the bones are all picked."

A DUTCH METHOD FOR THE COLLECTION OF BAD DEBTS.

The principal saying of talking like a Dutch uncle, has recently been strikingly illustrated by an enterprising Company in Holland, which on the look out for making hay in these hard times, has hit on a most effective way for making bad payers come up to the scratch.

The company has a small staff of servants dressed in striking uniforms, and wearing scarlet caps with black ribbons, on which "For Bad Payers" is printed in large characters. If a creditor finds it impossible to obtain a settlement from an obdurate Mr. Micanber, he sends his claim to the company in question, when the game may be said to start.—The Company sends a letter in a red envelope, with same legend as graces the official's Capband, to the debtor, informing him that if he fails to make an arrangement with his creditor within 3 days, he will get a visit from one of the company redcaps. In most cases, the debtor prefers paying to a visit from the obtrusive officials which of course advertises his case to all the neighbours. But should he remain deaf to the gentle reminder, he is left no peace, by day or night, the man with the red cap shadowing him most unmercifully.

This method of drawing teeth ought to commend itself to some enterprising financier in this country, where all the requisite abilities for such a career, are to be found in abundance amongst the army of unemployed gentlemen out at elbows. And the harvest would probably be by no means a quantité negligible.

THE FLOODS IN TOKYO.

AN UNVARNISHED STATEMENT OF THE SITUATION.

The waters have subsided considerably, being, on Tuesday, at least two feet below the previous high water mark, and are gradually falling. In many sections of the Honjo district, however, the dirty water is still running so high that the nose of a boat may just pass under the eaves of the first story. There is a distinct current, but sluggish, and no danger of houses falling in, or being washed away, is apprehended unless the flood should increase far above the highest point yet reached. In the Honjo district it is only the very poor people in the outlying sections, who have been obliged to leave their homes although even these amount to many thousands. The houses here are almost all one story and very cheaply constructed. Here one may ride for block after block for half a mile or more, through an absolutely deserted district, except for police and newspaper boats which patrol the section. The inhabitants have been transported, with such of their belongings as could be secured, to other sections of the city, where they are being cared for in public buildings, and fed by the excellent charity of which Tokyo has a right to be proud.

Few people have deserted the two-story houses along the more prosperous streets. The water is at least two feet below the mats of the second stories, and apart from the dampness and inconveniences in transportation these people are not particularly uncomfortable. They are in practically no danger, except in the event of further tremendous increases in the flood, of which there is very little danger, as it would take an as yet unprecedented amount of rainfall to bring the waters up even to the high-water mark of the past few days. These people are sitting about, many of them, on impromptu verandahs consisting of the first story roofs. Many are reading the latest daily papers. They are jolly, and chaff with one another or the boatmen who pass. They apparently have enough to eat. If there is a hungry person in the Honjo district, it is his own fault, for boats and rafts are continually passing and repassing along all streets, and anyone desiring to leave the district has only to make his wishes known, and he will receive assistance free of charge, not only to remove his family but a reasonable amount of baggage. Many newspaper and private boats are supplying food freely to all who ask for it, and the police are in position to investigate and relieve any case of real want.

INCIDENTS OF THE FLOOD.

Incidents are not wanting, pathetic and amusing. One of the police rescue boats brought in a family consisting of a man, woman and one small babe. They were of the very low coolie class, and were far more frightened than hurt. They were very voluble, and not only knew, but wanted to tell everybody, all about it. The charity ration now being distributed consists of Take-no-kawa-meshi, that is, boiled rice wrapped up in a bamboo husk. Each parcel contains a fair-sized meal for a working-man. This family had in their possession twenty-three of these packages, some of which were already evidently several days old. This does not look like "four days without food"—to mention only one of the many exaggerated statements published in sensation-loving journals. The worst report we were able to receive was from a man who vociferously begged for assistance. He was asked when he had last eaten and replied in a most aggrieved tone that he had not had anything to eat since morning. It was then three o'clock in the afternoon, and as the writer had not stopped for lunch, we were two of a kind. While we talked with him, a newspaper supply boat hove in sight and he presented his plea. The boat pulled up alongside his house at once and a couple of meals of rice were tossed up to him together with a big piece of daikon. He protested that it was not enough, and excitedly declared that he had four in family besides himself. The boatman laughed and asked him to produce them. He could only show his wife and a small child. He covered his confusion however by stating that the others "Machi ikimashita" (had gone to the city). The boatmen laughingly tossed him up three or four additional packages of rice and drifted on to the next house. Far be it from us to even suggest failing to feed the hungry, but at the same time it is only truth to point out that this man is of a class who would never work if they could possibly be fed without. He will probably be quite content to sit on his roof and beg as long as the boats keep up the supply.

The statement has been made that these "sufferers" are many of them dressed only in "summer kimonos." This is fortunately true, and we would call the attention of a local newspaper to the fact that this is also August, and the water is warm. In fact a large majority of them are dressed rather more close to nature than "summer clothes."

SUMMARY OF PRESENT CONDITIONS

To summarize: The police have the situation fully in hand. Transportation facilities are abundant, and anyone who wishes to leave the district may do so, either temporarily or with his baggage, and quite free of charge. Water is not being sold in bottles but is running free from city pipes which have been pulled up above the flood, where anyone may help himself. Food is at present not un plentiful. The waters are subsiding. The houses are damaged but apparently not seriously. The Honjo flood has not been attended with great loss of life. In fact we were unable to secure the name and address of a single man, woman or child whose death has been brought about either directly or indirectly from the flood, although a number of rumours were investigated as far as possible. Refugees are sheltered in so many places and are so numerous that it is impossible to fully prove or disprove—nobody knows at present. But the police state that they do not know of any. The above statement is the result of a day spent in the Honjo district, and notes taken in twenty interviews with all classes of people, including police, boatmen, and residents, some of whom have left their homes and others who are remaining in the submerged district to care for their property.

AFTER THE FLOOD.

The question of the control and proper disinfection of the flooded districts as the flood subsides and thereafter is indeed a very serious one, and the police department anticipate strenuous labour in that connection. This is when the real labour and the greatest need of charity will begin. And the danger at that time will probably be greater than at any time during the inundation. The dramatic element of the flood and the boats, soldiers, police, etc., will be lacking. The public will be inclined to forget and go about its own affairs. If it were only a matter of a few city blocks, or if the work could be done gradually after the manner of the annual O-soji, or house cleaning, the situation would be less complex. But with miles upon miles of houses and streets to be cleaned and disinfected, and all at once, in the poorest sections of the city, where the returning inhabitants must either go to their work, or if they are kept at home to attend to proper sanitary measures, must be fed, the task is stupendous. Nothing but the most earnest, systematic work on the part of the police, most sincerely supported either by public or private charity, can prevent an epidemic.

THE MODERN NOVEL.

(CONTRIBUTED TO THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

The reading of a new novel by John Strange Winter entitled Captain Fraser's Profession has led the writer of the following article to make a few remarks on the modern novel.

The work in question is a story typical of the kind demanded by the luxuriously idle, superficial reader of fiction, who wishes to be amused, taken out of himself and delivered for the time being from a state of ennui. This individual does not desire any vexing social or political problem to be introduced for his consideration or solving. In fact, for a novel to be a success, from his point of view, it must contain nothing which might make him think, and above all things it must not have a moral in it. That is inexcusable. However, a streak of adventure running through it which will arouse a certain amount of curiosity as to what is coming next is admissible, even desirable, and it is a sine qua non that the men and women must be good form and the servants decorous and submissive, the butler, in the old retainer style, often playing no unimportant rôle. I have a dim recollection that some one, I don't remember who, made the statement that society is divided into two classes, those who take tips and those who give them; but it appears to me that his epigram missed the mark, as he ignored the third, the great middle class, which neither gives nor takes tips to any large extent, but is nevertheless the backbone of a nation. Thus, in the ideal modern novel of the type referred to, we have the upper and lower strata of society, but the middle class, composed of the true workers is ignored.

Well! I hear some one say, this novel answers its purpose and does no harm, so where is the objection? The objection lies in the evil influence it has upon the members of that same middle class of society who read those novels in which the class to which they belong is ignored.

Seeing themselves ignored, they imagine that there must be a certain stigma attached to one who belongs to the great middle-class, and consequently, through continued reading of this type of fiction become dissatisfied with their lot in the social scheme and acquire an altogether false view of life, not based upon their own experiences or conceptions but upon the general tone and atmosphere of the books which mislead them. The result is that the reader, through continually brooding on what he considers his inferiority becomes socially ambitious, despises and holds himself aloof from his equals, is treated with contempt as an intruder by his superiors, and in this way finds himself in course of time socially isolated and consequently, miserable. But it is not said that every reader is effected in this way, and it is not intended to detract from the obvious talent of the authoress of the book under discussion, who, although she does not make the reader more than superficially acquainted with any one of her characters, is yet able to interest him sufficiently to take him out of himself, thus proving, indisputably, her usefulness. But this type of novel is not real, and as such will not live; and in twenty years time will have no readers and like water, will find its own level and be relegated to the dust-heap.

Then we have the so-called realistic novel. Now there are two distinct kinds of realistic novels. The one, written by the author who conscientiously endeavours to be real, to get behind the shams, to penetrate the mask worn by society, to fight the false prejudices and principles of our times, to dive deep down into every phase of human character and to make a psychological study of each person introduced to his readers. At the same time, he must not forget the lighter side of his work, and by his genius in conception of plot and the carrying of it through his story, must retain the reader's interest from the opening to the last page of the last chapter. For the moment, there may be a slight outcry against his works made by readers who are not capable of discriminating between the real novel and, shall we say, the realistic, between which there is a great gulf; but it will survive the most crucial of all tests, the test of time.

On the other hand we have, what we have just named, the purely realistic novel, the author of which, unlike the former, endeavours to be as indecently suggestive and to "sail as near the wind" as public opinion will allow him, not with any ulterior aim, but simply because he wishes to permeate his writings with an atmosphere of sensuality in order to appeal to a certain class of readers which, sad to relate, is on the increase. The plot is a secondary consideration and in many cases is conspicuous by its absence, the dialogue even is neither sparkling nor attractive and to a person of discrimination the matter The Keizai Zasshi sides with the Home Office. It says that the few exceptional cases cited by the Department of Finance do not alter the fact that on the whole the agricultural and industrial banks established have not realized their object—the relief of small land-holders and manufacturers. The fact is that country people all over Japan are suffering from heavy taxation combined with high interest on loans. The Government, despite all its assertions to the contrary, has supplied no remedy for either of these evils. It is the heavy taxation that necessitates borrowing and so the poor farmer becomes the victim of usury. Capital is deficient in the provinces to day because the people are over-taxed. Till the Government is able to materially reduce taxation, the situation will not alter.

There is an article on the New Tariff in the Tōkyō Keizai Zasshi which points out how unreasonably high many of the proposed rates are and which dwells on the fact that the Japanese consumers of goods will be the principal sufferers from the new taxes.

Dr. I. Nitobe is a constant contributor to the pages of the Jitsugyō no Nihon (Business Japan) a magazine that is much read by young men. In a recent issue he discusses the subject of reputation. He takes as his text the saying of Confucius "It does not concern the superior man that he is unknown to others; it is when he knows not others that he is concerned." This, says Dr. Nitobe seems to teach us that a wise man need care very little what the general public thinks of him, since they can know very little of his real character, but that we are all under an obligation to endeavour to form just estimates of the characters of others. Dr. Nitobe proceeds to draw attention to the enormous amount of slander and general depreciation of others that prevail in this country. He thinks that the love of running others down and the readiness to believe evil reports constitute one of the greatest defects in Japanese character. The slander column of the newspaper is usually the first to be read, even by educated Japanese, and the credulity shown when commenting on the contents of this part of the paper is astonishing. Some people, says Dr. Nitobe, blame the newspaper for publishing this class of matter, but were there no general demand for it among the public, it would not appear. Dr. Nitobe next goes into the question of a man's defending himself against press attacks and reaches the conclusion that it is useless. He says that recently when a silly story concerning him was appearing in various papers he thought first of stating the real facts, but he remembered the verse:—

Miru hito no kokoro-gokoro ni makase oki, Takane ni sumeru aki no yo no tsuki.

"The harvest moon that shines above the mountain peak may well be left to the contemplation of each one who sees it." People all interpret things according to the bent of their own minds. Those who wish to think evil of a man are not deterred by anything he may say in self-defence (Kembun suru mono wa mata sono bengō wo katte ni kaishaku shi, masu masu mendō to naru). Dr. Nitobe relates a remarkable instance of indifference to gross slander. Concerning the pious priest Hakui Zenji* the following story is told. The unmarried daughter of one of his parishioners having given birth to a child, the parents asked who the father was, and the daughter replied Hakui Zenji. Proud of the honour shown to their daughter, the parents brought up the child in a most careful manner. From them came no remonstrance, but other parishioners went to the priest and told him what they had heard. He simply replied:—"Ah! that's so! eh?" Years after, the mother of the child confessed to her parents that the tale about the priest being the father of the child was all made up and gave the name of the real father. Then the people who had slandered the priest went to him and told him of the girl's confession. He made the same reply:—"Ah! that's so, eh?" Neither what the public asserted nor what they denied concerned him one iota. Dr. Nitobe quotes the saying "Honour is a food that dead men eat" and points out that no man of character and integrity need trouble himself about what the world is saying about him.

Mr. K. Tajimi, who is well versed in Chinese affairs, contributes an article to the Jitsugyō no Nihon entitled Why are our traders in China defeated by the Germans? the gist of which we give below:—Considering how many and how great are the advantages Japanese merchants in China possess compared with Europeans, the inferior position they occupy can only be accounted for on the assumption that they are not qualified to succeed. From personal observation I have reached the conclusion that my fellow countrymen in China need to radically alter their tactics if they wish to take the lead in business there. (1) They neglect to study Chinese customs and ways. Japanese residing in China are too much inclined to keep aloof from the Chinese and only to fraternize with Europeans or their fellow-countrymen. The Germans adopt an opposite policy. There are now over 200 Germans who have donned Chinese dress, and in numerous other ways the Germans display sympathy with the Chinese and thus win their favour. (2) Our traders fail to take note of the changing tastes of the Chinese. Year in and year out we go on importing the same articles, despite the fact that the Chinese are moving ahead and demanding a different class of goods. "The tastes of Chinese women need more attention than our people give to them. They are not in the habit of doing their own shopping. It is all done by men, who are intimately acquainted with their wants. From these middle-men much information could be obtained as to the goods most in demand, if our traders were to seek for it. (3) There is no change in our way of treating the Chinese. That traders should treat their customers with deference and politeness goes without saying. But the airs put on by many of our shopkeepers in China towards the Chinese resemble those of the Japanese officials in this country who condescend to allow private citizens to purchase Government property (Kaimono ni kita kyakujin ni tai suru taido ga, waga kuni no kwanri ga jinnin ni buppin harai sage wo suru toki to onaji no ga ta-sū de aru). There are stories constantly told of gross insults offered to the Chinese by our Japanese shopkeepers. All this is of course fatal to success in business of any kind in a foreign country. (4) We must stop sending roughly-made articles to China.

Tōkyō is far ahead of Ōsaka as regards the quality of the articles manufactured. But the business methods of the Ōsaka tradesmen are very superior to those of Tōkyō. In China Ōsaka goods have a bad name, so that where the Chinese are making purchases they ask when articles were made. But owing to the fact that the Ōsaka shopkeepers doing business in China are far more efficient dealers than the Tōkyō sellers, Ōsaka goods to-day have a larger sale than Tōkyō articles, despite their inferiority. If this continues, we shall soon be cut out by the Germans, who can produce better articles for the prices which our goods fetch in China.

Mr. Takekoshi Yosaburō in the pages of the Tuiheiyō, with his wonted nerve, urges his fellow-countrymen to turn their backs on America and Manchuria as spheres for colonization and to settle in the islands of the South-Pacific Ocean. In America the Japanese suffer from race jealousy and antipathy. In China, they are almost sure to be eventually ousted by the Chinese, but southward Japan can expand to her heart's content without encountering any insurmountable obstacles. It is in hot countries that most money is to be made in the future, Mr. Takekoshi observes, and the Japanese have never succumbed to the heat wherever they have hitherto gone. Rubber-growing, the most promising of all industries at the present time, may be carried on in islands that still lie open for settlement to enterprising Japanese. "Turn your eyes southward!" is the advice of Mr. Takekoshi to his fellow-countrymen.

From the *Bunshō Sekai we extract the following remarks on magazines made by Mr. Shimamura Hōgetsu, the talented editor of the Waseda Bungaku and one of the best judges of Japanese current literature the country possesses. I was talking to Dr. Takada of the Waseda University the other day about magazines in general, and among the observations he made there are some that I wish to record here. He shall now speak for himself. After giving them a wide berth for some time, I have of late been reading some of our leading magazines, such as the Taiyō, the Chūō Kōron and the Nihon oyobi Nihonjin, but I can't say that I find a great deal in any of these periodicals that is very attractive to me. The Chūō Kōron Character Sketches seem to me to be a little too plausible, to be somewhat overdone. There is much good reading in Dr. Miyake's organ the Nihon oyobi Nihonjin. But it has the defects of a one-man-organ. We know beforehand what to expect. As to other magazines all I can say is that, speaking generally, they are not to my taste, regarded as literature. I feel the same way, says Mr. Shimamura. We have no writing in this country that at all resembles the essays and reviews contributed to English magazines by Macaulay and Carlyle fifty years ago. The nearest approach to the reflections on men and things found in the writings of these two eminent men is to be seen in the pages of Dr. Miyake's magazine. But Dr. Miyake loves to be eccentric, to look at things the wrong side up, and so he is not a reliable guide. If we could have a writer going deeply into subjects the way he does in a more sober manner and giving us the results of his examination of the actual facts of life, he would be read with delight by people like myself.

I will now proceed to record the impression made on me by the leading magazines. To begin with the Chūō Kōron, the novelettes constantly published by that magazine in supplements attract much attention and exert considerable influence on our literature. I can't say I read them all, nor do I go through all the other parts of the magazine. Where the Chūō Kōron excels is in obtaining contributions from a number of prominent men. This gives a special interest to that periodical. From the Shumi (Taste) I have always expected much. It has invariably aimed at being original. It publishes short stories, plays and verses. But it is only a small magazine, and its high ideal can not be said to have been realized up to the present time. As for the Taiyō, I only read Mr. Hasegawa Tenkei's reviews of current literature published by it from time to time. Among purely literary magazines those most worthy of mention are the Subaru, the Hototogisu, the Bunshō Sekai, the Teikoku Bungaku, the Mita Bungaku, the Bungei, the Shinshōsetsu, the Bungei Kurabu. Of these perhaps the Bunshō Sekai ranks first; though the Subaru publishes much entertaining matter from time to time. A sister magazine to the Subaru is the Mita Bungaku, which is rendered entertaining by the stray notes contributed by Mr. Nagai Kafū. The Teikoku Bungaku is full of the productions of young men, graduates or undergraduates. Immaturity marks it throughout. It frequently fills pages with abusive articles that can do no good. The Shinchō (New Current) is essentially a young man's magazine. If report be true, there are some very talented writers on the editorial staff, but the range of subjects treated in this periodical is too limited. Whether it will ever do more than voice the sentiments of young men seems uncertain. There are several literary organs that are largely devoted to the publication of correspondence received from young men. Such are the Shūsai (秀才) Bundan and the Hagaki Bundan. These publications are doing good work in encouraging promising young men in the provinces to try their hands at composing. The newest of all literary organs are the Sekai Bun- gei, the Sōsaku (創作) and the Shin Bungei. Among these the Sōsaku is the most entertaining, aiming as it does at publishing a large quantity of original matter. The writing in this magazine maintains a high standard of excellence.

* A title given to priests who are considered to be specially virtuous.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY).

* * *

In the Shin Kōron, a magazine that fills most of its space with extracts from current literature, and hence is the Japanese Review of Reviews, but which nevertheless publishes a few original articles, we find three essays dealing with the shortcomings of the Department of Education. The first is from the pen of the President of the Keiōgijuku University, Mr. Kamada Eikichi. He maintains that the greatest of all the evils attendant on the present method of carrying on education in State Schools is the enforcement of uniformity, the one-mould-for-all system, as Mr. Kamada calls it. The proposed reforms now under discussion show no signs of change in this respect. The Department seems to be as determined as ever to force everybody into line. Ordinances, rules, commands, endless injunctions, all have one object, the removal of all angularities, that is, in effect, the crushing out of individuality. Natural talent languishes under this grinding system. The nation can not reach its full capacity as long as the development of individual faculties is hindered as it now is.

Dr. Miyake Yūjirō says that the Mombushō can accomplish nothing but minor reforms, for the simple reason that it does not enjoy the confidence of the Diet nor does any Minister of Education command the support of the Cabinet of which he is a member. Radical reforms can not be carried out unless big sums of money are spent. The Treasury is unwilling or unable to provide this money, and so the Department has to fall back on the increase of local taxes for the carrying out of improvements in its system of administration. The Minister of Education always lacks power. He is no real ruler. The work he does resembles that done by ordinary officials. This is extremely to be regretted (Nihon no kyōiku wa shidō shite yukubeki mono ga zokuri no nasubeki shigoto ni nomi jūji shite iru yō na koto wa, kokka no tame ni ōni ūrebeki shidai de aru). As long as this situation lasts no great change in the system of education can be hoped for.

Mr. Mukō Gunji, a well known educationist, specifies three particulars in which the nation desires to see a change in the Department of Education. The first concerns the Minister, the second the Vice-Minister, and the third the higher officials of the Department. As regards the present Minister of Education, Mr. Komatsubara, Mr. Mukō fears he does not realize that the Japanese world has moved ahead and that the despotic methods of government universally followed a few decades ago won't answer now. Mr. Komatsubara possesses one quality which is much needed in a Minister of State, that is, resolution. For minute knowledge of educational affairs he is dependent on others. He seems to have been laid hold of by the conservatives and unduly influenced by them. For a Minister nowadays to be guided only by what officials tell him and to ignore public opinion can only result in his adopting a wrong policy. (2) The present Vice-Minister of Education utterly ignores public opinion, though he has on several occasions professed to be willing to bow to it. The proposed measure for reforming the system of education, instead of harmonizing with the views of those who have given most attention to the subject, is in direct opposition to them. (3) Perhaps it is unreasonable to expect men who only serve the Department as a means of making a living to have any principles or to favour one policy rather than another, but all high officials are under an obligation to consider the welfare of the State and to give to the Minister of Education a true account of the condition of affairs in Government schools.

In the April number of the Shin Kōron appeared an article written by a foreigner entitled: Nihonjin ni kawatte Beikokujin ni oshiyu (Instruction for Americans from a Japanese point of view).^{*} This gave the Japanese side of the questions in dispute between certain Americans and certain Japanese. In the June number of the same magazine the opinions of Americans residing on the Pacific coast concerning the Japanese are set forth in an article written by Japanese entitled: Beikokujin ni kawatte Nihonjin ni oshiyu. We will epitomize as much of the essay as we can find space for here. The opinion held by many Japanese is that because we overcome Russia in war, that therefore we are equal or even superior to countries like England and America in other things. This seems to me to be the height of a self-congratulation that is founded on ignorance (Makoto ni seken mizu no omedetai koto no chōjō to omou). Now it is very important that we should know what is the impression the Japanese settled on the Pacific coast and elsewhere have made on Americans. Why is it that, though they welcome immigrants from Europe, they want to get rid of our people? Difference of race and customs and the cheapness of Japanese labour no doubt have something to do with the anti-Japanese feeling existing in the States, but the hostility felt to Japanese is to be traced to other causes. (1) The Americans do not regard the Japanese settled in the States as their equals. Differences of race and religion would count for nothing if the Japanese people were regarded by the Americans as on an equality with themselves. In self-defence every nation desires to get rid of undesirable people. Japan is constantly reminding the world of the fact that in race and in many other respects she is one with China, yet what happened when a number of Chinese coolies were hired for employment on the Kagoshima Railway? The contract was cancelled by order of the Government, on the ground of the inferiority of these coolies to the Japanese, that is, as a preventive against the debasement of the Japanese. That is precisely the American point of view. (2) Why do the Japanese in America refuse to assimilate themselves to the Americans and assimilate themselves to the Chinese? They reside in what is known as China-town and thus show where their sympathies lie. (3) The Japanese settled on the Pacific coast are dirty in their habits.—In this country Japanese pride themselves on their cleanliness, but that those settled in California are so dirty that landlords object to rent houses to them is a fact nobody can deny. (4) The Japanese settled on the Pacific coast cultivate insularity and resist cosmopolitanizing influences.—Instead of writing their language in a way that would make it capable of being understood by Americans without much effort, they keep strictly to the ideographs, rendering the use of typewriters impossible. In religion, in social intercourse, in trade, they display insularity and exclusiveness. No wonder they are unpopular. (5) Family life as it exists in Japan is not to be seen among our people in California. In this country there is much that is beautiful about our domestic life. But the condition of the Japanese residing on the Pacific coast can only be compared to that of the Eta in pre-Meiji days. Each class, each clique keeps itself separate from other classes and other cliques. They abuse each other and squabble endlessly. The men from Yamagata will have nothing to do with those from Kagoshima, and so on. (Shitto ari, haiseki ari, enkon ari, sōtō ari).

There are doubtless particulars in which we have something to teach the Americans, but they dwindle into insignificance when compared with the particulars in which the Americans are far ahead of us.

The greatest thing we have to fear to day is national vanity. There are people who talk grandly about invading and conquering America, without knowing what they are talking about. We should do well to note the fact that our greatest enemy is not a foreign country, but self-conceit. To think that because we conquered the Chinese when they used seventeenth and eighteenth century weapons and because we conquered the Slavs, who have never known what it is to fight for freedom, that there is no country in the world that we need fear to meet in battle is the very acme of folly. Could there be more silly talk than this? It would never do for us to measure our strength against a country like America. Korea might be more easily compared to Japan than Japan to America, regarded economically, and money constitutes the sinews of war. What is our connection with America? What have we done there except send a number of low-class coolies who are lacking in some of the best moral qualities to obtain from the Americans as much money as they can get in order to send it back to Japan? Can this kind of expansion be regarded by the State or the nation as likely to bring us honour? The whole gist of the article may be summed up in the words: If cause for complaint there be, the Americans have infinitely more cause to complain than any right-thinking Japanese can possibly have.

NAKAE CHOMIN.

Nakae Chōmin will always be regarded as one of the literary luminaries of the Meiji era. It is not ten years since he passed away amid the lamentations of his fellow-countrymen under painful circumstances. There is certainly no Japanese writer living to-day who is so eagerly and widely read as was Nakae during the last months of his sojourn among us. In 1899, after being informed by the doctors that only eighteen months of life remained to him, he published a book entitled 一年有半 Ichinen-yūhan. The first edition of this work, consisting of 10,000 copies, was sold in 3 days. The second edition was bought up as soon as issued and a third edition was forthwith published. The first edition of Macaulay's History consisting of 3,000 copies, went in 10 days. The next edition, consisting of 13,000 copies, took four months to sell. Of course price has to be considered in estimating rapidity of circulation, but as the Japanese are not regarded as a reading people, the eagerness they showed on this occasion was certainly remarkable, the more so as Nakae exposed national weaknesses and defects in a more unsparing manner than has ever been done by any Japanese first-class writer. Some foreigners seem to be under the impression that the Japanese are fond of being flattered and consequently they supply them with big doses of blarney. But I have invariably found that though small-minded Japanese are full of vanity and are highly pleased when praised, the country is full of men to whom anything resembling flattery is loathsome, who prefer blunt, unreserved speech, that calls a spade a spade, to the sugared remarks in which certain speakers and writers are wont to indulge. How Nakae's Ichinen-yūhan and a subsequent work called Zoku Ichinen-yūhan were received by his fellow-countrymen I purpose showing by quoting from the reviews of these books which appeared at the time of their issue written by Mr. Tokutomi, the Editor of the Kokumin Shimbun, and an anonymous contributor to the same paper whose well-known nom de plume was "Muyen," and by summarizing Toyabe's essay on the life and writings of the man whom it has become the fashion to call the Rousseau of Japan. Here is the gist of Mr. Tokutomi's critique:—

This book represents the opinions of a man who is suffering from a mortal disease and hence of a man who is conscious that this will be his last say, so to speak. Under these circumstances Mr. Nakae has said many things that writers differently situated would withhold. A year and a half the doctors told him some time ago was the approximate limit of his life's duration. Hence the title of the work. Mr. Nakae is well known to the public as a man who in addition to possessing an intimate knowledge of Chinese literature has studied French books very thoroughly. His published works show him to be a scholar of exceptional insight, and thus his last book is in many ways more striking than anything he has written. It contains numerous accusations of men and much condemnation of a variety of things, but the advice with which its pages abound cannot but serve a useful purpose. Possessing an intimate knowledge of Japanese human nature, Mr. Nakae has found it an easy task to put his finger on national weaknesses. To quote a few instances: "Japanese know well in what their interests consist, but they do not know what is right and reasonable. They allow themselves to be swept along by events without reflecting whether they are going. For centuries accustomed to submit to the violence and arbitrariness of the samurai without opposition, they do not give their conduct a moment's thought, but just act from impulse. What are wanted in this age are not warriors, but philosophers, not men of action as much as men of thought." . . . "There are lots of men who can talk and many that use their hands well, but few who use their brains" (Nihon nite wa kuchi no hito, te no hito ôku shite, nô no hito sukunashii). . . . "Japanese are too easy-going. They attach themselves to things too impulsively and give them up with equal readiness. They are lacking in seriousness of mind. They too readily agree with those whom they meet and are apt to flatter." This is all true, remarks the Kokumin, but we hardly expected to hear it from a man given to drinking. Nakae's character sketches are well worthy of consideration, though we cannot agree with what he says in many cases. He speaks of Marquis Saigô as lacking in courage and resolution in action. In this Mr. Nakae is quite wrong. Marquis Saigô excels in the very quality in which he is represented as being deficient. He is a man who is seen at his best in a difficult situation. When many men would be at a loss what course to follow, his mind is always made up. Of Marquis Saionji, Mr. Nakae says, "He is a man of lofty ideas and broad views, extremely intelligent and possessing great insight into affairs. He sees through things at once. Hence he is not easily carried away by curiosity nor does he show any great enthusiasm for new things. On this account people say he is cold and indifferent. But his mood is the result of insight in most cases." More than half of this is true, says the Kokumin, but Mr. Nakae knows the Saionji of ten years ago and not the Saionji of to-day. . . . The chief value of the Ichinen-yûhan consists in the manner in which it makes known to us the real Nakae, whom we take to be an honest and a very discerning writer. People are surprised that a man of such talent and knowledge of affairs should spend his days in drinking. . . . But the fact is Mr. Nakae has seen enough of the world and its ways to be disgusted with it, and he seems to have come to the conclusion that human life won't bear thinking about; so, as a diversion, he drinks and now and again makes strange remarks that few understand. These freaks are to be regarded as his method of giving outlet to his mental dissatisfaction. The Nakae known to most people is the surface Nakae and not the real man. Although so fond of learning, he has always taken a keen interest in political affairs. There has been no greater enemy to the Sat Chô Clan Government than he. He has been called the Rousseau of Japan because he has always championed the cause of the people. The terms for the popular party and the official party, Mintô and Ritô, were invented by him. But when the two great parties that represent the popular cause the Jiyûtô and the Kaishintô, became hostile to each other, Nakae's interest in politics ended and he went into business. In this he was unsuccessful and it is pathetic to find so fine a man summing up his misfortunes in such words as the following:—Waga jigyô ni okeru, mōke wa, tanin kore wotōri; son wa, ware hiki-uke; sono sue wa, saiban, bengōshi, shittatsuri, kyōbai, dandan to seme-kitatte taoretari. "The profits which my business brought were appropriated by others; the losses only fell to me—the end of it all being that, pressed by courts of law, by barristers, by bailiffs and by the sale of attached goods, step by step I was ruined." At this juncture he took to writing again, but, just when his many admirers were rejoicing over his return to the literary world, the hand of death was laid on him, and here we are reviewing his dying utterances. It is a sad case, but there is comfort in the thought that Nakae leaves behind him a number of disciples who will perpetuate his influence in the world. As regards money-making and the like, he was always the most unbusiness-like of men. One day a few months ago he took his wife to Sakai. There on the shore the two conversed cheerfully at first, but suddenly Nakae's soul clouded over and he turned to his wife and said, "I am only waiting for death. Being a man, I have read much and know what is true and what is right. Therefore my thoughts yield me much pleasure. So much is this the case that, though stricken by a mortal disease, often I forget my trouble. But you my wife, being a woman, though of late years you have listened with delight to what I have to say on many subjects, have not sufficient mind to explore things for yourself. I have shown myself to be a poor hand at making money and have accumulated nothing but debts, and now I have to leave you to provide for yourself. You are too old to marry again." Then, smiling, he said to his wife, "Shall we go into the sea and accompany each other to paradise like two constant lovers?" Whereupon they both laughed merrily and so the affair ended. The language used in describing this scene is very beautiful, and yet so sad that it is hard to read it with dry eyes. He was evidently trying to act the stoic, but ever and anon the epicurean part of his nature would assert itself. The blending of joy and sorrow, laughter and weeping is all reproduced in his book in a most telling manner until the reader feels as though he himself were passing through the same dread ordeal and attempting to meet death with a smile. To speak of this man as the Rousseau of Japan is to misrepresent him. He is far more sober than the great French radical and his mind is better balanced. The general public knows him not. Those who really know him express no surprise as they read the Ichinen-yûhan.

Mr. Nakae read the Kokumin's review with great pleasure and sent for Mr. Tokutomi to thank him for his appreciation of his views and real character. On that occasion Mr. Nakae said, "I am no wild schemer, but an ordinary practical man of the world. I am no Rousseau."

The subject of the Zoku Ichinen-yûhan, was given as Mushin, Mureikōn (No God and no Soul). A review of the Mushin, Mureikōn appeared in 1901 in the Kokumin Shimbun over the signature of "Muyen," the writer who criticized Dr. Hozumi's "Ancestor Worship" in the columns of the same paper. The following is the substance of "Muyen's" review. This book is published as a supplement to or a continuation of the Ichinen-yûhan and bears the title of Zoku Ichinen-yûhan. The former work dealt with literature principally. This one treats of philosophy. Mr. Nakae rejects the popular theories in reference to the existence of God and a soul and advocates the view that all philosophy must rest on an experimental, intellectual and scientific basis. The philosophy advocated is wholly materialistic and savours of arbitrariness. The body becomes the principal essence (本體) to be relied on and the mind is worked by means of it. The bodily substance becomes imperishable, and thus we have an immortal body instead of an immortal soul. Matter alone is eternal and it forms the substratum of all things. Here "Muyen" complains of the ease with which Mr. Nakae reaches this startling conclusion—a conclusion which is directly opposed to the views of the majority of the world's great philosophers. To the majority of thinkers the Cogito, ergo sum argument suffices to demonstrate the existence of mind as distinct from matter. What is new about Mr. Nakae's book is not the theory it advocates, says, "Muyen," but the manner in which that theory is stated, which savours of the openness and unreservedness that characterize the true philosopher. In elaborating the theory that spirit perishes but matter remains, Mr. Nakae says:—"While the souls of Christ and Shaka have perished, even the roadside droppings of the horse last for ever. The spirit of Sugawara Michizane became extinct with his body, but the branches and leaves of the plum-tree he so much loved have propagated themselves a thousand times and secured for themselves an eternal existence."* Mr. Nakae then goes on to speak of himself thus, Ati taishitsu ni okasare, ichi nen, hannen to nichinichi, tsukizuki, shi ni chikazuki tsutsu aru jinbutsu nado ni arite wa, shinjin (深仁) shikō (至公) no Kami ari, mata reikon ga fumetsu de atte, sunawachi shingo (身後) nao dokuji no shi (資) wo tamochi-uru to shitaru naraba, ôini mizukara nagusamuru tokoro ga aru de arô; shikashi rigaku no sôgen (壯嚴) wo ikan sen? "For a man who is stricken with a mortal disease and who for the space of one year and a half, month by month and day by day, has been drawing nearer death, it would be no small solace to know that there is an all-loving and impartial God, that the soul is immortal and that hence human beings after death will have independent existence. But (if such theories be accepted) what becomes of the sacredness and inviolability of scientific truth?"† It is its plain declaration on this point that, makes this book so different from other works of the same kind. Even those who differ from Mr. Nakae cannot withhold their sympathy from him in his difficulty. Mr. Nakae is wholly devoted to what he considers to be the truth and cares not a straw for anything else. The pursuit of truth is his one delight. What makes this book valuable is the resolute manner in which it sets aside as quite untenable that theory which makes man the centre of the universe. The idea of the existence of a personal God and of an immortal soul has its origin in the notion that man is the centre of the universe and that his comfort and welfare are of more importance than all else in the system of existing things. To Mr. Nakae this theory appears to be the height of absurdity. To him it seems inconceivable that a being which in the great life of the universe, amid the infinities of time and space, of matter and motion, appears utterly insignificant, should be the pivot on which all the complicated system turns. The importance attached to human beings, the superiority of man to all other existences, to certain philosophers may appear to be an almost indispensable theory. But on what foundation does such an assumption rest? The notion that another life is needed to set straight or to atone for the inequalities of human lot in this one is based on the supposition that man's lot is the first consideration in the arrangement of the affairs of the universe. A study of astronomy and other sciences demonstrated to Mr. Nakae that there is no satisfactory ground for this supposition, and so current theology and current psychology were both rejected by him. But what is worthy of note is that his theory respecting the comparative insignificance of man, whom he regards as a mere dot on the great map of time and space, does not make him indifferent to the well-being of his fellow-creatures. These last two books of his are full of the most fervid utterances on truth and error, virtue and vice, right and wrong, and it is plain to him who reads between the lines that the author of these last messages to the world he is so soon to quit is a man who believes that he has a mission in life, that he can benefit his fellow-men by pointing out to them the way in which they should walk. He writes with utter indifference to both praise and blame, he covers up nothing, he deals in none of the popular plausibilities that pass for truth

* Lord Rosebery quotes from Napoleon's conversations words to the same effect. Thus:—"Say what you like, everything is matter, more or less organised. . . . A man is only a more perfect being than a dog or a tree, and living better. The plant is the first link in a chain of which man is the last. . . . It is my opinion we are all matter. When we are dead, we are altogether dead. "Napoleons the Last Phase." (pp. 170, 171).

† The meaning evidently is that Mr. Nakae would accept the popular theories about God and the soul of man if he could, but that to him truth is of more moment than personal comfort—a grand attitude for a man to take surely.

among undiscerning men—he writes with a tremendous earnestness. So, though as a philosopher and a well read scholar, the anthropolatry which places men on a higher throne than all cosmic existences, appears to him absurd, he evidently holds the opinion that in his own sphere and among his own people each individual man has duties to be performed from which he must not shrink even at the point of death. Self-dependence, self-development, earnestness, these are his watchwords. Thus we find that, ultra-materialist as he is, in point of devotion to a high moral ideal, Mr. Nakae inhabits a different world from mere lip-professors of religion. When the man himself and all his views be taken into consideration, his utterances are nothing like as dangerous as those of the religious bigot. (Ibutsuron no jissai teki no kiken wa, kanarazu shimo henkyō naru shūkyōka no tonaeru hodo kiken naru mono ni arazu). As a contribution to philosophical investigation it is doubtful whether Mr. Nakae's Zoku Ichinen-yūhan is of much value, but as a revelation of the foundation of Mr. Nakae's faith and as an indication of what was the keynote of his life and character it will be highly prized by all thinking people.

Toyabe's Essay on Nakae will be found in Vol. II of his Meiji Jimbutsu Gettan. To Toyabe Nakae seemed to be a man with two personalities. The Mr. Hyde who manifested himself up to the time of Nakae's fatal illness, in no way resembled the Dr. Jekyll who was the author of two remarkable reviews of human life, its pursuits and ideals. Nakae asserts in the Ichinen-yūhan that in writing this book he fulfilled his real mission in life; in this book his real self appears (Yo no honryō [本領] kono Ichinen-yūhan ni ari. Kore yo no shinga [real ego] nari). In the writer of this book, says Toyabe, we do not recognize the eccentric toper, the talented masquerader of former days. An author who himself had for years set the world an example in flippancy suddenly begins to lecture his fellow countrymen for not being more sedate. According to Nakae, lack of seriousness of mind is the greatest of all the defects of the Japanese people. That this doctrine was proclaimed by a man who, some years before, had amused the members of the House of Representatives by standing up in the House and saying that he had been so poisoned by alcohol that he really could no longer fulfil his duties as a member, astonished everybody. The fact is that in his Ichinen-yūhan Nakae extolled all that in his former works he had seemed to ridicule. In previous years so many wild things had he said that there were those who regarded him as insane. He was a worshipper of unconventionality. He wrote, did and reported the strangest things. Among them was a story about a man who thought the proverbial 3½ lines bill of divorce too long and so he compressed the words of dismissal into a seven-syllable Chinese poem (Shichigen zekku). That this noted crank, this transgressor of all the rules that bind ordinary members of society should be able to suddenly turn serious and assume the rôle of a preacher of righteousness and circumspect behaviour was naturally a great surprise to the world.

There are some, says Toyabe, who hold that at heart Nakae was a man of common-sense and that his eccentricities were all superficial—only being used as a masque to conceal his real sentiments. They say that he is to be regarded as a preacher of common-sense. But the fact is that he held the opinion that common-sense alone is an insufficient guide for a nation to follow, and in this he differed from Fukuzawa who may be said to be the apostle of common-sense. Nakae's contention was that at all stages of their past history the Japanese have suffered from the absence of thinking men, that is, philosophers, among them. In this country, from ancient times we have never had any philosophy (Waga Nihon mukashi yori ima ni itaru made tetsugaku nashi), says Nakae. The men who are called philosophers by us, such as Itō Jinsai and Butsu Sorai, or the learned founders of Buddhist sects, were mere transmitters of the teaching of others, and not the authors of original thoughts. What they studied and taught was either religion or ethics, and not philosophy. In modern times Doctors Katō and Inoue regard themselves as philosophers, and the world so designates them, but neither of them has thought out a system of his own. They have selected from Western philosophy certain theories or doctrines and have expounded them to their fellow-countrymen. Now, for a country to be without philosophers is like "having an alcove in one's drawingroom without possessing a scroll to hang in it." Descartes and Kant are scrolls that adorn the alcoves of France and Germany. To be without philosophers disqualifies a country for rank among the foremost Powers. Where a country has no philosophy the people are necessarily shallow-minded—neither depth nor far sightedness is to be expected from them. (Tetsugaku naki jimmin wa nanigoto wo nasu mo, shinen no i naku shite sempaku wo manukarezu).

Seeing that Nakae condemns the nation for its lack of philosophy, it might be thought perhaps that he himself was a philosopher. Into this question Toyabe goes somewhat minutely. Here are the conclusions he reached. That Nakae was fond of philosophy and had philosophic conviction on various questions is plainly shown by his books and his numerous magazine and newspaper articles, but notwithstanding the fact that he has been called the Japanese Rousseau, in the strict sense of the word philosopher he was certainly not one. The fascination of his writing lies in his style. His logic is often defective and depth of argument there is none. In vivid description of events, in portraiture of divers types of character, in painting pictures of the despotic age which preceded the French Revolution, he was at his best. He was no deep thinker. He was no originator of new ideas. Liberty and equality were his watchwords and clan government and the official caste system prevailing in this country had no greater and no more formidable enemy than this ardent representative of popular rights. Beyond the enunciation of democratic political principles he did not go, not even in his Ichinen-yūhan did he propound any system of philosophy. His last message to the world did no more than emphasize the doctrines he had been preaching years before. He dwelt in his own microcosm and in questions connected with the big outside world he took no special interest. In his Ichinen-yūhan he neither figures as an Epicurean nor as a Stoic. The view of human life that he gives us is a purely personal one, such as his unique experience had forced him to adopt. On the great problems of human life he threw no special light. He was the author of no philosophic system by which his name will be perpetuated.

Wherein then did Nakae surpass his contemporaries? In the skill with which he expressed his thoughts, in the variety and the abundance of his metaphors, in the strictness with which he observed the rules of rhetoric. Nakae was a polished Chinese scholar, so great a scholar that when he translated Rousseau's Du Contrat Social into classical Japanese, Nakamura Keiū and other great Sinologues were overcome with astonishment to find that a man who had spent years in a Western country and had made a special study of the French language had managed to acquire such a thorough mastery of the Chinese style of writing. That Nakae's forte lay in style is unquestionable, but he did not make the best of his capacities in this line by any means. He frittered away his time on a variety of occupations for which he was not cut out. He first entered the Genrōin as a translator, but soon relinquished his post there in order to start a French school. This was soon closed and Nakae took to journalism. This was somewhere about the year 1875, when, in conjunction with Marquis Saionji and Mr. M. Matsuda, he started the Tōyō Jiyū Shimbum in Tōkyō. After that he edited in succession the Jiyū Shimbum, the Shinonome Shimbum, the Nikkan Seion, the Rikken Jiyū Shimbum, and the Minken Shimbum. These various journals either died suddenly or lingered on a few months with death staring them in the face. And so Nakae's journalistic life ended in failure. Nor was he more successful as a member of the Diet, which he entered as one of the Ōsaka representatives at its commencement. When he saw how certain members of the Jiyū ha betrayed the popular cause, he resigned his membership in disgust and described the House of Representatives as a Muketsu-chū no Dōbutsu-en (A Zoological Garden full of bloodless insects). Subsequent to this he took to selling paper, to railway business, and to several other occupations in succession, with disastrous results in every case, as he himself confessed in his Ichinen-yūhan.^{*} He seemed lacking in worldly wisdom and lacking in pertinacity, or he would never have failed so often. In all he undertook he carried with him the sentiments of a philosopher and would feign have seen the paper trade and railway business conducted philosophically. But in business, persistency, regularity, and determination are more in request than fine philosophic theories.

The lives of Nakae and Fukuchi Genichirō resembled each other to a remarkable degree. Fukuchi went through all the stages through which Nakae passed. He worked as a government official, he joined a political party, he became a journalist, he entered the business world, and having failed at everything, he went back to his old and true self and resumed the use of his pen. (Shinga ni kayerite, fude no hito to nariki). But the two men differed in many particulars. Fukuchi dealt in objective thought, Nakae in subjective; Fukuchi's source of knowledge was the facts that came under his observation, while that of Nakae was the ideas he found in books; the bent of Fukuchi's mind was towards history, but that of Nakae towards philosophy; Fukuchi's wisdom was gained by contact with the world, while that of Nakae was heaven-born talent; Fukuchi looked on the world with the eyes of a conservative, while Nakae regarded it with those of a progressionist; Fukuchi's utterances sound like those of high government officials; but Nakae was the spokesman of the general public; Fukuchi's ambition was always to figure as an aristocratic materialist, while that of Nakae was ever to play the rôle of a democratic idealist. In weakness of will that caused failure in the various enterprises on which they embarked, the one was a facsimile of the other. But as for Nakae, his life regarded as a whole was by no means a failure. From his own point of view and from our point of view this talented man lost nothing by the reverses he experienced when revolving in orbits that were not his own. When a man who gives himself up wholly to politics and lives for nothing else fails to win renown as a statesman, he is to be pitied. When a man whose one object in life it is to make money in business does nothing but accumulate debts, he becomes an object of ridicule. When a man whose chief weakness it is to worship vain glory fails to have his vanity gratified, he becomes an object of contempt. But what cared Nakae for government service, politics or business pursuits, by means of which men make a name for themselves? He was a confirmed idealist and one of the most brilliant writers of his day. Did not that suffice? In what he aimed at excelling, in that he excelled.

Among the remarks which I have quoted from Toyabe's interesting analysis of Nakae's character there is one which calls for criticism. I refer to what he says concerning Nakae's title to be regarded as a philosopher. Toyabe seemed to hold that in order to rank with philosophers it is necessary for a man to have originated some new theory or principle or some new method of applying well-known principles or theories. But the men who in modern times have done this in any country may be counted on one's fingers. The general conclusion which those who have given their whole lives to the study of philosophy have reached is that no new principles are likely to be discovered.

That the progress of science provides abundant means for testing the trustworthiness of old principles is being shown by writers like Dr. Paul Carus, the editor of the Monist. Nakae originated no system of philosophy so he was no philosopher, in the strict sense of that term, says Toyabe. But in that case John Stuart Mill was not a philosopher, for though he expounded Utilitarianism, he was not its originator.

Objection might well be taken to what Nakae says about the lack of interest in philosophy among Japanese scholars. Prior to the Meiji era learned men in this country had few opportunities for studying Western philosophy. Chinese philosophy, such as it is, they did study and they founded three great schools of Confucian philosophy here. That at the present time there are hundreds of Japanese scholars who take a keen interest in Western philosophy and who could give a very accurate account of the tenets of the various schools is an undeniable fact. It strikes me that there are as many people in Japan who are interested in philosophy as there are in England or America. So that we reach the conclusion that both Nakae and Toyabe set up a false standard whereby to judge the Japanese people in respect of the interest taken in abstract thought.

There have been numbers of literary men in this country who have imitated Dr. Johnson and many other writers of his day in the way they have lived from hand to mouth or run into debt wholly and solely from ignorance or neglect of the most elementary business principles. But recently there has been improvement here as in many other quarters; and, moreover, competent authorities state that as a profession literature has become much more remunerative since the Russo-Japanese War. But what is known as the Eddoko spirit, the happy-go-lucky, devil-may-care ways admired so much in the Shōgun's capital and elsewhere in Pre-Meiji days are still held in high esteem among a certain section of the Japanese gentry. It is a part of the light-heartedness which characterizes the Japanese people and the necessity of which was so persistently dwelt on by Fukuzawa throughout his whole life. From the point of view of many Japanese, uncertainty, improvidence, trust in luck, and the like, serve as a relief to the dreary monotony and the unchanging mechanical working of the iron laws which govern most lives. Philosophic indifference to making money and carelessness in spending it always have been and still are extensively cultivated by the Japanese people. W.D.

CRIED WITH PAIN OF SKIN ERUPTION

Suffered 12 Months with Eczema—
Face, Hands and Neck Covered—Irritation Almost Drove Her Mad —Impossible to Do Her Work.

INSTANT RELIEF AND EASY CURE IN CUTICURA

"I suffered for twelve months with bad dry eczema. My face, hands and neck were covered with large sores. I was very bad. I had large patches on my face and felt I was going mad with the irritation. I went to the hospital for some time and then had a doctor at home. At the finish I had to have another doctor. Neither of them gave me medicine, only ointment, and it did not do me any good. I could not do my housework and had to pay to have it and my washing done. My husband thought I would have to go to the infirmary. One evening he bought me a box of — and that made it worse. I was crying all the time with pain. I could get no relief at all until I got a box of Cuticura Ointment. After using that I found instant relief and it stopped all irritation. I used three boxes of Cuticura Ointment and a cake of Cuticura Soap and was completely cured. I have recommended Cuticura to several people whom I know. Mrs. Alice Miners, 30, Ernest Road, Canning Town, London, E., Jan. 5, 1910."

Use of Cuticura Soap

And Cuticura Ointment means skin health and bodily purity in infancy and childhood and freedom, in the majority of cases, from torturing, disfiguring affections of the skin and scalp in after life. Those who value a clear skin, soft, white hands, a clean, wholesome scalp and live, glossy hair will find that these pure, sweet and gentle emollients more than realize every expectation.

Cuticura is the most economical treatment known for affections of the skin and scalp. A tablet of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment are often sufficient to cure. Sold throughout the world. Depots: London, 27, Charterhouse Sq.; Paris, 10, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin; Australia, R. Towns & Co., Sydney; India, B. K. Paul, Calcutta; So. Africa, Lennon, Ltd., Cape Town, etc.; U. S. A., Potter Drug & Chem. Corp., Sole Props., Boston. Post-free, 32-page Cuticura Book on the Skin.

Consumption Can be Cured

Derk P. Yonkerman, Specialist, whose Discovery of a Cure for Consumption has startled the World.

Marvellous as it may seem after the centuries of failure, a cure for consumption has at last been found. After twenty years of almost ceaseless research and experiment in his laboratory, the now renowned specialist, Derk P. Yonkerman, has discovered a specific which has cured the deadly Consumption even in its far advanced stages. In many cases, though all other remedies tried had failed and changes of climate were unable to check the progress of the disease, this wonderful specific has conclusively proved its power to cure.

Whatever your position in life may be, if you are in consumption, or suffer from asthma, bronchitis, catarrh, or any throat or lung trouble, this cure is within your reach, for it is a home treatment and need not interfere in any way with your daily occupation. Learn for yourself of its healing power,

ABSOLUTELY FREE.

Simply send your name and address to the Derk P. Yonkerman Co., Ltd. (Dept. 237), 6, Bouverie Street, London, E.C., and they will post to you a free book on the treatment by this remarkable remedy.

Don't hesitate or delay if you have any of the symptoms of consumption. If you have chronic catarrh, bronchitis, asthma, pains in your chest, a cold on your lungs, or any throat or lung trouble, write to-day for the free book of instructions, and cure yourself before it is too late.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, AUG. 27TH, 1910.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

A PLAN is now on foot to rebuild the Imperial Detached Palaces at Masan, Korea, and Taipeh, Formosa.

ON the 21st instant a reunion took place at Neimuro to celebrate the opening of the port. The meeting was a great success.

IT is reported that Mayor Saigo, son of the late great Saigo, will be created a Peer simultaneously with the realization of the annexation of Korea.

A SAPPORO despatch says that the recent fire at the Yubari Colliery has caused a loss of some 100,000 yen. The accident was due to a light offered to the deity.

COLONEL NOJIMA, of the Fifth Regiment of Infantry, has been appointed Commander of the Formosan Garrisons, having been promoted to the rank of Major General.

HIS HIGHNESS PRINCE YI of Korea, who was invested as Prince Ko on the 17th instant, ranks next to Prince Wi and receives an annual allowance of 20,000 yen.

WITH a view to making improvements in the method of packing various kinds of merchandise, a competitive exhibition will be opened in Osaka at the instance of the Chamber of Commerce of that city, from October 15 till November 28. The exhibits are required to be those manufactured after January, 1908.

THE date of Lieutenant Shirose's departure on his Antarctic expedition is now fixed as the 15th proximo. It is said that a certain eminent astronomer will accompany him.

IN compliance with the request of the late Dr. Kinoshita of Kyoto University, his body was dissected on Tuesday by Dr. Fujinami and Dr. Hayami at the dissecting-room of the University.

A CHINAMPHO despatch reports that two Japanese clerks of the Tsai-nei Iron Mine, were murdered on the 23rd instant on their way home from Shali. They carried 300 yen in cash with them, which money was of course stolen.

AN Osaka telephone message reports that on Monday morning two men who had the appearance of being students were arrested. They were suspected of being socialists. The police are reported to be continuing the investigation.

THE double-track repair at Yaitsu-Shimada section on the Tokaido railway, was completed on the 23rd instant, so that the whole of the Tokaido line is now open for its double-track service. The traffic between Ueno and Sendai was also restored on Tuesday.

LORD ESHER, in the House of Lords, stated recently that the total number of Territorial troops now raised—274,000—was likely to be the maximum number which could be raised under the voluntary system. This is 75,000 short of the establishment.

A NEW YORK telegram says that Mayor Gaynor who is now progressing very favourably, requires $1,000 a day for his medical treatment. The expense, it is said, will be defrayed by the Municipality on account of his being wounded as a public official.

IT is reported that the China-Manila Steamship Company, owners of the steamships Zafiro and Rubi which ply between Hongkong and Manila under the British flag, have decided to transfer the steamers to the American flag, in order to obtain a Government subsidy.

THEIR MAJESTIES the Emperor and Empress will shortly grant a certain sum of money to the sufferers from the recent floods in Tokyo and in other prefectures. Their Majesties will also send Imperial messengers to the inundated districts to inspect the extent of the disaster.

IN connection with the reduction of tariff for press telegrams between Japan and Russia, a convention will shortly be concluded between the two Governments. According to the tariff on the point of being concluded, the charge will be reduced to only 35 per cent. of the original rate.

EARLY MARRIAGES have been prohibited by the Commissioner of Education at Kirin who has issued instructions to all provincial authorities to that effect. No males under 20 years of age, or females under 17 are to be allowed to marry. The parents of any parties who disregard this order are to be liable to severe punishment.

MR. SONG PHONG CHUN, founder of the Il Chinhoi, reached Seoul on the 18th instant from Shimonoseki, without any notice. He says that his return to Korea has no particular significance, and is not connected with politics in any way. Mr. Yi Yong-ku, President of the Society, was to return to Seoul on the 19th inst from Chemulpo to see Mr. Song.

A TELEGRAM received on the 19th instant by the Department of Communications says that owing to landslides caused by the recent floods in New Mexico, through telegraphic communication between San Francisco and New York has been interrupted. Telegrams to New York were being sent via Seattle. It was expected that the communication would be restored in the course of the 19th.

A HONGKONG telegram says that Mr. Yuen, Viceroy of Kwantung and Kwangsu, has telegraphically requested the Peking Government to negotiate with Portugal in connection with the withdrawal of troops which are still stationing near Colawan, even after the subjugation of pirates.

The Hongkong Government has consented to having the Chinese Emigration Office stationed in the city, after receiving Viceroy Yuen's explanation.

ON the 21st instant the German Foreign Minister, in accordance with an order of the Kaiser, offered to Japanese Ambassador Chinda deep sympathy with the Japanese Court and Government on account of the recent floods in Japan. The Ambassador was ordered on Wednesday to express to the German Court His Majesty the Emperor's thanks for the above. The King of Italy having sent a telegram to the Japanese Emperor tendering the heartfelt sympathy with regard to the recent disasters, His Majesty the Emperor had a cordial telegram of thanks wired in reply.

THE floods have caused the prices of rice to rise, followed by the same tendency in all other commodities, so that the demand for capital must increase in consequence. But despite the fact that the withdrawal of deposits shows signs of increase, no influence has been brought upon advances. The total amount advanced by the Bank of Japan for the 15th indicated an excess of a million yen over that for the preceding day, representing 5 million yen which is just equivalent to the advances made during the good season. As the sphere of destruction wrought by the floods, is fairly great, prices will rise proportionately to the extent of damage when made clear. Thus the money market will undoubtedly become active as there will be much demand for capital for a time. Such is at least the view now prevailing among bankers.

ACCORDING to statistics covering the year 1908 which have been published, there were more cases of suicide in the Tōkyō fu than in any other part of Japan. In the majority of instances the ages of the self-destroyers in the metropolis ranged between 20 and 30. There were 163 men and 79 women of this age. The next most numerous class of suicides were over 50 years of age. Of these there were 124 males and 46 females. One fifth of these were driven to despair by the difficulty of making a living. Among young women whose ages ranged from 16 to 20, a large number attempted or actually committed suicide owing to domestic troubles. Among Tōkyō districts Honjo stands first, recording 125 attempts and 70 actual deaths. Next in order come Asakusa and Shitaya. The total for the city of Tōkyō is 308 attempts and 209 deaths, and for rural districts in other parts of Japan 268 attempts and 66 deaths, Shinagawa taking the lead with 76 deaths and 21 cases where the attempts at self-destruction were unsuccessful.

KOREA.

From a long telegram sent to the Koku-min Shimbun by its Seoul correspondent we gather that the attitude of the new Resident-General is greatly perplexing the quidnuncs of that city. They do not know how to interpret General Terauchi's policy or how to foretell the things that may eventuate at any moment. Prince Ito, according to this correspondent, definitely adopted a conciliatory programme; Viscount Sone was for letting things take their own way, but the only prominent characteristic of Viscount Terauchi's demeanour is silence. Everything is managed in the direct, unostentatious and reticent manner peculiar to soldiers. The Resident-General does not deny himself to callers, but somehow it has come to be understood that he is not accessible, and the crowd of parasites who previously thronged the portals of the Residency-General are now conspicuous by their absence. Viscount Terauchi does not give any indication that political parties have any existence in his eyes. There is no such thing as a hoi for the Resident-General. He treats these sort of combinations as though they were unworthy of attention. His attitude towards the press is even more remarkable. On the one side he controls the Japanese newspapers with an iron hand; on the other, he has ceased altogether to exercise any censorship of Korean prints. This sudden access of liberty is said to have greatly perplexed the editors of the vernacular press. They do not know how to interpret it, and they hesitate to make any use of the freedom thus suddenly accorded to them.

The Mainichi Dempo has a telegram which relates that over fifty Koreans, Ministers of State, ex Ministers and others, look forward to receiving patents of nobility when amalgamation is effected. They claim to have just as much right to this distinction as had the Japanese statesmen of the Meiji era? In connection with this, an interesting question suggests itself, namely, whence would money come to maintain these Korean titles. It is the generous custom of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan to present a sum of money, varying from 10,000 to 30,000 yen, to any new recipient of a title of nobility, the idea being that a nobleman should have some hereditary property to keep up his position. But it could hardly be expected that His Majesty would adopt this course towards newly created Korean peers, though they too could not be left in a state of impecuniosity.

Seoul is naturally full of rumours, and, as is the habit of rumours, none of them appears to have any basis of truth.

Mr. Nagasaki, Japanese Consul-General in Chientao, who is now in Tokyo on business connected with the drafting of regulations for the control of immigrants, is quoted as saying that there are 400 Japanese residents in Chientao, and 200,000 Koreans. Both are increasing, but especially the Koreans, many of whom find it inconvenient to reside in Russian territory, and others are unable to earn a livelihood on the Korean side of the river. It appears that there is an interesting question of customs dues connected with Funchun, which is the frontier town of Chientao. Hitherto goods entering there from Vladivostok have been admitted duty-free, if intended for consumption in Funchun. Russia, however, claims that these goods must be exempted from duties even when they pass into the interior of Chientao, and the immediate consequence is that import of foreign goods via Funchun has reached a figure of 2 million yen. Of course Japanese importers enjoy the same privilege under the most favoured nation clause.

According to a message from Seoul, Mr. Jensai-shun, Ex-President of the Railway Board was arrested, on the night of the 17th inst., for conspiracy. Several accomplices of his were taken into custody at the same time. Two more students, one of whom belonged to the Meiji University and the other to the Waseda, were also arrested on a similar charge.

There appears to be one man in Korea who understands the situation,—the Resident-General,—and he is quietly attending to his duties. Recently a considerable activity was noticeable among certain high Korean officials, which began to excite the populace, and these officials were requested as far as possible to avoid appearances which might cause trouble. In order to stop the spread of rumours which were beginning to create disturbances it was also found necessary for the police in Seoul to arrest eight agitators, who are being detained at the police station.

It was also thought advisable to prevent the sale of a number of issues of various well known Japanese papers, in Korea, as articles which appeared in them were calculated to excite disturbances. A number of copies which had arrived at Fusan were confiscated.

Japanese papers of recent date deny that negotiations regarding British interests in Korea have had anything to do with the delay in the matter of annexation. At the same time they admit that now, since the matter has come up, some questions in which Great Britain is interested, will probably be settled before the annexation is completed. These matters are all newspaper opinions however, and have little real significance. Very little is being said officially on this subject of annexation.

On Sunday afternoon Marquis Yamagata, President of the Privy Council, and Count Komura, Minister for Foreign Affairs, called on Marquis Katsura at his official residence, and the three statesmen consulted, it is alleged, about matters of the greatest importance. An extraordinary meeting of the Privy Council was held on Monday, it is said, to discuss matters in connection with the annexation question. Rumours are current—for which the Hochi Shimbun is mainly responsible—to the effect that the treaty of annexation has actually been signed. While we do not think much importance need be attached to these anticipations, we may mention that the gist of that journal's information relates to the renunciation of sovereign rights on the part of the Korean Emperor; the gradual revision, in the course of the next four or five years, of the Customs and various treaties; and the immediate removal of extraterritorial jurisdiction.

A report from Seoul states that Zen Kai-san, ringleader of the South Korea rioters, who had petitioned the Supreme Court for revision, has been finally sentenced to death.

Advices from Seoul continue to depict a somewhat excited state of affairs, meetings of Ministers, operations of newsmongers, suspensions of journals and conferences of agitators being reported as frequent. How much of this news is purely subjective and how much is hyperbole, we do not undertake to distinguish, but granting that all is accurate, there would be no reason for surprise. The transfer of a Kingdom to a foreign flag has never yet been accomplished without commotion, and Korea's case is not at all likely to be an exception to the general rule. Meanwhile the obviously erroneous telegram recently received with reference to England's action has been explicitly contradicted. The message said that the British Government had lodged a formal protest against annexation of the Peninsula by Japan and had urged the necessity of considering British interests. Not one person in every ten believed this story at the time, and the general incredulity is now justified.

Meanwhile one thing certain is that the censorship of the press has become exceptionally severe. Not only journals published in Korea, but also those going thither from foreign countries; are rigorously examined, and their circulation is at once forbidden if they contain anything calculated to excite the Korean people. No less than ten Japanese newspapers have been prevented from passing through the post-offices in Korea; and when we say that among these journals there are the Hochi Shimbun, the Asahi, the Myako, the Yomiuri, etc., it will be evident that the police are acting with exceptional severity. There can be no doubt that newspapers are a very dangerous kind of literature to place in the hands of people circumstanced as the Koreans are now; but, on the other hand, the Government must be prepared to find that every newspaper which it condemns to be excluded will thenceforward become an enemy.

Mr. Yung, father of the present Empress of Korea, seems to be somewhat of a mauvais sujet. It is stated that ever since his daughter's marriage he has been indulging his spendthrift proclivities, and his debts have more than once embarrassed the Imperial Household. He is said to have now squandered a sum of one million yen, and thirty of his creditors, Chinese and Japanese, have been summoned to the Household Department for the purpose of having their claims scrutinized.

A propos of the impending change, an extraordinary conference of the Privy Council was held on the 22nd inst., in Tokyo, in the presence of His Majesty the Emperor, when Marquis Yamagata, President of the Privy Council, Marquis Katsura, the Premier, and all the principal Councillors and Ministers were present. The Premier reported to the Throne with regard to the situation of Korea and subsequently the Foreign Minister explained in detail the diplomatic negotiations up to the present moment and the particulars of the amalgamation convention. While it is reported that the Imperial sanction has been granted to some important measures relating to the amalgamation, absolute secrecy is being observed as to the result of the conference. The form of settlement, it is said, will be that of a convention and will partake of the nature of amalgamation rather than annexation. The main points of the treaty now believed to be on the point of conclusion are as follows:—

(1) The Emperor of Korea shall concede to the Emperor of Japan the Korean sovereignty together with all territorial rights.
(2) The Korean Imperial Household shall be treated as a quasi-Imperial Family of Japan, continuing to have the annual allowance of 1,500,000 yen, while members of the Imperial Family and meritorious persons of the country are to be created peers, or endowed with certain grants.
(3) The name Korea shall be changed into "Chosen."
(4) The Korean Cabinet being abolished, the Residency-General shall be changed into a government of Governor-General, while as to the administrative business and Customs tariff, there will be no change for the present.

The expenses incidental to amalgamation are estimated at some 30,000,000 yen, which amount will, it is said, be met by an issue of government bonds. The existing treaties between Korea and the Powers will be cancelled with the proclamation of the amalgamation, but rights already acquired by foreigners in Korea will not be affected. Resident-General Viscount Terauchi is expected to return to Japan shortly for a time.

In Tokyo it appears to be believed that a definite programme has been elaborated with reference to all questions of a radical character bearing upon the problem of annexation. Further, on the 22nd instant, a cabinet council is said to have been held in Tokyo, when matters of historical interest were discussed in the presence of the Emperor. Some newspapers undertake to give a detailed statement of the decisions arrived at on that occasion, the gist of which has already appeared in these columns. With regard to changes of administrative organization, they are to form the subject of subsequent deliberation. It appears to be generally believed that Consular jurisdiction is not among the treaty obligations which Japan pledges herself to maintain.

It is stated that the Korean Government, on the 16th or the 17th inst., signified its consent to amalgamation, provided that members of the Imperial Family, subjects who have deserved well of their country, and the Yangban are treated with due consideration.

The 700 Korean students in Japan and their associates in Vladivostok and Seoul are said to be busily planning some coup in anticipation of amalgamation. These youths were much disheartened by the arrest of something like a score of their number, who had proceeded to Seoul for the purpose of appealing to public opinion, but they have again taken heart of grace, and have consequently become objects of close scrutiny by the police.

According to a Seoul telegram, a Cabinet Council was held on Monday morning at the Shotoku Palace, and subsequently the Cabinet Ministers and Councillor Kokubo reported the result of the conference to the Throne. In the afternoon Premier Yi and Mr. Cho, Minister of Agriculture, called on the Resident General at his official residence for the purpose of a formal interview which lasted more than an hour. The two Ministers subsequently repaired to the Tokiyu Palace to report to the ex-Emperor. On their return, another conference was held at the Daitoku Palace, in the presence of the Emperor, when the Imperial sanction is said to have been given for the opening of formal negotiations with the Resident-General on Tuesday. Viscount Terauchi is reported to have had an audience with the Emperor on Tuesday morning. Despite the great increase of comings and goings between the Korean Cabinet Ministers and high officials of the Residency-General, apparent tranquillity reigns in Seoul and in the provinces. The strictest precautions, however, are being observed against possible emergencies.

As the result of the impending amalgamation, the following treaties and agreements which now exist between Korea and the Powers, are expected to be abrogated preparatory to revision:—

- Treaty of Amity and Commerce with the United States (May, 1882).
- Supplementary to the above (May, 1883).
- Treaty of Amity and Commerce with Great Britain. Supplementary regulations on commerce and tariff law (November, 1883).
- Supplementary to the Treaty of Amity and Commerce with Great Britain (November, 1883).
- Treaty of Amity and Commerce with Germany. Supplementary regulations on commerce and tariff law (November, 1883).
- Supplementary to the Treaty of Amity and Commerce with Germany (November, 1883).
- Treaty of Amity and Commerce with Italy. Supplementary regulations on commerce and tariff law (June, 1884).
- Supplementary to the Treaty of Amity and Commerce with Italy (July, 1885).
- Treaty of Amity and Commerce with France. Supplementary regulations on commerce and tariff law (June, 1886).
- Supplementary to the Treaty of Amity and Commerce with France (June, 1886).
- Memorandum of the Postal Convention with France (April, 1901).
- Treaty of Amity and Commerce with Austria and its supplementary (June, 1902).
- Treaty of Commerce with China (August, 25th year of Kocho).
- Supplementary to the above (November, 25th year of Kocho).
- Treaty of Amity and Commerce with Belgium. Supplementary regulations on commerce and tariff law (March, 1901).
- Treaty of Amity and Commerce with Denmark. Supplementary regulations on commerce and tariff law (July, 1902).

THE NAVY.

The Mainichi Dempo professes to give an exact account of the naval programme for next year. There are at present in course of construction or armament under the Third Naval Programme ships aggregating 102,800 tons displacement. The appropriation on account of these ships next year is 22,840,275 yen, and the programme is to be completed in 1916. The ships are as follow:—

	AT KURE.	Tons.
Battle-ship Settsu	20,800
Battleship Aki	19,800
Armoured cruiser Ibuki	14,620
AT YOKOSUKA.
Battleship Kawachi	20,900
Armoured cruiser Kurama	14,620
AT SASEBO.
Cruiser Chikuma	5,000
AT MAIZURU.
Destroyer Umikaze	1,150
AT NAGASAKI.
Cruiser Yahagi	5,000
Destroyer Yamaarashi	1,150

Further, two 700-ton destroyers are on the programme.

In addition to the above, which form part of the already undertaken scheme, the following ships are on the original programme, namely two cruisers of 5,000 tons each; three armoured cruisers of 20,000 tons each, and one battleship of 20,800 tons. But if all these vessels are to be equipped with the heavy armaments now approved by naval experts, the expenditure on account of them will have to be increased, and the Diet will be asked next session to grant a sum of 13 to 20 million yen for that purpose.

"THE TIMES" EXHIBITION NUMBER.

The Exhibition number of The Times contains in all 96 pages, 24 of which are devoted to articles and 72 to advertisements. By advertisements we do not refer to the ordinary type of notice appearing in newspaper columns for the purpose of announcing some article for sale or some services for hire. The advertisements in The Times are designed to introduce Japan to the notice of foreign nations, and are all accompanied by descriptions and statistics of an exhaustive and instructive character, as well as by interesting photographs. It must have been a colossal work to collect the materials for such a number, to combine them and to prepare them for publication in the short time devoted to the task. Only a journal with the enormous resources of The Times could have carried such a work to successful completion. Twenty-four pages of articles means 144 columns, which perhaps gives a better idea of the amount of reading matter than a reference merely to the number of pages. In fact, this issue of The Times ought to be in the possession of every one connected directly or indirectly with Japan. We append the catalogue of articles:—

REFLOATING of the stranded Bedford is reported to have been begun on Wednesday morning. It is, however, said that the work will end in failure, as the water is getting into the vessel rapidly.

CHINA.

Double-track work on the east-of-Baikal section of the Trans-Siberian railway is progressing, says a message from Harbin. The section between Muysowaya and Chita is expected to be finished this winter.

Harbin is inundated by the flooding of the Sungali river. The water is three feet deep in the streets, and the Japanese residents are making preparations for flight, in the event of the conditions growing worse. Embankments are being made of bags filled with earth and sand to mitigate the floods as far as possible.

Mr. Sheng Hsuan-huai, the newly appointed Vice-Minister, evidently does not hesitate at difficulties. His recent proposal to adopt the Gold Standard in China, while it meets with general outside approval, is a sufficiently startling beginning. The Government apparently approves, but the suggestion is made that this, like almost every other improvement contemplated in China, involves an expense for which she is sadly unprepared. It would be well if China could adhere to a fixed policy and effect these reforms gradually, as has been done in Japan. But it seems from past experiences that she must either make reforms under pressure, on impulse, or they will be permitted to die out as soon as the popular feeling subsides. The new Vice-Minister was appointed to reform the coinage system and a great deal is expected of him, from the manner in which he has begun. Just how far he will succeed in his undertakings is a matter of conjecture.

Seventy young men have been sent to America to enter various educational institutions. Native educators express great gratification that these men are largely the product of Government Schools, and not necessarily, as heretofore, of missionary institutions. Such expressions are by no means anti-missionary, but merely convey the appreciation of the advance of general education in the country. The examinations are said to have been very severe, and the candidates selected to be a very fine company of students.

The boycott of American goods at Canton seems to be firmly established. Recent reports are to the effect that a basis of action has been agreed upon between the merchants in Canton and Chinese merchants in America. Merchants in other cities are still holding aloof however. This is particularly the case of merchants in Hongkong, without whose coöperation the Canton boycott would lose much in effectiveness. American reports on the situation state that the conditions complained of are necessary to prevent the wholesale smuggling of Chinese into America and that they must continue.

The prohibition of opium smoking, and of its production, is one of the greatest of the tasks China has set for herself. This difficulty is greatly enhanced from the fact that sometimes the official, on whom devolves the duty of enforcing the prohibition laws, is himself an opium smoker.

When one remembers the prevailing state of lawlessness in the interior provinces, it is not difficult to picture the result of attempts at prohibition. It appears that China, fearing a general uprising, has begun this matter by effecting the prohibition of production in one section at a time. Severe punishments have been inflicted, as well as the more effective method of having the crops, wherever found, ploughed up in the presence of the officials. Meanwhile, other sections produced their crops and smoked them exactly as heretofore. The immediate result of this policy was that the price increased manyfold. Victims of the habit, who could not secure the money to purchase the drug, resorted to violence, and even robbery in many instances, to procure it. As fast as one section is settled down, the task is undertaken in a new province and the same scenes repeated, with the exception that each step decreases the supply, with a corresponding increase in price.

The good effects are already very noticeable; apart from the general health of the communities, food stuffs are reduced in price—large sections previously devoted to the cultivation of the poppy now being devoted to the production of grain and vegetables.

This greatly increased price of the drug has brought about another serious complication which gives promise of developing an international phase. The facts are clearly set forth in an article which appeared in the Manchester Guardian, which we here reproduce:—

In 1909 the increase in the amount of foreign opium imported at Canton was little short of 100,000 lb., and this in spite of the agreement to reduce the quantity exported from India by one-tenth every year. The Chinese, by the way, maintain that the Indian exporters are now sending opium to China by way of Persia, and this is a matter which the Government of India ought to investigate. In order to restrict the consumption of the drug at Canton the Viceroy put into force a series of regulations imposing licences and permits, which, of course have to be paid for, and placed and management of them in the hands of one wholesale firm, through whom alone retailers could purchase opium. The foreign importers found that this measure restricted their sales, as it was no doubt intended to do, and protested that it was an infringement of their treaty rights. The British Legation at Peking upheld their view and appealed to the Chinese Foreign Office; the Foreign Office has admitted the illegality of the opium tax, and has undertaken to instruct the Viceroy to discontinue it. That is to say, owing to the British protest, the tax will be withdrawn, and the Viceroy's efforts to suppress the opium habit will be to some extent thwarted. That, it will be said, and rightly, is discreditable to this country. But let us be quite clear what ought to be done. It appears to be unreasonable to say that, treaty rights being what they are, the British Legation should not have consented to support the merchants' appeal. The British Government has made the treaties dealing with the opium question, and British merchants transact business on the strength of the treaties. If the British Government now wish, as it says it does, to assist China in her crusade against the traffic, and if it is satisfied that China has made and is making sincere and vigorous efforts to that end—and even those who at first were skeptical now declare themselves convinced—then the Government should so modify the treaties as to allow China to work out her salvation as speedily as possible, and that, so long as they are unmodified, she cannot do. The Viceroy defended the taxation which he imposed on the ground that it was a matter of internal administration. It ought to be, and it would be if China were a strong instead of a weak Power. What we have to do is no longer to take advantage of China's weakness or of the treaties for which that weakness is responsible, but as speedily as possible, now that China has proved the genuineness of her intentions, to renounce any privileges which prevent her being mistress in her own house.

It has been a constant remark among well-known persons that China is just now suffering from the dangerous defect of want of a head. This criticism has been particularly loud since the removal of Yuan Shih-kai. Apparently the fact has been appreciated by the Prince Regent, for the recent changes in the personnel of high officials are regarded as pointing to the return of Yuan to power. There are, of course, special reasons in special cases. For instance, his Excellency Wu Yu-sheng is reduced in office on account of his ignorance in the matter of the new Russo-Japanese Convention, and Mr. Sheng Hsuan-huai becomes Assistant Vice-President of the Board of Communications in the expectation that he will succeed in solving the problem of foreign loans for domestic-railway purposes. Speaking broadly, the Prince Regent and his advisers are credited with having applied themselves to forming a Cabinet in which all the talents shall be represented, and which shall have some claim to the esteem and liking of every foreign Power. The return of Yuan Shih-kai to office would be a happy event for China, and we shall be interested in observing the reception accorded to the incident by the Japanese, who were originally credited with having exerted their influence in a sense hostile to Yuan.

Another theory has it, that the changes now made are in connection with the Prince Regent's wish to eliminate all statesmen favourable to the immediate opening of a national assembly. But we find it difficult to reconcile that hypothesis with the fact that an essentially conservative politician, Shih Hsu, is one of the principal sufferers by the change, while the essentially progressive Hsu Shih-chang becomes a member of the Grand Council, and Tang Shao-yi is nominated Assistant Minister of Posts and Telegraphs.

The two most difficult problems confronting China at present are the currency and the railways. These will now be dealt with by Tang Shao-yi, as Minister of Communications, with Sheng Hsuan-huai for Vice-Minister. As between these two statesmen public opinion credits the latter with much greater ability than the former, and it is therefore considered problematical whether Sheng will serve peaceably under Tang. There is not much to choose, however, between the actual records of the two officials. Both are equally distinguished for enlightened views, and for knowledge of foreign affairs.

The immediate impulse responsible for these radical changes of personnel is said to have been given by Prince Tsai Feng and Prince Tsai Chun, who recently returned from tours in the west.

As to railway affairs, the great problems now calling for solution are the Yeh-Han and Chuan-Han Roads, the Shantung line and the Kilin-Aigun Railway. Mr. Tang Shao-yi has the reputation of being eminently pro American, and it is therefore thought probable that his influence will be exercised in a sense favourable to the building of the Kilin-Aigun road. But if it be true that Mr. Tang's return to office is preliminary to the reinstatement of Yuan Shih-kai, the latter's influence must be placed at the head of all factors dominating the situation. In some quarters it is reported that the changes already gazetted constitute only a portion of the contemplated programme. Rumour has it also that Prince Ching was opposed to these changes and that he signified his opposition very clearly to the Prince Regent. Hence his resignation is considered inevitable.

The statement is confirmed that the recent important changes of official personnel in China are due mainly to the representations of Prince Tsai-Tao, but there still continues to be much uncertainty about the basic reasons of the changes as well as their ultimate tendency. A conviction appears to be growing that ex-Viceroy Yuan will soon be recalled to power, but this too is still in the realm of conjecture. It is further stated that the influence hitherto wielded by the aged Prince Ching will be transferred to Yu Lang.

A Mukden telegram reports that Viceroy Hsi of Manchuria has determined to tender his resignation on account of the financial embarrassment prevailing in the Three Eastern Provinces and the press of diplomatic business. His successor is said to have been nominated.

Another telegram from the same source says that as the result of the investigations made by the Japanese Consulate-General, the amount of indemnity for the Koreans expelled from Hsinmintun has been fixed at 20,000 yen. A claim for this amount has been lodged with the Peking Government.

Not among Japanese only but also among foreigners the news will be received with much sorrow that Mr. Tao Ta-chun has died at Hankow, where he was serving as Chief of Police. Mr. Tao came to Japan in 1887 and very soon acquired a sound working knowledge of the Japanese language, which knowledge ultimately developed into exceptional competence. He served for many years in this country as a Japanese Secretary of the Legation, and he took an active part in the Shimonoseki negotiations of 1895. Subsequently he was placed in charge of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Mukden, but his first administrative appointment was that of Chief of Police at Hankow. His death is a serious loss to Japan, as well as to his own country.

It has been frequently predicted that the Chinese Government would find much difficulty in putting its hand upon funds for the new scheme of naval construction. Several times the public have been informed that the necessary amount would be taken from the private fortune accumulated by the late Empress Dowager. But we hear nothing more now of that resource. The latest news represents the same authorities as having asked the Board of Finance to grant a sum of 9 million taels for ship-building and for opening a naval college, but the reply of the Board is said to have been that it could only afford one million, and that the other 8 millions should be obtained by voluntary contributions from the various provinces. If this be a true indication of the Government's intentions, we fear that the Chinese navy must long remain a thing of the future.

The latest rumour about Yuan's restoration to power is that the project was indirectly mooted in a conversation between the Emperor of Germany and Prince Tsai-Tao, on the occasion of the latter's visit to Europe. His Imperial Majesty spoke of an inseparable connection existing between Yuan and the Northern army of China, and his reference to this subject amounted to a recommendation that Yuan should be re-employed. We quote this rumour, not because we place any implicit confidence in its truth, but because it illustrates the overshadowing position which the German Sovereign holds in the eyes of some Chinese politicians. For the rest, one can be tolerably certain that the Kaiser did not use any language capable of being construed as undue interference in China's domestic politics.

CHINA AND KOREAN IMMIGRANT.

Some time ago, it was stated that China had sent home a number of Korean immigrants residing at Kinchow near Shan-haikwan, but few particulars were given of the incident and it attracted little attention. Another similar affair has now occurred, and it seems to indicate that China's policy towards Korean immigrants is to be exclusion, although formerly her disposition was interpreted as favourable. This second case is the return of 124 Korean immigrants including 16 women and 21 children, from Puho on the Hsinmintun coast. These Koreans came there originally to cultivate lands which they had obtained under a five-years lease, but they converted their title last year into perpetual tenner, and they were looking forward to a crop of 17,000 koku of rice this season; when suddenly an order for their expulsion went forth. It is further stated that the Chinese authorities estimated the crops of these Korean immigrants at only 4,300 koku, and gave them the very petty solatium of 4,000 dollars. The Koreans were sent to Mukden where they are now vainly seeking to earn a livelihood. It is thought that either the Viceroy will give them some assistance, or their cause will be taken up by the Japanese consular authorities.

In the Mainichi Dempo we find an interesting, but not very credible, statement as to representations said to have been made by the Japanese Consul-General at Mukden, to the Viceroy, on the subject of the recent expulsion of Korean settlers from the Changchun district. Mr. Koike is said to have pointed out that if China persisted in this course, she would not only alienate foreign sympathy, but also create a situation which would probably end in the expulsion of her own subjects from Korea. To this the Viceroy is reported to have replied that the Changchun Koreans had been expelled by the action of the local authorities without any instructions from him. What we find difficult to believe is the threat with regard to the expulsion of Chinese from Korea. The Changchun Koreans, as we understand the case, were not engaged in agricultural operations in accordance with the provisions of any treaty, whereas the Chinese in Korea are there by convention.

A great deal of attention is evidently directed to the action taken by the Chinese local authorities in expelling Korean agricultural immigrants from the Tamingtun and Hsinmintun districts. Writing of this matter in a recent issue and referring to Korean threats of retaliation by expelling Chinese residents from the Peninsula, we expressed the opinion that such a menace would be difficult to carry out, inasmuch as the Chinese in Korea are practically all there under convention. But we find that our view was too limited. There are many Chinese settlers in Korea outside treaty limits, and retaliation in their case would be easy. The curious feature of the affair is that no distinct reason is assigned for this action on the part of the Chinese. In Australia, in California and in Canada the excuse made is the desire to keep the country white, but no such motive can be assigned to China's action on this occasion. It is simply a case of unreasoning rights-recovery ambition. Of course, if the Japanese Government, acting on behalf of Korea, retorts by expelling all Chinese subjects living outside treaty limits, a troublesome complication may ensue. But we can be sure that Japan will not resort to any measure so extreme without great reluctance. It is repeated that the Viceroy of Mukden disavows responsibility, and ascribes the proceeding entirely to the action of the local authorities at the places concerned. There is some talk of a pretext that nothing has been done except to refrain from renewing labour contracts which have duly expired, but that plea is alleged to be a mere subterfuge.

FORMOSA.

It appears to be tolerably certain that a portion at least of the aborigines have decided to surrender. The desperate resistance hitherto shown by these men seems to have been largely due to a misunderstanding. They believed that death would be their portion, whether they surrendered or not; that all their elders will be thrown into prison, and all their women-folk subjected to indignities. Therefore they felt that it would be better to perish rifle in hand. But they are said to have learned the error of this belief, and two sections of them, namely the Kuru and the Karaho, have evinced a desire for peace. The Karaho adopted a very practical course by evacuating the position held by them and allowing the Japanese to take possession. This, it must be noted, does not apply to the Gaogan aborigines. They may possibly continue their resistance, though it is hoped that they will learn from their eastern comrades the wisdom of surrender.

The telegrams from Formosa are somewhat conflicting, but we are inclined to believe that the delay, which is evidently occurring in coming to an understanding with the Gaogan aborigines, is due, not to the latter's avowed unwillingness to surrender, but rather to the difficulty of imposing terms which shall ensure their fidelity in future. These people seem to be incapable of observing any compact which curtails their independence, and the Japanese are naturally unwilling to accept any arrangement which is not of a conclusive character. On the other hand, there are some reports which seem to indicate that surrender has actually taken place, and that several important positions in the neighbourhood of Kurusha have been occupied. It is, at all events, certain that the Japanese forces have emerged from their period of hardships.

It is difficult to discover what the actual state of affairs is in Formosa. A few days ago, the intelligence seemed to point very plainly to a general surrender of the aborigines. In short, nothing appeared to be necessary except to put the finishing touches to the document of capitulation. Yet now we find that in the Shinchiku region the aborigines are evidently preparing to make a desperate resistance. They are said to have sent away all their women and children, and to be congregating in advantageous positions. In the Gilan direction, however, things seem to be progressing more favourably. The Japanese troops have been allowed to take up, without resistance, a position which commands the Gaogan lines through the greater part of their extent.

OVERHEAD RAILWAY IN TOKYO.

Mr. Amenomiya's project of an overhead railway in Tokyo has received the approval of the special committee appointed by the City Assembly to examine and report upon the question. This means that the project has virtually obtained official approval, but we observe that the Committee has appended conditions which seem to us wholly incapable of observance. Thus it is provided that the railway must not produce any vibration, or impair the prospect. How such terms can possibly be complied with we are unable to see. The Nippon takes a very pessimistic view of the enterprise. It notes that the line is to extend to a total distance of 15.58 miles, namely 8.68 miles in a northerly and southerly direction and 6.70 miles in an easterly and westerly. The total cost is estimated at 25 million yen, and the projectors calculate that after paying to the municipality 187,000 yen annually, and laying aside reserves amounting to 272,000 yen, the enterprise will pay 8.4 per-cent. This result our contemporary thinks altogether too optimistic, and it is moreover persuaded that the line will cause much inconvenience to the inhabitants of the streets through which it passes. Nothing is stated about its rate of fare, but evidently that must not exceed the rate charged by the Tokyo Railway at present.

THE FLOODS.

A deputation of Tokyo leading citizens, who visited the Prime Minister on the 20th inst., are believed to have obtained from his Excellency assurances, vague but firm, that the Treasury will come to the aid of the city in dealing with the devastation caused by the recent floods and in the work of riparian improvement. The Marquis took advantage of the occasion to make an interesting statement, namely, that his own observations during his recent return journey from Karuizawa had convinced him that the cause of the disaster is to be sought mainly in deforestation. Owing to rapid growth of the population and to the development of industry, the tendency everywhere is to reclaim land, and this has resulted in denuding large districts of forests which formerly covered them. There are ample evidences in the history of other countries that unregulated deforestation inevitably produces disaster. It will be necessary, therefore, to pay strict attention to this point hereafter in Japan.

TOKYO.

Differences of opinion seem to be developing about the expenditures in Tokyo on account of preventing inundations. The Minister of Home Affairs is quoted as saying that, with all the will in the world to be effectually helpful, the Government has to consider ways and means. His view appears to be that the Treasury cannot reasonably be expected to disburse more than 5 per cent. of the funds hitherto put up by the citizens for this purpose. That, however, would barely suffice to restore things to their condition previously to the recent inundations. On the other hand, there is an evidently growing opinion that the Treasury cannot properly be asked to expend on Tokyo's sole account funds collected from the country at large.

THE TANKO S.S. COMPANY.

The three questions hitherto causing dissension between the Amenomiya and the Murota sections of the Tanko S.S. Co. are, first, the price at which the Company's stock of coal shall be entered among the assets; secondly, the composition of the Board of Directors, and thirdly, the admission of Mr. Kabayama Aisuke's name to the latter. The first of these points is said to have been settled in accordance with the views of Mr. Murota; the second in accordance with the desire of the Amenomiya section, and the third is still in dispute. According to the latest accounts, the office of mediator has been accepted by the Minister of the Imperial Household, in consideration of the fact that the Imperial Estate holds a large block of the Company's shares.

We are constrained to say that the Directors of this important Company are rapidly inviting the ridicule of the public by their unseemly quarrels. Basis after basis of compromise between the opposing parties has been elaborated, only to be rendered abortive by the obstructive tactics of a few petty shareholders. The Board of Directors includes the names of several gentlemen who cannot afford to allow their reputations to be dragged in the mud by such associates. The general meeting on the 21st inst. resulted in a scene which recalled the doings of sōshi rather than the procedure of solemn men of affairs. If this sort of thing goes on, the character of Japanese commercial and industrial enterprises will be fatally injured.

CHANGSHA.

Japan and China unfortunately have a great many disputes and complications to arrange, but, after all, that must be regarded as inevitable, considering that they are neighbouring countries which manage their affairs in accordance with very different administrative canons. It must be confessed, however, that the problems they are called on to solve show a constantly growing readiness to be speedily and easily disposed of. Commencing with the case of the Mukden-Antung Railway, several subjects of dispute have been amicably adjusted or brought within sight of adjustment within the past 12 months. The latest of these is the Changsha trouble, which might have become a protracted and sore question had Japan's demands for compensation assumed any character of exorbitancy. Her bill, however, totalled only 110,000 dollars (Mexican), which seems a very paltry amount when compared with the statements circulated at the time as to the injury inflicted by the rioters on Japanese property. The sum was handed over on the 14th inst. by the Chinese local authorities, who are said to be thoroughly satisfied with the moderation shown by the Japanese in this instance.

A BOYCOTT.

Several hundreds of Chinese merchants in Canton have held a meeting and have decided to boycott American trade, and to send circulars to all their countrymen abroad and at home urging them to join the movement. The proximate cause of this step is the transfer of the detention station at San Francisco from the mainland to an island, in which isolated position the Chinese allege that they are unable to procure sureties, and are therefore virtually imprisoned on the island. It will be remembered that when this step was taken last month, several of the leading Chinese merchants at San Francisco organized a League of Justice, and doubtless this league is directly responsible for the boycott now set on foot in Canton. The Chinese are said to be very determined. They declare that they will maintain the boycott until the situation of the detention station is altered.

EDUCATIONAL.

The Government is credited with having issued orders for the examination of all libraries in schools and colleges throughout the Empire, in order to ascertain whether these libraries contain any works of an immoral character or setting forth socialistic doctrines, or preaching a pessimistic view of man and things. If any such be discovered, they will be removed beyond the reach of the rising generation.

In connection with this, however, the Nichi Nichi asks a very pertinent question, namely, what steps are to be taken with regard to the originals of which such works are generally translations. This consideration would not have applied with equal force thirty years ago, but there are now so many students capable of reading books in foreign languages that it becomes almost as important to censor originals as translations.

NIKKO.

The recent heavy rains produced a flood in the Daiya-gawa at Nikko which did not, however, cause any very serious destruction. The river did not rise more than ten feet at most above its normal level. Nevertheless the force of the current was sufficient to carry away the Gamman bridge, as well as the frail structure spanning the river at Urami, and further to undermine certain cliffs and banks whose downfall is now becoming imminent, to the no small apprehension of the inhabitants. The electric train is running to Umagaeshi, and as it follows the high land it was not affected by the inundation. But the ox-tram which, in order to avoid declivities, follows the bank of the river, is now in an unsafe condition at various places. From the 12th inst. Nikko was completely isolated from Tokyo by inundations which had invaded the track of the railway near Kurihashi.

KARUIZAWA.

It used to be generally supposed that Karuizawa enjoyed great superiority over Nikko in the matter of immunity from floods. That idea will now have to be abandoned. If Japanese papers be credible, the inhabitants of the former favourite summer resort were at one time reduced to living upon barley and millet. Nikko, on the other hand, did not suffer from any lack of provisions, and the only serious injury done was the sweeping away of two or three comparatively small bridges and the undermining of a few embankments. The river-road to Chusenji has been rendered impassable, but that is a catastrophe which had long been anticipated.

DEATH OF PROFESSOR KINOSHITA.

We greatly regret to announce the death of the well-known jurist, Prof. Kinoshita Hirotsuyu, which took place in Kyoto on the 21st inst. The professor was in his 58th year, and the cause of death was lung disease, contracted during his tenure of the presidency of the Kyoto University in 1908. The deceased gentleman held several honorary degrees and was a graduate of the Paris School of Law. Ill health compelled his resignation of the post of President of the Kyoto University.

THE BOOKSHELF.

The Lonely Subaltern. By FERGUS HUME. London: George Bell & Sons.

As in the book which brought him fame, Mr. Hume generally begins his stories with a murder, and devotes the rest of the book to the unravelling of the mystery. While not up to the level of The Mystery of a Hansom Cab, the novel under review is much superior to Mr. Hume's previous story, The Mikado Jewel. The "lonely subaltern," it seems, was less so from natural taste, than by his being too poor to live up to the "form" of his regiment quartered in a cathedral city. He loved the fair ward of a bishop, but his suit was not approved by his aunt, the Bishop's wife, and the situation was aggravated when Tyrell, a lawyer with money-lending proclivities, and the one-night guest of the regiment, was found murdered in a room in the barracks just above Lieutenant Heath's quarters on the morning after the two had been overheard quarrelling. A missing will in which Tyrell and the Bishop's wife are concerned plays an important part in the story, and the secret of the crime is well maintained up to the end.

Captain Fraser's Profession. By JOHN STRANGE WINTER. London, George Bell & Sons,

We cannot congratulate Mrs. Stannard on her latest production, which is very inferior to Lady Jennifer, albeit it draws us into the very depths of crime. It was as well, perhaps, for the British Army that Captain Fraser had retired from its service; but the idea of even an ex-officer of the Black Watch acting as the head of a gang of jewel-thieves must grate upon the sensibilities of the most-hardened devourer of fiction. There is only one redeeming feature in the book, and that is its concluding scene, where one of the characters, "a gentleman by birth, a Public School boy, and an incomparable jewel-thief," lays down his life for the officer who had lifted him from the gutter and bound him to himself by the thongs of gratitude. There is altogether too much of the sordid in this book, and too little of the good. We hope John Strange Winter will turn her undoubted gifts to the portrayal of a less execrable specimen of humanity than the hero of this tale.

High-Class Cookery, by Mrs. A. M. CHALMERS and E. F. CROWE. Yokohama, Kelly & Walsh, Ltd.

THE announcement of a new edition of the cookery book compiled by Mrs. Chalmers and Mr. Crowe recalls to us vividly our first experiments in housekeeping in Japan. We had a wild-eyed, willing youth, a farmer's son, whose claim to culinary knowledge was based on some days' instruction by a friendly colleague. Even now we shudder when we think of the sad procession of meagre soups and sodden fish, of time old chickens and adamantine steaks, with now and then a strange, mysterious pudding, a sweet that "never was on sea or land." With what a smile and flourish were they brought up from the depths, and how at first we tackled them hopefully, and then proceeded, through all the stages of suggestion, entreaty, muttering and grumbling, on towards open rebellion. At last we bought these two volumes, and presented the Japanese half to the kitchen, while we studied hopefully the English recipes, particularly impressed by "How to dress a Crab" and the Game Pie, which seems to require a holocaust of small birds. Slowly an improvement set in, and the cook, now in another's service, "can really put up quite a decent meal." Apart from the information the book contains, its moral effect is considerable. We are sure that our cook was inspired by its appearance, the type, and the fine long names in kana, and (we must confess) at times strung up to deeds of derring-do beyond his strength.

The fact is, a good cook is a considerable asset in the East. He brings you personal ease, and the frequent company of friends. We knew a man whose cook was doubly useful. His fellow servant, when reproached for some remissness, had one invariable reply. He did not explain, nor apologize, nor preserve a stolid silence. He merely said three words—"But the cook. . . !" He was a countryman of Yuan Mei, who wrote a classical cook-book, in which he tells how there was a man who was fond of giving dinners, but the food was atrocious. One day a guest threw himself on his knees in front of this gentleman, and said "Am I not a friend of yours?"—"You are, indeed,"—"Then I must ask you a favour, and you must grant it before I rise from my knees."—"Well, what is it?"—"Never to invite me to dinner any more!"

Such are the catastrophes attendant on ill-cooked meals. Granted the importance of the cook, let him be furnished with a proper treatise on his art, and you have set him on the path to success, though even Yuan Mei admitted that no book could teach a man to cook a flavour into a poor article, for, said he, "a ham is a ham, but in point of goodness two hams will be as widely separated as sea and sky." Also, "cooks are but mean fellows, and if a day is passed without punishing or rewarding them, that day is surely marked by carelessness on their part."

These then are the essentials, a cook with an eye, an employer with a tongue, and a book for the guidance of both. The first two are in the gift of Fate, the last is supplied by Mrs. Chalmers and Mr. Crowe.

MONO-SUBJECT UNIVERSITIES

In a leading article published on the 8th. inst. the Tokyo Nichi Nichi Shinbun strongly advocates the establishment of Universities like the one at Sapporo, where only one subject is taught. Some little time ago there was a good deal of talk about rendering the Sapporo College of Agriculture independent, but to-day little interest is taken in the project, the reason being that the people consider that the Department of Education is so wedded to the affiliated College system that it would never sanction the establishment of a mono-subject University. The Nichi Nichi does not advocate the entire abandonment of the practice of establishing universities that consist of affiliated colleges where many subjects are taught in favour of mono-subject universities, but would like to see the authorities adopting the plan of establishing the latter when funds are not available for the creation of the former. The Nichi Nichi admits that in theory there is much to be said in favour of the affiliation of colleges under one President and one supreme Faculty, but as regards the two Imperial Universities established in this country it fails to perceive how the various colleges of which they consist benefit each other. For the most part these colleges all go their separate ways; there is next to no co-operation. The buildings where the lectures are given are close to each other and the colleges have a common library, and there is a hall where big meetings are held but beyond this there is nothing to show that they are related to each other. When the real facts are considered, says the Nichi Nichi, we find, that the assistance rendered to each other by various colleges is very small. So few of the objects of affiliation are obtained. Under these circumstances one would expect that public opinion in Japan would strongly support the establishment of one-subject universities in various parts of the country according to local needs. If the Sapporo University could be rendered independent, the ball would be set rolling. The Nichi Nichi urges the Mombushō to sum up courage to take this step. W.D.

CONCERT AT CHUZENJI.

An excellent concert was given at the Lakeside Hotel on the afternoon of the 18th inst., by Professor Griffith, the famous flautist; assisted by lady guests there, and under the patronage of the British, French, Russian and Italian Ambassadors with other members of the corps diplomatique and other distinguished persons.

The professor gave several performances to the delight of all, and exemplified his well known skill in association with Miss Boyle, the gifted daughter of Captain Boyle. The young lady played with much sympathy in the different items allotted to her. Miss Thorne sang two songs with much taste, and was capitally accompanied by Mrs Tisdale.

Madame Guthersyl rendered several French songs with characteristic and artistic charm. Miss Smith, of Shanghai, performed a difficult Scotch sword-dance with great effect. The piccolo solos by Professor Griffith evoked a storm of applause which was well deserved.

It should be mentioned that, on the arrival of Mr. Griffith at Chuzenji, he expressed a wish to assist the sufferers of the prevailing calamity; it is, therefore, a pleasure to announce that the amount devoted to this deserving cause will materially help those in the prefecture, Professor Griffith having requested Captain Boyle to undertake that mission.

The programme was as follows:—

Flute Solo.
A.—"Le Cygne"	Saint Saens.
B.—"Scena from opera D'ascamo"	Saint Saens.
	Miss Boyle and Professor Griffith.
Song.—"Serenade"	Gounod
	Miss Thorne.
Flute Solo.
A.—"Elegie"	Verhey.
B.—"First Welsh Fantasia"	Griffith.
	Professor Griffith.
Deux Chansons
	Madame Guthersyl.
Flute Solo.—"Fantasia" from opera
"Merrie England"	Edward German
	Professor Griffith.
Song.—"I hid my love"	G. d'Hrdelot.
	Miss Thorne.
Sword Dance
	Miss Smith.
Piccolo "Dance de Satyre"	Le Thiere.
	Professor Griffith.
At the Pianoforte	Miss Boyle.

It is reported from Seoul that in compliance with the Korean Emperor's desire, the treaty of amalgamation will not be published before the fourth anniversary of his accession to the Throne on August 27th when Resident-General Terauchi will have a final audience of His Majesty. The treaty will thus be published on the 29th or 30th instant.

Another Seoul despatch says that the ex-Emperor appears rather delighted than otherwise at the idea, of living with his son after the amalgamation, and of being relieved from the feeling of loneliness which he has hitherto experienced.

INDIAN UNREST AND BRITISH SYMPATHIZERS.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 20.)

THE problem of Indian unrest, says a writer in the London Times, is a one which should possess exceptional interest alike for the practical statesman and for the dispassionate student of "the larger movements which determine the destinies of States and of religions, of nations and of races. If Indian unrest is not as yet one of these movements, it has many analogies with them, and, in circumstances favourable to its growth, it might not inconceivably develop into one of them." So much for the general aspect of the problem, a due appreciation of its magnitude, and the possible developments of the future. But it is with the present that England has to deal. However interesting, from the scientific point of view, as a study in world-movements in embryo, the fact remains that a section of the Hindu people, consisting of raw baboos and reptilian newspaper-writers—aided, across the water, by sympathetic Little Englanders and Irish-American conspirators—have set themselves to the work of slowly undermining the British position in India. We do not say that a conspicuous degree of success has attended their efforts. There are, as the special correspondent of the great London journal points out, many contributory causes of the unrest, and there are many means by which it is promoted; but in spite of them all, and in spite of the dangerous leaven which is working beneath them—that leaven which is itself irreconcilably at enmity with Western principles, and in particular with Western democratic principles—we are bidden not to despond. "The poison has spread but a comparatively small way as yet. It is limited, or almost limited, to the urban Hindu population. The Mahomedans, the great Hindu Princes and nobles are with us, and the agricultural masses who form the overwhelming majority of the people are as yet unmoved." But there never was a disease yet—a malignant disease—that wrought its own cure. And the Indian plague-spot will be none the worse for the application of the antiseptic of enlightened public opinion, and, if need be, of the surgeon's knife. And at any rate a careful analysis of the causes of the trouble—a correct diagnosis of the disease—is, to those who have to deal with it, half the battle won.

From this point of view, therefore, no one who seeks to know the truth about the so-called Nationalist movement in Bengal—for that is the centre of the unrest—will regret the light thrown upon the methods of the agitators by the Under-Secretary for India, Mr. E. S. MONTAGU, in the debate on the Indian Budget which was one of the closing incidents of the recent Parliamentary session. In a speech in which he may be said to have laid the foundations of a high reputation for political and oratorical ability, Mr. MONTAGU deprecated any expression of surprise at the fact of Indian unrest. It was the natural consequence of those benefits of civilization which England had dealt out so unsparingly to the Indian people. "We cannot," he declared, "bring Eastern civilisation into contact with Western civilisation without introducing new ingredients, which rise like yeast. To a people who for centuries had been blindly obedient to established power, the teachings of Western literature, imbued throughout with the spirit of freedom, came like a revelation. Religious unrest was followed by social, by political, and by economic unrest. Why criticise unrest as such? We welcome it in Persia, we are enthusiastic about it in Turkey, we patronise it in Japan. . . . "You cannot give the Indian Western civilisation and then turn round and deny him the right to practise what you have taught. If you do, you run the risk of fostering an unrest more dangerous than any that now exists. Ill-handled, the situation might lead to chaos. Anarchy might lead to a military dictatorship."

The Under-Secretary's attitude, of course, is in full accord with the so-called Liberal school of thought, but the hint of a military dictatorship, should circumstances require it, is an allusion to the "big stick" which must have been as gall to many of his hearers. Or, possibly, in view of the Mediterranean Command fiasco, this is a crumb cast to Lord KITCHENER as consolation to be drawn at some distant date from the womb of the future; but the formal declaration of war against sedition "while showing an increasingly sympathetic attitude towards manifestations of legitimate aspirations" (Liberal guilt for the "big stick" pill)—must have come as a heavy blow to those British M.P.'s who have espoused the noble cause of Hindu crime and rebellion. But more was to follow, in exposure of the approved methods of the agitators in working upon the half-educated mind and high-strung temperament of the misguided Baboo. By way of reply to the criticism of a certain M.P.'s pamphlet against the Indian Government's new Press Act, Mr. MONTAGU read a sample of the seditious productions with which the vernacular papers have flooded the country:—

Dear Reader,—Do not be led away by false hopes and temporary concessions. Sacrifice white blood, unadulterated and pure, to your gods. Whites, be they men, women, or children, murder them indiscriminately and you will not commit any sin. The editor will be extremely obliged to readers if they will translate this into all tongues.

From this to a vigorous condemnation of the ineffable MACKARNES pamphlet—a British M.P.'s attack on the Indian police—was an easy step. "To collect isolated instances of abuse," he said, "and call them the methods of the Indian police, and to garble evidence for the purpose of making a point, was sedition, whether it was the work of a Hindu agitator or of an ex-member of Parliament." This classing of MACKARNES with the friends of sedition was, of course, no more than correct, and received empathic and general endorsement from the House. Feeble attempts were made by fellow sedition mongers, Messrs. KEIR HARDIE and JOSIAH WEDGWOOD, to defend the British inciter to sedition, but, as they were aptly reminded, they had fallen into the grievous error of confusing Liberalism with lawlessness.

When all is said and done, it must be presumed that the ultimate object of the Hindu agitation is full self-government. That ideal is a delusion and a snare. The whole raison d'être of the British Raj in India—the reason why we are there—is that India cannot govern herself. Were the great Dependency cast off to-morrow from the rock of British rule to which it is to-day securely moored, it would drift, in a sea of chaos, to final and complete destruction. A very cursory consideration of the conditions prevailing in the Peninsula would suffice to lead any well-balanced mind to that conclusion. We can not do better than briefly set them forth in the words of a recent writer in a London review:—

The vast tract of country which goes by the name of India is peopled by races and creeds so heterogeneous and so incapable of common action that the choice is between external rule and anarchy. There is not even the possibility of solving the problem by breaking the country up into a series of small governments. And for this reason. Speaking generally, every part of India is inhabited by people of different creeds, and even of different races, who live side by side. And the proportions of the mixture are never the same. For example, though the Mohammedans are in a marked minority in India taken as a whole, there are plenty of districts where they have either a local majority, or, at any rate, are half, or nearly half, the population. Further to complicate the question, the major part of the total Indian population—the Hindus—are socially and politically broken in pieces by the caste system,—a system which shows no sign of yielding, but is in many ways spreading and intensifying.

One thing at least is certain: the withdrawal of British rule from India would mean its certain abandonment to a cruel fate. It would not only be chaos, or anarchy; it would be bloody and relentless war. In a very brief space of time the vast Empire which has rightly been called the brightest jewel in the British Crown would be in a state past praying for. It would ill become the descendants of CLIVE and of WARREN HASTINGS thus cravenly to shirk so great responsibility, thus weakly to forsake so great and glorious a trust.

PUBLIC MORALITY.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 20.)

FOR unavoidable reasons we have hitherto refrained from taking any notice, in these columns, of one of the most fragrant specimens of journalistic dishonesty that has ever disgraced a newspaper. We desire now to call our readers' attention to it, not for the sake of defending ourselves, but for another object which will presently become apparent.

he act of discovery is this:—In its issue of the 6th inst. the Japan Herald violently attacked the Japan Mail on a charge of irrelevancy, and compared this journal to a squid which discolours the water in order to obscure its own movements. This accusation was professed to be founded on a reply made by us to an article appearing in the Japan Herald of the 2nd inst., which article essayed to do two things: one was to contradict a statement that Mr. YIN CHANG had been a member of Prince TSAI-TAO's suite; the other was to lay at the door of the Japan Mail the hackneyed charge of Anti-Germanism. In reply we took no notice whatever of the question relating to Mr. YIN. We confined ourselves solely to showing, what was indeed quite obvious, that, so far from being anti-German, our article had been uniquely intended to rebut a suggestion that Germany might assume a hostile attitude towards the new Russo-Japanese Convention. In fact, we had intended to be, and had frankly been, not anti-German but pro-German. On this article the Japan Herald based its accusation of irrelevancy and of squid-like propensities, essaying to prove its case by quoting only the first part of its own article, to which we had not made the smallest reference, and by carefully omitting the second part, which accused us of being anti-German, and which contained the following clause:—

The above little piece of innocent-looking, but all the more anti-German fabrication of a very clever or a very badly-informed workman cannot be strongly enough condemned as harmful to the peaceful relations between two friendly Powers. Is there any connection between the anti-German work done by Reuter during the last few weeks, and the Japan Daily Mail, the well-informed interpreter of Germany's foreign policy, as shown in the above articles?

We are justified in calling the above one of the most fragrant examples of journalistic chicanery ever attempted. And our object in referring to it is not to defend ourselves, for we need no defence against such libels, but to place on record the fact that the journal resorting to these dishonest devices is the journal whose editor accuses all Christian missionaries of being liars.

THE CONFERENCE AND SINGLE CHAMBER GOVERNMENT.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 22.)

AFTER several disappointments—one of which was turned, through that sense of humour which is never entirely absent from the House of Commons, into a species of "solemn joke"—Mr. ASQUITH, shortly before Parliament rose for the Autumn recess, provided the country with his long-expected statement as to the Constitutional Conference. The crowded condition of the House, and the evident signs of suppressed anxiety on every side, bore testimony to the interest, not to say anxiety, with which the announcement was awaited. The statement, such as it was, had been carefully prepared, and was read out by the Prime Minister in a House silent with strained attention. Mr. ASQUITH said:—

The representatives of the Government and Opposition have held twelve meetings and have carefully surveyed a large part of the field of controversy. The result is that our discussions have made such progress—although we have not, so far, reached an agreement—as to render it, in the opinion of all of us, not only desirable but necessary that they should continue.

In fact I may go further and say that we should think it wrong at this stage to break them off.

There is no question of their indefinite continuance, and if we find, as a result of our further deliberations during the recess, that there is no prospect of an agreement that can be announced to Parliament in the course of the present session, we shall bring the Conference to a close.

The announcement, says the parliamentary correspondent of The Times, provoked no demonstration of any kind. Mr. REDMOND gave a proof of the anxiety with which the Nationalists are awaiting the outcome of the Conference by inquiring whether the Government intended that a decision should be come to, one way or another, at the latest by the time Parliament was to reassemble in November. The Prime Minister declined to pledge himself to a fixed date. "I said," he observed, "in the course of the present session. I hope at a very early date." Another enquiry came from Mr. BYLES, who belongs to the Radical section which is supposed to share the Nationalist misgivings. The member for North Salford wanted to know whether, if there were a rupture of negotiations during the recess, the country would be at once informed. Mr. ASQUITH somewhat drily replied that, in the event of the contingency mentioned, which, he said, he trusted would not occur, he did not think the country would be kept in the dark.

The House then has risen, but the Conference continues, and the Constitutional Crisis, if its acute stage has passed for the time being, still remains unsolved. The fate of the Parliament Bill, of the House of Lords, of the Crown as a factor in the national life—and the fate, it may even be, of the Empire—still hangs in the balance. Such being the case, the student of affairs is led to ask what inferences can be drawn from the PRIME MINISTER'S statement, what portents, if any, can be discerned overhanging the future sky. In the first place, it seems to be generally agreed that the lengthening of the negotiations has made a General Election at the beginning of next year improbable in the highest degree. Should that anticipation be realized, even if the Conference fails to arrive at a settlement, it will have deserved well of the country. For to plunge the country into the turmoil of a General Election—which in the event of the Conference's failure, would be the beginning of a prolonged and bitter struggle—on the eve of KING GEORGE'S Coronation, is a proceeding that would not be approved by the people. This, of course, is something to the good; but what of the progress towards that Settlement by Consent to which the friends of peace and the men of moderation have been looking forward, as to the dawning of a new and better day? One thing is tolerably clear, as a Unionist journal points out, from the mere number of the meetings and the length of time they have covered. The eight members have been dealing with the Constitutional position as a whole, and their discussion must have been directed to a very wide field of alternative schemes. "A mere attempt to state the orthodox Liberal and Unionist positions, and to draw the ends of the two bits of elastic sufficiently near to meet, must have spelt either compromise or final disagreement in the course of a very few sittings." Hence it may be concluded that something more novel has been tried than the ordinary plan of knocking 50 per cent. off the official demands of each side in the effort to conclude a deal. The only alternative to this deduction is that the delegates are indulging in a calculated policy of postponement, which consists of sitting round a table and discussing the weather. But this delay is otherwise construed in the Radical camp. "What does it mean?" asks a writer in the Nation, which may be taken as expressing the mind of the extreme wing of the Ministerial party; "what is the character and bent of the activities on which the mind of the Conference is concentrated?" To this question, which all men are asking, this writer replies:

Is it simply that, as one account has it, it has hitherto been "fiddling with Second Chambers," an exercise in which the most copiously barren intellects in Great Britain will, we feel assured, find occupation for the full term of natural existence? Or has it been presented with a definite Ministerial plan for the settlement of the Constitutional trouble? If it has fallen into the first form of busy idleness, the Government is simply trifling with the Liberal Party in prolonging its existence thus far and in holding out any further hope of life. If the latter be the case it is as well for the Liberal Party to make up its mind as to what it will take from the Conference and what it will refuse.

Which is precisely the attitude we have all along anticipated. That the extremists would adopt. Delay rankles in their minds: they are in haste to destroy, thirsting for the blood of the Lords. If the settlement is not to their liking—and their liking is an "irreducible minimum" of impossible proportions—then they will wreck the Conference and drive the Government out of office. Recapitulating the various rumours current as to the proposals which are being discussed—Imperial Federation, Referendum, and a machinery of compromise between the two Houses—the Nation remarks that for none of these has the Conference received any mandate from any party:—

One third of the Liberal Parliamentary Party (which probably represents nine-tenths of the constituents) regards the Conference with unveiled dislike; another third looks at it as an inevitable tactic of delay imposed by King Edward's death and the new reign; and perhaps a third hopes, almost against hope, that it may yet discover some equation between the Liberal and the Tory view of the Constitution. We confess our own concern lest a Government which last spring found itself suddenly cut off in feeling and opinion from five-sixths of its following may suddenly present us with a conclusion which the main body of the party will neither understand nor accept, or even, dissolving the tables in a roar, may unite Lords and Commons in resistance.

Certainly, if the extremists are as good as their words,—we note they describe themselves as “the main body of the party”—Mr. ASQUITH, and the Cabinet generally, are in for a warm time before they will be permitted to enjoy the holidays associated with the universal season of “peace and good will.”

There is one phrase in the foregoing extract, however, which possesses special interest, because it furnishes the key to the Radical position. We refer to the suggestion that the Conference is “fiddling with Second Chambers.” The extremist minority—we hope and trust it is still a minority—which dominates the Liberal party has long since made it plain that it desires no Second Chamber at all. If that monstrosity can be supported at all, it must be an emasculated and impotent monstrosity. Any barrier that could conceivably stand in the way of the Radical mill-race of Socialism-cum-Homericum-Disintegration of the Empire, inter alia—must be swept out of existence. Hence the choice for the people of England lies to-day, in theory and in practice, between a Single Chamber and a Double Chamber system. The Radical claim for the unfettered supremacy of the House of Commons can only be tolerated by a nation of revolutionaries. It is intolerable to suggest that an executive power concentrated in a few individuals—for such, in effect, is the climax of present parliamentary procedure—does not demand, and imperatively demand, the presence of some other and independent body to check its autocratic tendencies and to remind it, on occasion, that the people are its masters. The successful demagogue, remarks The Times, has been proved by history to possess a natural taste for autocracy, and there is very little to choose between the Jacobin and the Despot. For this reason, therefore, and since the House of Lords represents to-day the only restraint on the Executive, no Constitutionalist can agree to any settlement which reduces that check to a shadow. We incline to the belief that the question of the Second Chamber is at the bottom of the apparently inexplicable delay in the conclusion of the Conference, and we may add, it is well that it should be so. The cause of Moderation has everything to gain, as that of Revolution has to lose, by wise deliberation.

THE POWER OF BOYCOTT.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 23.)

THE recently organized boycott against American merchandise, by the “Self-Governing Society” of Canton, raises a question as to the wisdom of such a course. The power of boycott, particularly in China, is undeniable. But if the cause and object of this undertaking are as stated—which on the face of it appears doubtful—namely, the treatment of Chinese immigrants, not only at San Francisco, but afterwards throughout the country, then the method adopted would appear to be a particularly unfortunate one. There are two reasons for this; the American public has become so embittered by struggles between labour and capital and the attendant evils of lockouts and strikes, that the very word boycott immediately suggests unfair methods, and instinctively prejudices the average American against the cause in connection with which the word is used. It will be remembered that, only recently, one of the most bitter of the labour struggles—The Buck Stove and Range Company versus the Labour Unions—has been closed by the death of one of the principal members of the firm in question. In this case, the Labour Unions organized a boycott against the product of the above corporation. The directors of the company immediately instituted a criminal action against the organizers—three of the principal labour men in America—and succeeded in having them convicted and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment. The intense bitterness of the agitation which this trial caused has taught the American public to think of the boycott as an unfair, and almost disreputable method. Such, at least, is the conclusion which would at once be suggested to the average middle-states American.

The United States has always welcomed immigrants from almost every country and race. The Chinese are the one prominent exception. The main cause of this lies in the fact that it is believed the Chinese never really become citizens, either in heart or fact. A very low class of Chinese are found throughout the great middle states—mostly washie-washie men,—who are credited with a desire to gather all the money they can, by fair means, or otherwise, and return, as quickly as possible, to China. Considering this belief, is it any wonder they are not enthusiastically welcomed? Still the easy-going American, individually, tolerates them, although, in his heart, he feels toward them as he does toward no other class of immigrants. A Chinese native paper publishes a statement which seems to express the general feeling of the Chinese about this matter, as follows:—

It must have been with feelings somewhat akin to dismay that our American cousins learned the laity of the determination made by the Six Companies of San Francisco to institute a second boycott of American goods in China. True, the proposals for commencing the boycott do not emanate from the council of that formidable organisation itself, but from a body styled the “League of Justice,” which, however, may be safely regarded as being entirely representative of the Six Companies. While the last American boycott was in progress, its effects upon the trade of the United States in China were eminently disastrous. The thoroughness with which the boycott was carried out then was proof of the amazing power of combination possessed by the Chinese. It showed to all the world that they are not to be considered a negligible quantity in the commercial field, whatever be the esteem in which the Imperial Government is held by other countries. It is only natural, therefore, that this threat of a second boycott should be viewed with alarm, to say the least of it, by manufacturers in the United States whose principal consumer is China. A relaxation of the immigration grievance of the Chinese had been met, more or less, to their satisfaction. A certain conciliatory effect, also, was procured by reason of the United States waiving their claim to the second moiety of the Boxer indemnity, amounting to $11,000,000 (or so), which money was utilised in sending Chinese new students to America. The cause of the new boycott appears to lie chiefly in the immigration laws as affecting the Chinese, with particular reference to the detention sheds on Angel Island at San Francisco. A member of the League of Justice describes its objects thus:—“The Chinese, not only in San Francisco, but throughout the country in general, have felt for some time that they were not being treated with the justice and equality they have a right to expect. The Chinese residents of that country are now somewhat of a factor in its commercial prosperity and the formation of such an organisation as this League of Justice is necessary for the purpose of obtaining a proper recognition of our rights. In this matter of placing the detention sheds at Angel Island we feel that we have been treated most unfairly. If we wish to act as witnesses for any of our compatriots who are forced to lose a whole day in going to the island and returning. Then, on the other hand, we are not granted the courtesy we have a right to expect, if only because of our commercial standing in this city. We have appealed to Washington and have sent representatives there to plead our cause before the United States Government: our representative there promised when on his way through this port from China that he would do all in his power for us, and we have received similar assurances from many officials, both Chinese and American. But nothing has been done for us and we are tired of being fed on promises.”

American politics, and certainly that portion which has been favourable to the Chinese, are controlled principally by that great inland section, generally termed, the “Central” or “Middle” States. Now instead of feeling “dismay” over the announcement of the boycott, the average “middle states” citizen will yawn over his morning paper and ask “who are these Six Companies of San Francisco, anyhow?” Instead of being to him a “formidable organization and a factor in the commercial prosperity of the United States,” he really cares nothing about them, or in fact little about the manufacturers and merchants who will be affected by this boycott; and this is the man who rules American policies. He knows little of the value of Chinese commercial relations, which to him appears very small indeed. What he does know is that “China-town” is the evil section,—the “Red-light” district—of every large American city from coast to coast, and that his educators, i.e. ministers of religion, social reformers, and the W.C.T.U., are constantly telling him that the Chinaman is a very undesirable immigrant. He really cares very little about all this. But with the word “boycott” he awakens up at once, and if agitation regarding this boycott becomes great enough to reach the sensational stages, it will simply mean, that many United States legislators will go to the next congressional assembly pledged, to their constituents, for a more drastic enforcement of the Chinese Exclusion Act, thus defeating the very cause for which this Cantonese society claims to be striving.

THE BIRTH-RATE AND THE NATION.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 24)

THE increasing amount of public attention which is being given to the problems of life in their fundamental aspects was never more clearly indicated than in the recent meeting of the British Medical Association at South Kensington. The most interesting discussions were on the causes and social aspects of the declining birth-rate, and the lion's share of the deliberations of the learned assembly fell to that department of medical science where the study of medicine proper becomes involved in the problems of heredity—the department of “eugenics,” to use the name coined by Sir FRANCIS GALTON. This of course is as it should be, for no questions are more vital to the welfare of the community; and yet, because of man's ineradicable belief in the sacredness of the individual, they are not as fully thought out and discussed from every point of view, as they deserve, and ought, to be. Not much can be said for the contention frequently advanced, by old women of either sex, that the community and the nation must be sacrificed to individual pride or prudery; but it is astonishing with what sangfroid these champions of false modesty, while hugging their antiquated fetishes, can look on at the slow death of a nation. Fortunately the number of these queer folk is on the wane, and common sense, aided by science, is having its belated turn. The present era may not unfairly be described as the Age of Etiology, when people are not content, as they were in the dark days of ignorance, to accept facts as facts, without enquiring into the underlying causes or conditions which explain, or bring into being, those facts themselves. People who have attuned themselves to this frame of mind with regard to the problems of life, will find much food for thought in the addresses delivered to the British Medical Association a month ago. One of the most notable of these was that given by DR. J. W. BALLANTYNE, of Edinburgh, who, in the course of a paper on Medical Sociology, regretfully observed that TENNYSON'S “torrent of babies” was now reduced to a rivulet. It is incumbent on sociology to bring into account this new state of affairs. There seems to be no doubt, as Dr. BALLANTYNE remarked, that tampering with the family brings disaster sooner or later. The marriage tie is being attacked at the present day, and popular novelists find much of their popularity resting on improper novels, on the “leasehold marriage,” and on the presentation of conjugal unions in which disunion is evidently impending. However, this is not the only side from which a dangerous assault is being made on the family as a unit of society. The commonly accepted idea of the family used to be a group of persons, parents and children; but, in view of the persistent decline of the birth-rate, it might soon be necessary to revise the definition. Dr. BALLANTYNE did not put the matter too strongly when he said that a childless marriage was surely the bitterest irony, and, from a sociological point of view, an irreparable disaster. He found it difficult to wax enthusiastic over eugenics, for it seemed to him the eugenists had come among them in an evil day. “Had they come when the birth-rate was going up, they would have been welcome; but was a stock-breeder justified in attempting to improve the breed when he had to do with a rapidly diminishing herd? Recent years had shown that limitation of the family was by no means a Gallic prerogative. The process could be seen at work in this country and the Colonies, and it was persistent and growing.” As to the causes of the evil, they are complex enough, no doubt. One of the first is the distribution of dangerous knowledge, and another is to be discovered in the growing love of personal comforts and luxury. Parents, said Dr. BALLANTYNE, argued that children were expensive, and they hardly seemed, as yet, to think of the future. “Present-day civilisation seems to have no room for the baby. It finds no place for itself in the flat system, and to the modern servant it is anathema.” Other causes are to be found in the fact of late marriages, the higher education of women, in the entry of women into economic competition with men, and even, possibly, in athletics. In other words, that serious national danger often lightly alluded to as the limitation of families, and commonly attributed to prudential motives, may, in only too many cases, be more correctly ascribed to sheer selfishness. Men and women—especially, as Dr. BALLANTYNE remarked, women—are bent on the enjoyment of life without taking a share in its burdens. The sense of futurity and the claims of posterity alike seem to be lost in a species of butterfly existence, and this disastrous tendency towards shirking the responsibilities of life is, with the growth of luxury and the love of exhibiting it, alarmingly on the increase. This aspect of the question was touched upon by another of the speakers, Dr. FREMANTLE, who said:—

In the upper social classes the motives for small families were consciously prudential, either with the view to lessening the encumbrances on the purse or with a view to avoiding the discomforts and responsibilities of parenthood. In the majority of cases he believed the prudential motive honestly predominated, but at the back of it was the unconscious struggle due to the increasing standard of living which people made owing to their reputation, their friendships, their prospects. It was all a struggle for the survival of the fittest, but only a temporary survival. The girls' public school boasted of the strong, determined, well-equipped young women which they turned out to face the battle of life, but it was a mistake. They were unprepared for married life. In all classes of life the appetites of girls were being whetted for distractions which, however harmless or even useful in themselves, unfitted them for domestic duties. Their ideal seemed to be beat man at his own game. The crown of the arch they were building for themselves was political power, and woman suffrage, in any shape or form, was therefore profoundly inimical to the birth-rate. . . . An increasing attempt should be made to stir up public opinion to the national degeneration now in progress.

As to counteracting influences, some interesting suggestions were offered by those present. They might meet the spread of dangerous information by the dissemination of correct notions, and they might endeavour to give a girl higher education specially suited to her. They might make it illegal for women to work in factories, and hold out legislative and fiscal prizes to fathers of families. Many authorities, however, are pessimistic as to the efficacy of these measures, holding that it is more than likely that the people of to-day would despise the rewards and defy the penalties. In any case, it is felt that some time must elapse before any counteracting influence could be got to work, and an even longer time before that influence could make itself felt in that class of society which all who have the best interests of the race at heart must wish to see increasing.

There is one aspect of the question, however, upon which Dr. BALLANTYNE does not appear to have touched. It is the cost of living—or rather of that false and mischievous influence of modern society, the so-called necessity of “keeping up appearances”—which is the cause of the undue postponement of many marriages and a fatal bar to the consummation of many more. In this, as in most allied cases, the woman sets the standard. As when the historic young middle-class lady met an offer of marriage from a bachelor of moderate means with the proviso that a carriage and pair, wherein to ride with superior air among her suburban friends, must be a necessary condition of the matrimonial bargain. Of course, to such terms the merest man must decline to bow; nevertheless we think that something might be done to encourage and facilitate earlier marriages than those commonly entered upon—that is to say, before your bachelor becomes blasé and your maiden soured, and both have arrived at the calculating age. In view of the fact that most young men starting life are pressed for means, State assistance should be given to all men marrying under the age of 25, whose incomes are below say £100 a year, and a bonus added in all such cases for each child of the union, the bonus increasing with the number of children. As to the source from which the funds for the purpose are to be derived, a tax should be levied on all bachelors over the age of 21, increasing up to the age of 50; and this again might be made proportionate to the income in each case. The vast sums of money expended by young, and even middle aged, unmarried men at the billiard-table, at the drinking-bar and in less innocent diversions still, might far better be devoted to the assisting of young married people, less happily circumstanced, who are nevertheless doing some good in the world by adding to the nation's strength and manhood. We are firmly of opinion that the systematic taxation of bachelors, living in most cases for themselves alone, and the application of the revenue thus obtained to the aid of the young married man, would redound to the benefit of the State, and would prove not only a material, but a moral, gain.

IRISH CONSPIRATORS AND "HOME RULE ALL ROUND."

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 25)

"BEHIND the Conference," writes Mr. J. L. GARVIN, in discussing its somewhat mysterious course, "rises the shadow of the Irish Question." If so, the ghost has been conjured up by Mr. BIRRELL, who in his fatuous speech at the Eighty Club, by dint of sundry hints and nods, led the people of the United Kingdom to believe that the Council of Eight is deep in the throes of "Home Rule all Round." The Emerald Isle, of course, has long been involved in the separatist strife; Scotland now appears to have caught the infection—the disease passes in North Britain under the specious name of Devolution—and no doubt the Welsh section of the Celtic fringe will shortly make itself heard for the same purpose. In fact, if the political quacks who are just at present so much to the fore have their way, from the Irish Secretary downwards, the Government will soon be told off to the task of "keeping the Empire together by blowing the United Kingdom into smithereens." We do not propose here to enter into a discussion of the use, or rather abuse, of Federalism for the British Islands, except to remark that the business in hand for the statesmen of England—if they are statesmen and not pettifogging parochialists—is one of Union, rather than disintegration, and that to set about the colossal task of Imperial Federation by destroying the unity of the Mother Country may well prove even more a disaster than a contradiction in terms. But the question into which we wish to enquire is how far Irish disaffection has influenced the deliberations of the Conference—as it has it has dominated the career of the ASQUITH Ministry—and what are the tendencies of that disaffection at the present time. The agitation which now has Mr. REDMOND for its mouthpiece has always reminded us of the parable of the importunate widow, with the plaint of that irrepressible person reinforced by threats of terrible things to come. Unfortunately, and unlike the said widow, the Irish people do not themselves appear to know exactly what they want. They and their political agents represent a long series of "vicious paradoxes," which, however entertaining to the man in the street, constitute a serious embarrassment to their Liberal allies at Westminster. We cannot do better than quote the Observer's able estimate of Irish influence and contrariness:—

The Irish people are in many ways Conservative at heart, yet they supply majorities on terms for destructive sections that would otherwise be impotent. They hated the late Budget and yet they carried it. They loathe the Henry Georgeism which threatens the very base of the new proprietary order in Ireland, and yet they promoted the land taxes. By religion, temperament, and agricultural interest they are anti-Socialist to a man, yet nothing but their support enables Socialism to make an effective figure in the lobbies or to exert steady pressure upon legislation. If Socialism comes to a dangerous height it will be because the Irish vote swells it. If a Government pledged to woman's suffrage succeeds, it will be because of simultaneous promises to the Irish ranks. If the House of Lords is ever subverted, it will be by the vote of a people who have a stronger liking for aristocratic leadership than has any other section of these islands. . . . If the highest object of Anglo-American policy—a permanent treaty of arbitration and perpetual peace between the British Empire and the United States—is prevented, and if the last disaster of the worst of wars should ever fall upon the English-speaking world and ruin its hopes both in the Atlantic and the Pacific, that result will be caused by Irish hostility. In the same way, the Irish, who by interest and instinct are strongly inclined to Tariff Reform, still maintain the Cobdenism which has been more responsible than anything else for cutting down their population from nearly nine millions to little more than four.

As to Irish aims in general, one naturally turns for guidance to the utterances of their leaders. There has recently been published a collection of Mr. REDMOND's speeches, carefully collated, with perhaps one exception, to suit the palate of the British Radical consumer. The exception is in a discourse delivered by Mr. REDMOND in Chicago as long ago as August 1886, in which the Irish leader lays down in plain terms the real demand of the Home Rule faction, as it is understood both in America and in Ireland. Here is a quotation:—

The principle embodied in the Irish movement of to-day is just the same principle which was the soul of every Irish movement for the last seven centuries—the principle of rebellion against the rule of strangers—the principle which Owen Roe O'Neill vindicated at Benburb, which animated Tone and Fitzgerald, and to which Emmett sacrificed a stainless life.

Of course Mr. REDMOND denies that this principle involves a hatred of England, but it is quite certain that O'NEILL, WOLFE TONE, FITZGERALD, and even EMMETT held no such doctrine, nor is it held by their followers now. No one in Ireland in the least supposes there can be any reason to expect complete toleration on the part of the Irish Roman Catholic majority for their Protestant countrymen if the time should ever come for the former to hold the destinies of the latter in their hands. In Ulster, at all events, no Protestant will ever entrust power to a party that is absolutely in the hands of an organisation like the Ancient Order of Hibernians, which for centuries has represented the most bitter sectarian animosity of Roman Catholicism against the reformed faith. What is more, no one can discover in the speeches of Mr. REDMOND a single sentence which guarantees that any conceivable form of Home Rule would be accepted in Ireland as a final settlement of the question. On the contrary, there are distinct statements that no such guarantee could be given, with the almost hinted suggestion that, if it were otherwise, the supply of American dollars would be very seriously affected. We fear that even Irish members of Parliament must admit that their work has always been ineffective by itself, and has only been rendered effective by the motive power given to it by Irish revolutionaries operating independently from outside. As to the working and methods of these outside revolutionaries, their records are written in the ghastly story of the Phoenix Park murders and the other so-called "political" crimes of the eighties, that formed the lever which, according to Nationalist orators, forced English Liberal Governments to pass revolutionary legislation for Ireland. "The evil that men do lives after them." The place of these assassins has now been taken in Ireland by the boycotter, the cattle-driver, and the intimidator, who mutilates cattle or riddles his victim with small shot, but the principle and the practice are just the same. The present state of Ireland is a disgrace to the Empire, and the Government makes no genuine attempt to improve it. As one of the leading reviews remarks, à propos of the debate raised recently by Lord LONDON-DERRY in the Upper House:—

The general contempt of law which has made itself more remarkable by the commission of overt acts of actual crime is general over the whole of the West, and a large portion of the Centre and of the South. The comparative peace which exists in the less affected countries is due not to any respect for the administration of the law, but to the working of the remedial measures for which a Unionist Government was solely responsible. In these areas land-purchase has gone on in spite of the difficulties created by a vicious League and a weak Executive. In many instances intimidation unchecked and uncontrolled has done the work, and its victims have yielded up their legal rights in hopeless despair of protection from the law. . . . There was no denial, on the part of Government apologists, of the unquestioned truth that crime in the disturbed counties is openly committed with perfect impunity. No pretence was made that the ordinary law, as at present administered, is capable of dealing with the criminals. Magistrates and police are impotent spectators of a condition of lawlessness which they are sworn to prevent. The defence offered on behalf of Mr. Birrell was limited to a puerile contrast between crimes committed in England and in Ireland, in words which might have been taken verbatim from the lips of the worst class of Irish agitators, on whom largely rests the responsibility for the disturbances.

It certainly seems, from the speech which Mr. BIRRELL, as a participant in the Constitutional Conference, was put up to make, as if the Government, worried to distraction by the Irish agitation and their own absolute dependence on the Nationalist vote—and impelled to action, no doubt, by the fact of the Imperial Conference to meet next year—are bent on resorting to some large and desperate measure, whereby Home Rule for Ireland may be merged in the general disruption of the Kingdom, under the guise of a mighty plunge in the direction of the Federation of the Empire, and by means of which the Liberal party at Westminster may at the same time be delivered from Mr. REDMOND's domination. We greatly doubt whether Unionists can be bribed to surrender their principles by even so vast a sop, just as we doubt whether any such wild scheme—a remedy worse than the disease—could effect a lasting solution of the Irish problem. The only exegesis of the suggested coup is that the position of the Government has driven them to the blindest desperation. Quos Deus vult perdere prius dementat.

KOREA.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 26.)

IF it be true, as the telegrams seem to indicate, that the total expense of dealing with the various claims arising out of the annexation of Korea does not exceed 30 million yen, the world will have to agree that there has been no needless expenditure. Moreover, the three classes directly concerned in the settlement, namely, the Imperial Family, the Meritorious Subjects and the Yanpang, seem to be entirely satisfied—which is, of course, a matter for great congratulation. The Sovereign ceases to exercise governing powers and is reduced to the position of a nominal being, while the Resident-General becomes a Viceroy, or a Governor-General, if the latter term be preferred, possessing the same administrative and legislative competence as the Totoku of the Leased Territory or the Sōtoku of Formosa. The pill is richly gilded in the case of the deposed Sovereign. He will suffer no diminution of income, but will continue to receive one and a half millions of yen yearly. The Japanese Government appear to have managed this difficult matter with much address. They have obtained the full approval of all those most intimately concerned in the change, even the ex-Emperor himself being an approving party. Moreover, everything has been worked out quietly and without any ostentation whatever. Thus, material to feed agitation is reduced to a minimum. There will, of course, be criticism. The world contains many publicists who, while professing themselves to be warm advocates of progress and enlightenment, obey strictly conservative principles in practice. These people will, doubtless, have much to say about the weak and the strong, about selfish aggression, and about the pillaging of Kingdoms. But two things have to be kept constantly in mind. One is that the geographical situation of the Korean Peninsula absolutely vetoes its abandonment to the guidance of accident. Its possession is far more important to Japan than even the possession of Egypt is to England; and as the Koreans, in all the course of their history, have never developed any capacity for self-government or self-preservation, it is out of the question that they should be left any longer to the control of chance, especially when great dangers are involved in such a course. The second consideration is that the Koreans will fare incomparably better under the progressive and highly civilized rule of Japan than they could possibly expect to fare under the control of their own statesmen, who have proved themselves to be un-endowed with any faculty of enlightenment. From another point of view the event does not present itself in quite such a rosy light. The possession of Korea converts Japan into a continental Power, whereas it would certainly have been safer and less expensive for her to remain insular. But in that respect she could not have exercised any choice, except on condition that the island of Tsushima was buried in the sea, and that the passage between Japan and Korea was widened by about 100 miles. In fact, nature has forced Japan's hand in this matter.

It is scarcely necessary to add, with entire confidence, that the conventional interests of foreigners in Korea will be strictly safeguarded. Japan has always shown herself absolutely loyal in discharging her treaty obligations, and there need not be the slightest fear of any departure from that strict rule on an occasion so important as this. Another feature which invites observation is the gradual manner in which this problem has been solved. The public have been prepared by such leisurely and patient processes that the denouement loses all striking proportions, and falls into a sequence of seemingly natural events.

JAPAN'S DEBT TO VOLCANIC ACTION.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 26.)

II.

IT is a noteworthy fact that, in this volcanic land, the cones which at present display activity are situated in the broader zones of terrestrial weakness, where these approach the sea or any large expanse of water. Thus in the northern portion of the Hondo-Hokkaido anticline, about the region of Volcano Bay, we have the active cones of Esan, Komagatake, Noboribetsu, Usudake and Tarumai; in the southern portion of the same anticline, there are the ancient but still vigorous cones about Lake Inawashiro, of which Bandaisan is the chief. All the eruptions of modern times—of which that of Usudake is the most recent—have taken place in craters thus situated, and have been of the intermittent-explosive order. These circumstances bear eloquent testimony to the part played by water in the more violent manifestations of volcanic phenomena; but it may be remarked, from another point of view, that the juxtaposition of the two primal elements goes far towards imparting to the Japanese coast, and to the shores of Japanese lakes, a distinctive and unique attractiveness which few other lands can claim. Nature has no more graceful form to show than that of the well-built cone. Stern cliffs rising from a rock-bound shore and crowned with wooded slopes are scenic effects common to many parts of the globe, but in how many cases can there be added the awesome yet beauteous feature of a perfect cone, presiding with sound and steam over the intervening woods and waves? Add to this the presence of the forest-girt mountain spa, recognized from afar by the cloud of vapour rising about the shingle roofs of a few humble huts—add those hot-spring legacies of spent volcanoes which in populous health-seeking Europe would be as a mine of gold; and it will appear that Japan possesses in the varied products of the Plutonian Forge priceless assets of material as, well as æsthetic, worth.

But the sum of Japan's indebtedness to volcanic action, vast and varied though it be, is epitomised, as it were, in a single peak. The average visitor to these shores, if his attention is called to the work of subterranean fires, thinks of Fuji first and, probably, last. Of course, Fuji is but one of those 165 "independent" volcanoes, active and extinct, which are shown on Japanese geological maps. We will not call in question the figure, apart from pointing out the extreme difficulty of deciding whether a mountain composed of volcanic rock shall be reckoned as an independent cone or not; still, it may legitimately be pointed out that these islands hold hundreds of hills, great and small, which to the unpractised eye have lost all indications of their origin, but represent, nevertheless, the solid cores and "stumps" of dead Asamas and Shiranesans. However, there is no denying the predominance of Fujiyama, nor is there any need to labour the point of the influence of the greatest of Japan's volcanoes on the popular mind and art. Can not the globe-trotter discover as much for himself in the shops of Benten-dori and the Ginza? It was in 806 A.D. that a Japanese Emperor erected the first shrine on the summit of the mountain, and, ever since that date, Fuji has been an object of veneration to the people of this land, its perfection of outline the theme of a hundred poets, its mighty outbursts the terror of a hundred villages. Tradition does not assign great age to the mountain—it is said to have first appeared to view in the 5th year of the Emperor KOREI (294 B.C.). That would leave a period of little more than a thousand years for the formation of a cone 12,400 feet in height with a base some twenty five miles in diameter—a conclusion in which, by the nature of things, geology must decline to concur. However, popular fancy has cut the Gordian knot of the problem by declaring that Fuji was formed, contemporaneously with the basin of Lake Biwa, in a single night, the earth from the cavity becoming the mountain—a simple and expeditious process involving no waste of good material. But another authority ascribes a celestial origin to the great volcano:—

"When Heaven and Earth were separated, and men saw the mountain-peak of the lonely, lofty, and noble Fuji of Suruga descend from the expanse of the skies, the light of the sun was hid and the shining of the bright moon was not visible, and the white clouds also being arrested in their staying or passing on the snow poured down. . . ."

Leaving to legend the task of deciding the precise age of what is generally conceded to be the most beautiful mountain in the world, we may at least remark that the peerless one has begun to show perceptible signs of wear and tear, though the unusual strength of the cone may spare it, for ages yet, from the two disasters to which volcanoes in all parts of the world are subject—the breaching of the summit-crater and the subsidence of the upper structure of the cone. Two hundred years ago the subterranean forces, which had long ceased to trouble the summit, found a weak spot five thousand feet down on the flank of the mountain. Such is the genesis of the "hump" of Hoeizan, the parasitic cone with ash-bound crater which mars the symmetry of the mountain on the south-eastern side. Even that outburst of the volcano's declining energy, which lasted with intervals for the space of forty days, was no more than a mild repetition of the process by which Fuji made itself. There is no particle of that vast mass but has been shot from the fiery vent which now forms its axis. Scoriæ and lava, lava and scoriæ, so the great "cinder heap" rises to its ragged, black-red crest, where an abyss five hundred feet in depth and a third of a mile in width, strewn with a chaos of boulders red and black, yawns to the eternal sky.

Nevertheless, for all the sublimity that the sombre summit of Fuji inspires, who shall say that the mountain has not given due compensation in the verdant fringe about its base? The traveller may lunch on the once unapproachable crest (if he be not taken with mountain-sickness, or if the wind suffer him, and threaten not to blow Hut No. 10 into the crater); and he may dine at Shoji on a promontory mirrored in a beautiful and placid lake; or watch at sunrise the next morning the rose-tinted reflection of the great volcano in the still waters. Let him then deny, if he can, that in this Far Eastern Tierra del Fuego the beautiful and the sublime go hand in hand—that Time and Nature have wondrously conspired to link an Inferno with a Paradise.

THE KARUIZAWA FLOODS.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Karuizawa, August 16.

Since my letter of the 12th there is little in the way of news to report in connection with the desolated districts of this locality; but it may be of some interest to the public if I enlarge somewhat upon Sunday's telegram which necessarily had to be brief.

The unprecedented heavy rains which began on Sunday evening the 7th and ceased on the morning of the 11th, began again with even increased fury on the evening of the 12th and by Saturday morning the floods, which in the two days intermission had begun to subside considerably, now again began to rise, so that it occupied the whole time of the entire inhabitants of the village, foreigners included, to keep the current from breaking once more down the main street of Karuizawa. All day Saturday and Sunday were spent in this endeavour; and those engaged in the heroic effort must be congratulated upon their marvellous achievement in being able so successfully to dam the mighty torrent. One is still more impressed when it is borne in mind that this was not accomplished except at the risk of life and limb. There were moments when we watched with keen intensity and dread suspense to see whether individuals here and there would come out of the flood alive. As the main torrent about fifty feet wide was careering toward the village men had to throw a dam of trees and stones across to deflect it toward the old course across the plains. On one occasion the current caught a young foreigner and hurled him down the stream like a chip on a waterfall. At once forty or fifty men were rushing along the banks of the flood trying to get sight of him, but all that could be seen were occasional glimpses of his head and hands above the rushing mass of water. His would-be rescuers could not keep at all near him, for the speed of the current was like a flying bird in comparison with that of those on foot. At last it was seen that he was caught by a bunch of roots that the current had not yet been able to dislodge. Five men soon came up and plunged in to feel for him and extricate him from his watery prison. There was a moment of intense suspense while the crowd watched in awestruck silence, wondering whether he would be found. Then came the profound sigh of relief as one of them pulled his arm above the water, and with the help of the others, pulled him through the raging torrent to the bank.

The rain stopped on Monday morning but began again on Monday night, and though it was fine this morning, it has already commenced to pour again, and if it keeps on we may have all our anxiety and labour repeated. However, we in Karuizawa have fared better than those in some of the districts around, such as at Yokogawa for instance, where a great part of the town has been washed away and several lives lost, as intimated in my message of Sunday. Between the tunnels on the line from Yokogawa to Karuizawa there have been several tremendous landslides, burying the cottage of the railway hands, and in one or two cases, entombing men. The bridges between the various tunnels are washed almost completely away, leaving the rails dangling in the air. There is at present no communication with Karuizawa except by wire. In the last ten days one or two postmen have attempted to get out with letters for Tokyo; and whether or not the mail bags have reached the capital, we do not yet know. Communication with the North and West is easier but yet not easy. We can go by train from Kutsukake to Nagano and around by Suwa and Kofu, by walking over one or two bad breaks and fording streams.

The greatest fear in Karuizawa for a time was the scarcity of provisions. On Sunday a public meeting was called to consider the matter of getting in food supplies. The committee then appointed have been working hard to accomplish something. Those people who took time by the forelock and went out and bought what was in the grocery shops have probably enough provisions for a time, but there are others living on limited rations. Very little meat is to be had. The Governor of the Ken sent a present of two quarters of beef to the famishing citizens to be sold for the benefit of the destitute, and it was soon disposed of. Of course the poorer among the Japanese are the worst off. Some of these have had houses and contents completely swept away. Men working on the railway have been shut off from their families; and when they are able to get home again they will find nothing but the living portion of their estate existing. As I went through the desolated portion of the village yesterday there was a homeless family sitting near the wreck of their hut; and as they seemed rather hungry looking, I offered them something, for which they appeared very grateful. The foreigners are collecting a fund to help those who have been rendered completely homeless.

Attempts are now being made to get some food supplies in from Nagano and Matsumoto. The little provisions that have brought in are selling at high prices, though it must be said in favour of the merchants that as a rule they have been eminently fair in their prices. Eggs are five and six sen each and soon disappear at that. The grocery shops are quite empty, with the exception of a few bottles of pickles and liquor. Most people have been without butter for over a week. There is sufficient flour on hand for more than a week yet. Indeed it seems out of place to complain when we hear of utter desolation in so many other places. But as the rain is still pouring down as I write, and food is admittedly scarce, we cannot but feel a little anxious until the weather clears and ample provisions are full in sight.

There are ten cars of goods at Karuizawa station, some of which contain food, largely rice, but the flood has cut the village off so that these supplies cannot be got. The flood down the valley past the Mikasa hotel greatly increased with the second downpour of rain, and part of the hotel has been carried away. Marquis Katsura and Marquis Saionji were staying here at the time; but it is reported that they have started on their way to Tokyo by way of Matsumoto and Kofu. One gentleman who left for Tokyo yesterday by the same route, telegraphed that he had safely got as far as Suwa by evening. Some who have walked over from Nikko report desolation in the country between. Telegrams have reached here as to the flood, and many of us are very anxious to know whether what seems so incredible can be true.

August 20.

Now that the waters of the deluge have subsided, the inhabitants of Karuizawa, like those of a great many other parts of Japan, feel like postdeluvians; while those who reside on the aravats above the village are congratulating themselves on their foresight in having selected sites immune to flood. Life has again settled down to its ordinary routine and things are going on in the same old way. The anxiety about provisions proved somewhat previous; for the Japanese authorities of the village and the prefecture at once saw to it that the necessary food supplies were sent in, and there was hardly any inconvenience, much less suffering.

The fund started for the assistance of those losing property in the inundation has grown to quite a respectable sum, considering the size of the place. It is now over 1,900 yen in all, I believe; and it was decided by vote at a public meeting yesterday, that the sum was greater than the special needs of Karuizawa relief required; so that 600 yen are to be appropriated for Japanese sufferers in Karuizawa, about the same amount to those who lost houses, another portion to be sent to relief committees in various districts around, and a perpetual Karuizawa Charity fund to be established with the remainder.

The public meeting for the reception of reports from the various committees appointed for the emergency was preceeded by the concert which the floods had postponed. The programme opened with an excellent piano solo by Mr. Jones, the selection not being quite so familiar as the name; while Mr. DeBecker of Yokohama, looking no less for his experiences in the deluge, gave a comic reading, which was much appreciated. A violin solo by Miss Tanner elicited a hearty encore, and the special admiration of those who presented the bouquet and collected the music. The song by Mr. Shively, as usual when this gentleman sings, drew forth hearty calls for encores which were graciously accorded. Miss Carlyle sang two hymns which appeared to leave a profound impression on the audience. Then Miss Alchin, always a favourite with Karuizawa audiences, sang very sweetly two songs.

At the close of the concert the chairman, Mr. Gleason, announced the arrival of long looked-for mail at the post office and expressed the belief that it would be all delivered before the next afternoon, which news was heartily applauded. Then the public meeting for the reception of reports began, with Mr. Dunlop in the chair. The Engineering Committee under the direction of Lieutenant Strong of the American Embassy, reported the heroic work done in the building of dams and in rescuing the village from further age by water. The Rations Committee under the direction of Mr. Norman, reported that the village merchants had given such careful attention to the needs of the community, that the work of the committee had been very light. The Communications Committee under the direction of Mr. Coleman, reported some difficulties in listening communications, owing to the extent of interruption by the floods, but that Tokyo could now safely be reached by way of Matsumoto and the Kofu line. The Relief Fund Committee reported somewhat as above, the funds to be disposed of as I have already described. Votes of thanks were offered to the Governor of the Ken for his donations to the provision supply, and to two Nagano bankers for similar kindnesses, as well as to the proprietor of the Kodzu butter farm for two carcasses of pork. Lieutenant Strong was thanked for his able management of the engineering corps; and while it may be said that he well deserved the thanks of the community, it is only fair to say that Captain Blair and Mr. Hobart-Hampden of the British Embassy, were equally foremost in their efforts to stem the flood and lead in all matters affecting the welfare of the community. Captain Blair's exploits in the raging torrent, indeed kept some of us anxious as to his life. In this matter it is a somewhat delicate course to make mention of names at all, as the number of those risking life and health, standing for hours in the cold, rushing water, was so great that it is hardly in order to select names for mention. But as names were specially mentioned at the meeting, it is but fair to note others not a whit behind those singled out for praise as specially inspiring our success in fighting the flood. In fact so many votes of thanks were passed and so much did those present seem to appreciate one another, that there was, as one speaker pointed out, a little danger of falling into a mutual admiration society.

Some of the merchants who completely sold out during the emergency period, have closed up shop and apparently intend doing no further business until next year. This is quite opposed to the English and American point of view, especially in regard to provisions and groceries; for an American or English grocer would as a matter of principle see that the wants of his customers were met to the end of the season, knowing that he would lose custom by resting on his oars and showing no further interest in those who patronized him, just because he happened to have sold all he expected to sell. For business is something more than mere buying and selling: it is giving mutual satisfaction in the bargain. As the matter stands, if any one wants foreign provisions as good tea, coffee, or bacon, the only thing to do is send to Yokohama. In the old days people used to bring up their own stock of provisions, and were in position to defy the elements to some extent: but of late years they have been depending upon the grocers coming up every summer from Tokyo, and establishing temporary shops here. But if these shops are going to follow the custom of refusing to re-stock when they happen to have sold out early, the old way is likely to revive, and the temporary provision shops be unable to do sufficient business to pay. Of course those who bought out the grocery shops in the time of emergency are not likely to agree to the above sentiments, for not only are they well supplied, but they doubtless feel a bit uneasy at having inconvenienced others, and closed up the largest grocery store in the village. Those not so fortunate as to have laid in stores and who have for the next two or three weeks to depend on local supplies will not be as readily disposed to acquiesce in the situation.

The business of carrying the mails is making very slow recovery. I have only had one newspaper in 13 days. The local office is daily besieged for information, but the authorities seem to know as little as the applicants. Perhaps preference is given to letters in the carrying of mail matter.

SEMPER IDEM.

THE TAKASAKI ROUTE FROM KARUIZAWA TO TOKYO.

According to information obtained from the Station Master at Yokogawa on the 21st inst. the line from Karuizawa to Yokogawa will be open by September 1st. Gangs of coolies, consisting of about 50 men, are working day and night on the worst parts of the line. It seems rather uncertain whether the line from Yokogawa to Matsuida will be open this month.

Good walkers who wish to go from Karuizawa to Tokyo before the end of the month can easily do so in one day. They are advised to leave Karuizawa at about eight o'clock in the morning. The distance to Matsuida by way of the tunnels is 12 miles, and by the Usui Pass road about 15. There is a train that leaves Matsuida at 2.35 p.m. By this one can go as far as Annaka. From Annaka there is a walk of three miles to Iizuka. The 4.20 train from Iizuka carries passengers to Kurogane, where they cross the river in a boat to Shimmachi. From Shimmachi the line is open all the way to Tōkyō. The Yokogawa Station Master is of opinion that passengers can reach Ueno before 10 p.m. by this route if they catch the 2.35 train from Matsuida. The "stout pedestrian" of Murray's Guide is recommended to go to Yokogawa by the Usui Pass, which the writer of this note did on the 1st inst. A huge landslide has destroyed a part of the road and rendered it quite impassable, but another path has been opened and travellers are warned by a notice not to take the old route. This lengthens the distance to Yokogawa by several miles, but the scenery in this part of the mountains is magnificent and well repays one for the extra fatigue. The tunnel route, though shorter, is very unpleasant owing to the dripping water and the unevenness of the footpath by the side of the line. Lanterns or torches are needed. Three hours are ample to allow for the journey from the Karuizawa Station to the Yokogawa Station by way of the tunnels. The road from Yokogawa to Matsuida is still very bad in parts, but is improving daily.

The charge for carrying baggage from Karuizawa to Matsuida, I was told, is about two yen for forty pounds. A man left with a load yesterday morning at six, going and returning by way of the tunnels; it took him 13 hours and he said it could not well be done in less time. The leakage in tunnel 26 has almost stopped and passengers were walking through it in large numbers last night.

The report that Marquis Katsura's son was killed by a landslide was incorrect. Mr. Kondo's villa at Kirizumi was smashed in and buried by a terrible landslide. His second son, who had only just reached the place from Tōkyō, and three other men were killed. The scene of the disaster is well worth a visit.

After a close examination of the broken parts of the line, I am inclined to think that it is doubtful whether trains will begin to run as early as Sept. 1st. Much depends on the continuance of fine weather. Where the line is now near the edge of a precipice which has been rendered unsafe by heavy landslides, preparations are being made to change the track. The mails from Tokyo and Yokohama now take about 48 hrs. to go through to Karuizawa.

THE CHARACTER OF THE KOREAN.

(FROM OUR SEOUL CORRESPONDENT.)

How lightly care sits on the soul of the Korean, is known to everyone of his old time acquaintances. In no part of the world is the text "Your Heavenly Father feedeth them" so accepted by believer and unbeliever alike, as a self-evident truth, as unquestioned as any mathematical axiom. He knows nothing of deep grinding care that goes down into the quick with saline mixtures added, not he. Suicide exists, but never as due to financial embarrassment, or anxiety about tomorrow's supply. If he has a quarrel and loses face, he may suicide to pay off his antagonist, which is the shortest and sharpest way of squaring accounts, though by what law of profit and loss it works out I do not know. Again, if it is required that he make a special display of heroic virtue, he may do it through suicide. Suicide in itself is not a blood besmeared cowardly act that leaves friends and relatives in disgrace, not at all. It more often is an act of a brave heart that finds no other form of expression sufficient, but he never suicides because he is out of work, or in debt, or afraid that starvation awaits him, or from any feeling of disgrace at being a business failure.

Everybody is in debt to everybody else. Clearing days come once a year or so, when there is the tug of all the seasons in settling up, and then again matters lapse back into the place where they were and where food and clothing come of themselves and all are happy.

Some years ago a symposium was undertaken by which it was to be shown how Korea lived, what was behind the mystery of payment and receipt, profit and loss, credit and debt, but it died in the proposition, and to this day, after fifteen years of added time, the proposers are as much in the dark as ever as to how the ordinary Korean lives.

Over the way is a man with a family of seven, himself, wife, four children and mother-in-law. The children are all small.

"How goes the world with you?" we ask. "Very bad indeed," he answers, "I hardly know where tomorrow's dinner is to come from." "What do you work at?" we inquire. "Straw sandals," says he. "How many pairs do you make a day?" "Three pairs, about." "How much a pair do you sell them at?" "Five sen." Here is a clear fifteen sen a day for seven people to feed and dress on, and yet they live. If a foreigner undertook to keep that home he would have to pay fifteen yen a month at least or they would starve on his hands. How they live no man knows, and yet they are never anxious. Some law of survival that defies the scrutiny of the West to get at exists, by which any man may idle as he pleases, and still eat and dress and have no care for the morrow. This law will, sooner or later, surely come up against the new regime of to-day and be shattered, leaving its crew shipwrecked.

The Korean is anxious politically, not financially, anxious as to how his country goes but not anxious as to the relation of his own efforts to national prosperity. Groups of idle people sit about discussing the why and wherefore of the present times, not realizing that to be up and doing is the only solution.

Doubtless in the changes that come hard conditions will follow of bald cause and result, and we shall lose the mystery and a certain Arabian-night charm that has governed Korean life for the last quarter of a century, in which no one seemed obliged to work and yet was well fed and had not a care in all the world.

NOTICE TO MARINERS.

CHINA SEA:—CANTON DISTRICT:—UNCHARTED ROCKS NEAR BODDAM COVE AND CHUNGCHAU ISLAND

Notice is hereby given by Order of the Inspector General of Customs, of uncharted rocks in the following positions:—

A rock, covered 8 feet at low water of spring tides, lies in the approach to Boddum Cove,, Ladron Islands, with North Rock bearing N. 72° W., distant 7 cables.

A rock, covered 6 feet at low water of spring tides, lies 1.6 cables off the western shore of Chungchau (Lueng,) with the southern point of that island bearing S. 63° E., distant 10½ cables.

Note.—Chungchau is the island lying 14 miles to the eastward of Macao.

All bearings given magnetic.

KARUIZAWA.

The rainfall in Karuizawa from 6 a.m. on Wednesday the 10th till about 2 a.m. on Thursday was 20 inches. This accounts for the suddenness with which small streams converted themselves into roaring rivers and for the big landslides that took place hither and thither on Thursday and Friday. As already stated in these columns, a meeting of the foreign community took place on Sunday, the 14th. The Emergency Committee appointed on that day called another meeting for Friday, the 19th, and on that occasion reported all that had been done. Lieut. Strong, the Chairman of the Engineering Committee, gave an account of the various dams and bridges built; Mr. Norman, the Chairman of the Provisions Committee, stated that the Governor of Nagano had presented two beef carcasses to the Community and that Mr. Kozu, the owner of the Kozu Butter Factory, had sent two pigs, and that offers of help had come from other quarters. Shopkeepers, it was reported, had done their best to obtain supplies from the surrounding places by the use of coolies, the result being that there was no longer any anxiety about food. Mr. Mann then gave a very lucid statement of the manner in which the Relief Fund has been and is to be expended. A subscription list was taken around by certain members of the Committee, and as a result of this and the sale of the beef and pork presented to the Community the sum of 1,975 yen was collected to constitute a Relief Fund. Out of this 600 yen was presented to the missionaries who have lost heavily by the flood, 600 yen was devoted to the relief of the Karuizawa Japanese residents and the balance was handed over to a Continuing Committee to be expended on the relief of Japanese residents in outlying districts. Numerous votes of thanks were proposed and passed and a proposal to banzai the soldiers, who for three days had been working on dams in the neighbourhood of the village and who had just completed their arduous tasks, was received with acclamation; and the work of the Emergency Committee having been completed, it was dissolved.

What perplexes everybody to-day (the 20th), is the lateness of the mails. The Japan Mail of August 10th has not yet been delivered and no Yokohama papers of later date seem to have come. This has caused great inconvenience on all sides. The Tennis Committee have acted promptly, and on the 22nd four new courts will be ready for use on the Baseball Ground. Visitors have begun to stream away, wearied of waiting for the fine weather that never comes. The thermometer has been standing at 55 Far. for several days, and people have been going about clad in winter clothes. But the air is exhilarating and despite the cheerless look of the village, everybody is cheerful.

INCIDENTS OF THE FLOOD.

Between one and two on Thursday morning (11th) the biggest of all the Karuizawa streams, which races down at the back of Mr. Chappell's property and by Mr. Gubbin's place and Mr. Sale's grounds, overflowed its banks and divided itself into two branches; one of these, after flooding Mr. Cornford's house, entered the village main street and roared down between the houses with such force that by daylight the appearance of the road in parts reminded one of the lava beds; the other branch made for the Tennis Courts and a number of fine vegetable gardens, which it ploughed up in magnificent style, and then proceeded to flood every house lying in its route. The water which flowed through the main street invaded the houses on the Eastern side of the road only; those on the Post Office side escaping with little injury. At the South of the Tennis Courts foreign houses are dotted hither and thither. All these dwellings suffered, considerably, among them, that owned by Mr. Kirby and that one occupied by Mr. De Becker of Yokohama. It was a marvel that Mr. De Becker's house was not swept away. It owed its escape to a man in Mr. De Becker's employ who had come from a province where floods are a frequent occurrence.

"This, sir, is nothing of a flood," observed the man. "Why, in my province there are always a score of people drowned every time we have a flood. These Karuizawa folks are too crafty to get drowned. (Ōchakude, nakanaka shini shinai.)" Thereupon the man proceeded to erect a barrier at the corner of the house where the water was swiftest, which saved the building from destruction. The stream which took possession of the main street found its way to the road that leads to the station, which it converted into a new river bed aided by the water which overflowed the banks of the rivulet that courses along on the Eastern side of the road on ordinary occasions. After flooding all the Japanese houses en route, the water came racing into the new Station-house and on to the line, many parts of which were under water on Thursday morning.

As far as I am aware there has been no loss of life. But at the Mikasa Hotel Mrs. Dundas of Yokohama, and Mrs. Sanguinetti of Tokyo, had a narrow escape. On the night of the 10th, the wing of the Hotel which was occupied these ladies and their children came down with a crash. The children had all been removed from the building previously, but the ladies themselves had only vacated it a few minutes when it tottered over and wholly collapsed. There seems to have been no time to remove articles of furniture. The ruins present a picture of dire confusion and terrible havoc rarely seen anywhere—chairs, tables, wash-stand, beds, with mosquito nets down already for sleeping in, mixed up with parts of the building in one tangled mass. In ordinary times the stream at the back of the Mikasa Hotel is one of the gentlest and best-behaved little brooks imaginable. In dry summers not even a bridge is needed to cross its narrowest parts. But the ravages it has worked this year are quite equal to those witnessed along the banks of the river which skirts the northern part of the village of Karuizawa. Fortunately the damage done does not include the overthrow of the human dwellings, as none of these lay in its course. But the number of gigantic trees that it has laid low, the huge landslides that it has caused, the roads that it has obliterated so thoroughly as to render their location almost undiscoverable, render this flood the worst that has occurred in these parts during the past century.

The sweet little hamlet of Kose, which for so many years Mrs. Patton has made her summer home, where she owns a lovely house surrounded by a beautiful garden well stocked with trees and plants which it has taken years to collect and train was cruelly handled by the raging water. A new tea-house, a bath-house and several other dwellings were overthrown. Mrs. Patton's front garden and her veranda were torn away and the foundation of the main dwelling greatly weakened and much other damage was done. The cart-road to Kose has been so injured that several thousand yen will be needed to repair it.

A word of praise is due to the Police, who day and night unremittingly throughout the whole trying period have watched the wild freaks of the raging waters and warned householders of coming danger. Thanks to their attention, trunks have been packed in time to be saved and women and children have been moved to safe spots while daylight lasted. Some of the men were pitiable to behold after four or five days of incessant anxiety and toil. At such times as these the sense of duty displayed by the Japanese policeman is not to be surpassed anywhere.

When the floods began the Tennis Tournament was in full swing. In no year since tennis commenced here have there been so many good players assembled at the Courts and one of the finest contests ever witnessed in Karuizawa was keenly looked forward to by six or seven hundred Europeans and Americans. But the ground has now been rendered unusable this season. Courts are to be made on the Baseball Ground, however, which, owing to its location escaped unscathed, and so on to the end of the season the irrepressible youthful spirits, of which there is such an abundant supply even among old men in this delightful mountain resort, will find a congenial outlet. One of the lessons which foreign residents here learn from what has happened is the danger of erecting houses near apparently harmless brooks. The higher lots of building land will be sought after than ever and the rental of all houses situated on low land will certainly be greatly reduced.

NOTES ON THE RECENT DISASTERS.

Saturday, August 20.

The Tokyo Municipal authorities who have been strongly attacked from all quarters for their inactivity in rescuing the poor citizens suffering from the recent floods, met for the first time on Wednesday to discuss measures for the relief. In consequence of the long-continued disasters, the price of daily necessities is rising almost every day. At Honjo, Fukagawa and other inundated wards in Tokyo, rice is now sold at 25 sen per cho, and vegetables have also advanced about fifty per cent in price. Thanks to the War Office, the appreciation of rice has been more or less abated by means of apportioning military stores, while the Home Department is contemplating preventing the rise of the price of vegetables by transportation of potatoes from the Hokkaido. One thousand kwanme of table-salt stored at the Ujina military Warehouse has been forwarded to Miyagi prefecture, and 1,000 kwanme each to Gumma, Yamanashi, Saitama, and Ibaraki prefectures.

Chamberlain Hironishi who inspected the submerged region at Honjo and Mukojima by the special command of His Imperial Majesty, proceeded on Thursday to Senju and Asakusa to inquire after the health of the sufferers. The affected people were all moved to tears of gratitude at the sight of the Imperial messenger.

Baron Shibusawa and many other leading business men in Tokyo met on Thursday to make a plan for relief on a very large scale.

The President of the French Republic and the President of the Paris Municipal Council have respectively sent cordial telegrams to the Mayor of Tokyo expressing deep sympathy with the sufferers from the recent floods.

According to the latest investigation made by Kanagawa prefectural authorities, the casualties and damages caused by the recent floods in the prefecture were as follows:—

The Department of Agriculture and Commerce reports that according to investigations made up to the 16th instant 141,071 cho of rice fields and 98,009 cho of other fields have sustained damage by the flood throughout the country.

A Mayebashi telegram says that a farm-house in a village near that district collapsed owing to a landslide several days ago. On Wednesday afternoon the inmates eight in number were discovered crushed to death.

The roof of the gate of the Ryodaishi Temple at Ueno, Tokyo, which has been under repairs collapsed all of a sudden, two workmen on the roof being seriously injured.

Electric tramway traffic on the Keihin and Oawara lines was restored on Thursday, connection being only broken at the Rokugo and Sakawa rivers respectively, where the passengers have to alight and be conveyed by boats.

Monday, August 22.

On Saturday morning Chamberlain Hinonishi waited on the Throne to make a report to His Majesty the Emperor with regard to the actual condition of sufferers and refugees from the recent floods. Subsequently the Imperial messenger was ordered to proceed to the quarter of Hachioji to further inspect the condition of disasters.

A Seoul despatch reports that a Cabinet council was held on Thursday at the Imperial Palace when it was decided to donate 50,000 yen towards the relief fund for Japanese sufferers in Tokyo and other prefectures. The Resident-General and Vice-Resident-General have each contributed 200 yen. The example being followed by other government officials, the amount of donation is reported to have up to date exceeded 200,000 yen.

Marquis Mayeda has contributed 1,500 yen to the Home Department for the same purpose, apportioning 10,000 yen to Tokyo-fu.

The deepest sympathy from the British government and nation has been expressed to the Japanese Government through the British Ambassador in Tokyo. A similar expression of sympathy from the U.S. Government and nation has also been received by the Foreign Office through the U.S. Ambassador, while the Spanish Government has tendered its heartfelt sympathy to the Japanese Government through the Spanish Minister. The profound sympathy of the New South Wales Government and people has been received by the Foreign Minister through the New South Wales Commercial Agent at Kobe. Similar messages of sympathy from the Ambassadors or representatives of France, Italy, Russia, and Germany, now at Nikko, have been transmitted to the Foreign Minister through Sir Claude MacDonald, the doyen of the diplomatic corps.

The Administration Bureau of the Communication Department has established a special system of postal sampan in Tokyo, in order to facilitate postal and telegraphic communication between the people, especially to those in the flood districts.

Extraordinary disbursement of postal savings deposits has since the 12th instant been made at various post offices in Tokyo, Chiba, Saitama, Ibaraki, Gumma, and Tochigi prefectures. Up to the 18th instant the amount repaid in flood districts of Tokyo reached 11,950 yen.

On Saturday Marquis Katsura, the Premier, held a conference at his private residence with the Chairman of the River and Embankment Improvement Society and several others, to discuss urgent matters with regard to the recent floods.

The Home Office has bought 6,000 blankets and quantities of beddings from the War Office and elsewhere. This beddings is being apportioned among those sufferers who are sick or crowded in refugees.

The agricultural products of the eastern part of Japan have been much damaged by the recent floods, while those of the Kwansai district have been destroyed by swarms of parasites and other noxious insects. The damage in Kyoto-fu is reported to be most serious, Shimane and Ehime prefectures coming next.

A tunnel near Okitsu on the Tokaido line suddenly collapsed about 8 a.m. on Saturday, so that the traffic is being carried on by means of a single track.

A report from Gumma prefecture says that owing to landslides which occurred on the 12th instant, the whole building of the Nishimaki Preliminary School was buried and remained in that state for six days. Two teachers and a servant were also entombed and were not rescued until the 17th, when the rescue party dug them out. All three were alive but none could speak. What impressed the men of the rescue party was that one of the half-dying teachers was grasping firmly in his hand a roll of the Imperial Edict.

Tuesday, August 23.

According to the latest investigations made by the Home Department, the casualties and damage caused by the recent floods in various prefectures are as follows:—

Railway traffic between Tokyo and Aomori was almost entirely restored on the 21st instant. The only broken sections are Abiko-Torite (about one cho on foot), Matsushima-Kashima (connected by ferry-boat), and Semine-Nitta (some 10 cho on foot). However the Railway Board connecting steamer Unegaka Maru will still continue for the present to ply between Yokohama and Aomori. The steamer will leave Yokohama at 5 p.m. to-day for her northern destination.

The recent floods will cause a heavy loss to the national treasury, estimated at over 20,000,000 yen. The resources, on the other hand, for the coming fiscal year amount to 45,000,000 yen or thereabouts, so that it has become necessary to make a great change in the Government's estimates.

According to the Railway Board report dated the 22nd instant, railway traffic was still suspended at the following sections:—

North-eastern Main Line:—Kurihashi-Nakata (8 cho on foot), Shiraishi-Ogawara (12 cho on foot), Matsushima-Semine (19 miles on foot and by boat), and Nitta-Ishikoshi.

Joban Line:—Abiko-Torite (about 1 cho bridge on foot).

Takasaki and Shinyetsu Lines:—Shinmachi-Kuragano (takes about half an hour by boat), Iizuka-Annaka (3 miles on foot), and Isobe-Karuizawa (on foot).

Oou Line:—Niwaita-Akaiwa (15 cho on foot).

Narita Line:—Kobayashi-Angui (takes about forty minutes by boat).

Tobu Line:—Kawamata-Datebayashi (takes 2 hours by boat) and Kameido-Kitasenju.

REPARIAN IMPROVEMENTS IN JAPAN.

An interview is reported with Mr. Kondo, of the Home Office, in which that gentleman gives some very interesting information.

The improvements in water courses contemplated involve an outlay of 58,000,000 yen, and the plan is to divide this expense over a period of 17 years. Mr. Kondo states, however, that the country is visited almost every year by a flood of greater or less magnitude, and estimates that the yearly damage approximates 10,000,000 yen. With this estimate as a basis Mr. Kondo points out the great saving which would accrue if a loan were effected and the work done at once. This seems very reasonable and only emphasizes the fact that a government is properly only a great business institution, and must be run on good business principles. There are few great business men who have not learned, from sad experience, the fact that it always pays to provide fully for internal improvements before attempting expansion. When the internal affairs of a business institution are all in working order, with all its intricate clerical machinery thoroughly systematized and smoothly running, then any expansion will be solid and sure, but when a business firm attempts to reach out too far and to cover the whole commercial world at once, it may well be compared to carpenters who build a great heavy building on an improper foundation.

A SMART PIECE OF LANDING AND CUSTOMS WORK.

One hears frequently complaints about the delay in getting goods through the local Customs, in which process the Customs and Shipping Companies play a game of battledore and shuttlecock with the responsibility in the case. But the following instance of landing cargo would be hard to beat anywhere in a Far Eastern port.

The steamer Diomed (Messrs. Butterfield & Swire, Agents), arrived at this port last Thursday evening. An automobile which she had on board for a local resident, was landed the next day and passed through the Customs, in ample time to allow the owner to ride home in her at 5 p.m. Both the Shipping Company and the local Customs are justly entitled to put this feather in their respective caps.

SENTIMENT OR REASON?

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

One need not tell the readers of The Japan Mail that the fascination of Japan, to a student of the Japanese, increases with the years. The mastery of the facts may be pleasant or painful, but even after this labor has been at least fairly entered upon, there comes the pleasure of gathering the philosophy of the facts. Despite all the tendency to personal error, to subjective or objective mistakes, there is keen delight in interpreting the given facts and in forming a philosophy of the subject which the mere accumulation of data cannot give.

Certainly all readers abroad owe a debt of gratitude to the Japan Mail, to its editor and contributors, to the management that thinks it worth while to present on the pages of the paper what in time has mounted to a vast thesaurus of choice information, and to the writer of the Summary who gives us results of his examination of the religious, philosophical and popular literature produced by the native-born Japanese. Surely the time has come when, in searching for the truth, one ought to take very little into consideration the mere feelings of the Japanese. Popularity or unpopularity, the danger of their displeasure, or the hope of tokens of their approval ought to have nothing to do with the expression of one's opinion about Japanese history, literature, religion or national traits. Not only is this the case from the point of view of ideals and ethics, but, unless I greatly mistake, the Japanese, in the long run, prefer the truth-speaker to the mere flatterer, provided they are sure that he speaks as a friend and not as an enemy. I have in my possession a most valued letter from the late General Kodama, Chief of Staff, in which he urges that the full truth concerning Japan be spoken. No one saw more clearly than he how imperative was the necessity of Japan's building on the unshakeable foundation of reality.

Sentiment is a capital thing for the arousing of emotion that leads to action and helps to duty, but in this age of the world, when the nations tend to form one family, it is the child obedient to reason rather than to sentiment who will succeed best in the struggle for life. What Lord Salisbury said of living and dying nations is to the point. In the fierce competition of civilizations, only those which are based on science and reason can survive. Matthew Arnold has shown that the gifted race called the Celtic, while superb in its imagination and potent in the spirit which it has infused in literature, has never wrought out a durable civilization. Of Celtic gifts and graces, there is not space here to speak, but one looks vainly in history to discover any great and enduring Celtic social or political structures that have either given man, in his career, a firmer standing ground or has inspired him to nobler flights. If the Japanese, with all their unquestioned abilities, are basing their civilization on sentiment, they are sure to go under in the long run. If they are basing their civilization on science and right reason, their progress will be permanent and their best traditions of success already won are sure. If they, like the Koreans, wallow in sentiment and find their strength in a notion of matchless antiquity or in a subjective conceit of superiority—and certainly the old Korean did not lack in this respect—then they are bound sooner or later, to go the way of Korea or Poland. How frightfully has China suffered in the past from a conceit that seemed cased in boiler iron:

Now in these United States, with their vast territory, varied races and nationalities from all over the world, we have a wonderful laboratory of humanity. One who moves around somewhat can study the peculiarities of these many varieties of men and perhaps see why it is that some of them furnish a very high per cent. of men and women of ability, while others furnish few, the mass of them remaining ordinary and but slightly effective for the work of civilization. Not to mention names, even of nationalities, which might stir up the very feelings, which as we desire to show, do hinder the operation of reason, let us note the facts by algebraic formulae. A. P., for example, will tell you to your face, that no one can appreciate the history, or literature, or art, or achievements of the P. country unless he is himself a P. Another one asseverates that unless you are an I you can have no conception whatever of the grandeur and beauty of I scenery, poetry, delicacy of taste, or "that long and glorious history which every I knows is based on solid facts,"—though every critical scholar knows it is pure mythology.

To come to reality, we have all heard the story of the young man from the heather while at Oxford, who wrote a thesis to prove that Shakespeare was a native of the land of Bobbie Burns. When, however the examiners of his paper could find no satisfying data or arguments, the young man, after twitting his superiors about not being able to appreciate Scottish arguments, answered, "Well, we all know that Shakespeare had intellect enough to be a Scotchman." Even at the great dinners ("$10.00 a plate") of the national, state and regional societies in cosmopolitan New York (which is a city in America rather than an American city) one is tickled at the activity of what the Dutch call "wind trade," when New Englander, Dutchman, Huguenot, Quaker, Scion of F.F.V. or Carolinian from the south, or Georgian Louisianan or Texan tell their auditors. The after-dinner orators apparently imagine that they are dealing with the plain and unvarnished facts—that is, of a kind which none but special hearers, when well filled with Delmonico's bounties and of Waldorf's dainties and with their veins warmed with wines of several sorts can discern. According to the mental climate you are in you will get a special version of American history. You will learn that everything good in the United States came over in the Mayflower, or descended like holy oil from the brow of the Puritan. The Quaker will give you the idea that William Penn was, in the elegant language of our ex-President Roosevelt, "the whole shooting match." The Huguenot derives all grace and charm from Rochelle and sunny France. As for the Dutchman, he beats all creation. He ascends from tulip beds below the level of the ocean and soars in aeroplanes of eloquence toward the zenith. He gives you to understand that there would have been no United States of America without the New Netherlanders and dear old Patria. We forbear to speak about what is said at the societies of St. George, St. Andrews, St. Patrick, and among the sons of dear old Wallia, or those who drink Munich beer or eat macaroni with sweet memories.

Now, to say nothing of Englishmen and other level-headed people, we Americans have at least the sense of humour. We can make allowance for the delightful egotism and exaggeration that come from sentiment. We can even acknowledge the tremendous value and power of aroused emotion in time of need. But,—to make our application,—much, if not the larger bulk of what in Japan passes for science, sober truth, and reality, is manifestly so based on pure sentimentalism that we wonder that the Japanese do not often smile at themselves. Perhaps there is a good deal of the kind of laughing that Cicero speaks of when the old flamens and other Roman priests looked each other in the face.

Looking back, over forty-four years acquaintance with the Japanese, being almost constantly among them, having them as honoured friends and pleasant acquaintances, and keeping at least fairly familiar with the trend of thought in their writings, books, and publications—apart from my own great indebtedness to the pages of the Japan Mail, I cannot feel but that the Japanese are making a serious mistake in appealing so much to sentiment and so little to reason. The time has gone by, or, if not already gone, is very near going, when the mere fact that Japan is picturesque and her people interesting, or that even by borrowing Western forces and sciences and their applications, and methods of education and government they have been able to humble China of ancient mind and colonial Russia of medieval mind, will avail. Japan is bound to show the world that she is governed by reason and not by sentiment and that in intellect she is full-grown and not yet living largely in that sentimentalism which we associate with children, feminism, or with those who know little of the world of intellect. From the point of view gained simply by a study of the writings and speeches of living Japanese, on the subject of history, philosophy, literature, personal courage and religion of Japan, it seems to me, as it seems to so many others, that not reason but sen imant rules in Nippon.

I need not mention either the names of petty writers, or of average newspaper penmen or orators. I could quote from five or six among the most eminent men of all Japan, and if I were to submit their opinions to either a jury of twelve, or to a supreme court bench of seven, of those who by long acquaintance with the facts may be considered the best fitted to judge, they would declare, I am sure, that the Japanese are governed by sentiment and not by reason.

Take the one field of history. Prominent Japanese are continually talking about "their twenty-five hundred years of written history,"—which is bosh. They tell us of things too sacred for a foreigner even to want to meddle with, as certainties, which lack all foundation in fact and truth. They do not yet permit full academic liberty,—unless it has been granted since the last mail from Japan. The Japanese know that they have no written history ante-dating the fifth century. Indeed, it is almost a common-place among critical students of the history of Dai Nippon that for anything previous to the fifth century, whatever is most official in its statements is the least likely to be true; for it has a dogmatic and sentimental purpose, which purpose is less the idea of the exercise of reason than of bolstering a dogma.

When it comes to the valuation of Japanese literature and philosophy it is hard to tell whether the opinions of Japanese critics evoke more of sympathy or admiration, or merriment. Very profound and sincere may be our appreciation of the verse, the poetry, the belles-lettres, the historiography, or the philosophical thought of the Japanese people. They who have lived among them and honestly tried to drink at the fountains and not merely sip of the meadow water, praise and enjoy. When however we hear the Japanese blowing conch and sounding the Alpine horn to tell us that in these fields of mind and pen the Japanese are superior to all world, or to most of the nations, we cannot but smile and pray for more wisdom and less conceit for our Japanese friends.

Westerners have to submit to the judgment of other nations and very valuable indeed is the penetrating criticism of scholars in other lands. We Americans, for example can honestly say that we have outgrown that condition suggested by veal and lamb that once made us so frightfully sensitive to the strictures of Mitford, Dickens and De Tocqueville. As a rule we do not now care half as much for the remarks, either caustic or honied, which come from the globe-trotter or the casual visitor, as we care for a mosquito bite. Nevertheless when a serious and penetrating critic, like Ambassador Bryce at Washington or Professor Münsterberg at Harvard, speaks, we listen gratefully. When the French, Spanish, Russian, Italian, and may we not say, Japanese thinker and observer sees something else beside what is visible from a car window, or the only half American New York city, and show that they know something of our history, we welcome them, and their judgments. In such cases, their books, even when costly, are sold by tens of thousands among us. Furthermore, although the very composition of our nation, made up so largely of those who, of necessity, must take their opinions chiefly from newspapers and too often from demagogues and walking delegates, make us a people subject to gusts of passion and tidal waves of sentiment, yet that we increasingly live by reason rather than conceit is shown by the kind of men we choose for the highest offices. This is seen especially in the Supreme Court, a court that is governed wholly by reason, and which, in the last analysis, is the real government of the United States.

Furthermore, we challenge contradiction from those who know, to the statement that, while even the government of Great Britain is subject to infirmity, yet the standard horror of the average trusted man in the British isles is sentimental agitation or legislation.

Space requires me to bring this letter to a close, but I must notice the curious, I will not say childish notion that, some-how or another, the Japanese are the bravest people in the world, that their valor and courage have no equal in history; that Yamato Damashii, Bushido, etc. furnish what is absolutely matchless in human society. Now it would be absurd in me even to so much as attempt to make profession of my admiration of Japanese courage and valour, which I have not only personally seen and felt in the days when the ronins and assassins were all around me, and which I know, of, as all the world does, as manifested in recent wars; and have praised in forty years of lecturing and writing; but, to talk of this trait in her soldier as though it were unknown beyond Japan, is to one who was a soldier in General Grant's army and saw something of both Confederate and Federal valour savours of rather raw conceit in the boaster.

I can understand something of Japanese feelings both of the right and wrong sort, because certainly no nation in modern times, possibly not even in the history of the world, has been so much the object of flattery as Nippon. Now if the Japanese live by reason instead of conceit they must surely perceive, and I believe that many thousands of them do know it, that this flattery is a calamity rather than a blessing, a liability rather than an asset.

I have not space to speak of religion, yet in this, one would judge from a good deal of Japanese writing that the natives of Nippon do not need the same medicines for the soul, the same profound discipline of the spirit, the same constant supply of old truth made new in life, which the great nations, through their great men, have confessed. Many Japanese would have us believe that traditional sentiment, certain unique qualities, and the moral make up which they possess are sufficient basis for morality in Japan. As for the necessity for anything that can be called religion—in the western sense of the word—it is seriously questioned by leading Japanese whether any such thing is needed. Even Christianity must not only cast off its historical development, but must, even as to its original features, be Japanized before it can commend itself to the heart and soul of Nippon. And this from a country and a people that have never produced a single great religious genius of towering supremacy, this from a people that has never developed a religion beyond what all scholars would call a rudimentary stage! This from a people whose morality is, to say the least, hardly yet accepted by the world at large as lofty! Indeed, we who love the Japanese, do not like the shakings of the head, the curious smiles and the pitying laughs which greet the suggestion that the Japanese are a highly moral people.

Yet who that knows the Japanese past and present but sees in them a possibility of change for the better and steady progress? W.E.G.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

St. Petersburg, August 4.

The Emperor and Empress and the Imperial family returned to Peterhof yesterday from their cruise in the Baltic and will continue in residence there as usual during the period of the reviews and manoeuvres of troops at the neighbouring Summer Camp at Krasnoe Selo. Among the first officials to visit Peterhof after the Imperial arrival were the Minister of War, General Sukhomlinov and the Governor-General of Finland, General Sein.

The general policy of the world is now governed and steadied by the Anglo Franco Russo-Japanese Coalition, in which the two middle and the two extreme terms are bound together by formal offensive and defensive alliances. The strength of this Coalition lies in the fact that any and all Powers whose claims, pretensions, sins or ambitions tend in any way to encroach upon the interests of any member of the Coalition, never know how far they may proceed with safety, that is, without causing the Coalition to crystallise into a still more formidable shape. This well-founded apprehension has a marvellously steadying influence in international politics everywhere. The peoples occupying more than one-half the land area of the globe and possessing, so far, the command of all the seas, are banded together not against any other combination of forces or single Powers, but in defence of the common desire for peace. The combination is so young that a long life might reasonably be expected to lie before it. At the same time the lessons of history in all time point to the necessity of perseverance in the work of preparing to defend in arms, by land and sea, the status in quo over that half the habitable globe possessed and a very great deal more that has interest for the four Powers of the Coalition. It is necessary to go back to the history of the ancient world to find such a huge array of force on one side. It is certainly an advance in culture for nations to combine to "preserve the peace," i.e. to police the turbulent peoples of the world. But there is no escaping from the logic of the argument that that which demands special measures of defence is already seriously threatened. Russia and Japan, at any rate, have no doubt about the true line of future policy, to equip and maintain as efficient a fighting force as the utmost resources of the State will allow.

Russia has scored another success in her Far Eastern policy, this time with China. It takes the form of a three years' agreement covering the Sungari, Ussuri and Amur Rivers. The exact terms of the arrangement have not yet been published, but of its significance no doubt can be entertained. Russia by this agreement once more enters into the relations of neighbourly friendliness towards the Celestial Kingdom which obtained up to the last decade of the past century, before the incursion into Far Eastern affairs of new Powers. As a further set back to the attempts of Germany and the United States of America to excite in China a national feeling of hostility to Russia, the new instrument is warmly welcomed by the Russian press. "Foreigners in China are temporary guests: Russia is an age-old neighbour and friend. It is hoped that the new agreement indicates a return on the part of China to the traditional relations of good-neighbourliness, and that China is disposed to free herself from the whisperings of interested third parties" says the Novoe Vremya.

The speculators in the great oil boom here have been considerably alarmed by rumours that a new law is about to be brought in by the Ministry of Finance which will have the effect of preventing the foreigner exploiting the mineral wealth of Russia. I understand that the Russian Government has no objection whatever, indeed rather welcomes, the introduction of foreign capital to enable the latent wealth of Russia to be worked, but most strongly objects to the speculative character of certain recent undertakings put upon the London market. Something like fifteen millions sterling have been sunk, I am informed, in the latest "boom," which has been so worked in this country that the likelihood of dividends ever accruing to nine-tenths of the investors is extremely dubious. Of course, if it is possible to lay the blame of failure upon some "new law" laid down by the Russian Government, the wire-pullers of the boom will save their face. But Russian laws are not nowadays sprung upon the world unawares, they have to pass the Duma and the Upper House and receive the sanction of the Emperor, a procedure of some length. The rumours, however, will be useful if they prevent the success of the attempts shortly to be made to resuscitate the waning belief of investors in the latest "openings" for British capital in Russia.

Strikes and lock-outs are reported in the textile trade of the Moscow district involving already about five thousand hands. Too much importance does not attach, however, to these labour disputes in Russia at this time of year. The Russian factory "hand" is still for the most part a peasant landed proprietor, and readily seizes upon any excuse to get away from his work at the mill or to withdraw his women-folk and sons, in order to help gather in the harvest at home. The Nizhni-Novgorod Annual Great Fair is reported to have opened this year rather better than was anticipated.

The recurring cases of late of bankruptcy and suicide among the class of small private "banking-offices" whose principal clients are the small shop-keeper, have moved the Prefect to issue an order preventing such establishments in the future from dealing in any kind of lottery tickets. The lottery, nominally for some of the thousand and one "charities" constantly being promulgated, is to the common Russian very much what racing is to the lower classes in England. These minor "banking-offices" appear to have done an enormous business in lottery gambling with their clients, and then aspiring to the higher speculation of the Exchange on their gains, go bankrupt, leaving nothing behind for their wretched creditors except the "furniture of the office." And the offices are neither more nor less than little kennels conveniently situated for the practice of the money-changer, in which capacity most of these small private "banking-office" people originally began life.

The Russian Vice-Consul at Hama & Homs (Syria), M. Shelkovnikov, has arrived in St. Petersburg after a remarkably instructive journey from his post. He left May 28th last and travelled on horseback through the entire breadth of Asia Minor from South West to North East, arriving at Tiflis on July 15th last. With the exception of some slight adventures in Kurdistan, M. Shelkovnikov found the whole country traversed in his ride of over eight hundred miles, perfectly tranquil. Kurdistan was disturbed and a Turkish detachment was marching to punish a tribe that had cut to pieces a Turkish gendarmery post.

The Emperor has reviewed at the camp of Krasnoe Selo some six hundred "boy scouts," known as the "Play-troops of the Semenov Regiment of the Guard."

The aurochs, that huge European bison of mediaeval times, is well preserved in the Imperial forests at Eelovezh, where occasional hunts are allowed. It is also found in some districts of Kuban, and measures for the preservation of the remaining specimens there are to be immediately taken.

The "Novoe Vremja" is astounded at the pretensions ascribed to the United States of North America in the matter of Liberia, and asks whether the States of Europe any longer recognise the Monroe Doctrine, which, if it has any force at all, should in all fairness be two-edged. If the United States of North America arrogate to themselves the task of settling the destinies of the New World, at least they must abstain from any attempt to meddle with those of the older regions of the world.

Over two hundred fishing boats have been swamped and sunk by a typhoon at the mouth of the Amur River and hundreds of lives have been lost.

The Eighteenth International Peace Congress has opened at Stockholm. The Russian Section is presided over by Prince Paul Dolgorukov who is accompanied by the member of the Duma, Efremov. Among the items on the programme is "Women and the work of peace."

The temperature here is now daily over 70 F., and the "sporting events" include the playing of cup matches at football in this torrid climate!

The cholera in Russia is assuming daily more formidable proportions. Hitherto notwithstanding the enormous aggregate of deaths from cholera in previous epidemics practically no interference with commerce and industry has been caused. Now however serious consequences have ensued for one of the most important Russian industries, coal-mining in the Donets Region. Nearly three thousand cases of cholera with over a thousand deaths, among the colliers have caused a panic: the miners are dispersing over the country and work threatens to stop entirely. The country districts are absolutely without means to cope with any epidemic like cholera, and the dispersal of thousands of colliers from the cholera-stricken region will carry the scourge far and wide into the villages. The common Russian has still to be compelled by force to undertake even the most elementary sanitary precautions, and it is only in large centres where the arm of the Government is strong that these compulsory steps can be taken. In the villages it is impossible even for the Government to do anything adequate to the situation. The muzhik believes that disease comes from God and is therefore inevitable: that cholera in particular is a fad of learned men who, failing a sufficiency of cases to duly enrich them, do not hesitate to scientifically infect whole districts with the cholera poison. As the people have no clear idea—their besotted ignorance seems to make it impossible to convey to them any clear idea, even in such a centre as St. Petersburg—of what cholera is and whence it comes, they seize with the avidity of superstition upon any idle tale. Here a harmless botanist collecting specimens of the flora of a district is "moved on" by an angry crowd beyond the confines of their lands: there a new-comer quenching his thirst at a village well is threatened with death for "poisoning the water": disinfecting operations, which include sprinkling of yards and dwellings, even in the capitals, are resented, the people openly grumbling that the "doctors are sowing cholera": a hospital is to the common people of Russia an object of tenfold more dread than any prison. Cases of cholera have to be sought for vigilantly and interned in hospitals by force. It is obvious that no Government in the world is equipped for combat with an epidemic disease like cholera under such conditions as obtain in Russia, and terrible as the tale told by the published statistics is there can be little doubt that it tells only a tithe of the truth. The lower officials of the ruling hierarchy are in the rural districts drawn from the ranks of the ignorant, and from such no adequate assistance can be reasonably expected. Those who have visited Russian villages after the cholera has passed over them relate stories that can only be paralleled in modern times by those of African travellers in similar circumstances. The best efforts of the Government in such cases hardly go beyond the task of disposing, not with decency but with safety, of the dead that lie huddled about everywhere. Ignorance goes hand in hand with superstition, and while the common people look upon sanitary precautions as a useless nuisance they will not only listen to but even pay money to hear all sorts of curious items of ancient folklore and modern quackery. The doctor and his assistants often go in fear of their lives but the village "wise woman" or the local "wizard" are persons both feared and honoured. There is a custom—to name only one of hundreds such—in the villages in many parts of Russia to bathe a sick person and then return to the village well the used water: the belief being that the disease will thus be divided equally among all, and none will feel the burden of a so minutely divided sickness at all troublesome for his health! Naturally the community is not always asked whether it is willing to relieve the sick person of his disease. In the case of cholera the effects of this one superstition alone may be only too well imagined. Yet I never heard that the sources of water supply anywhere in Russia, outside the towns, are ever guarded. Happily the absence of baths large enough for an adult prevent the application of this outrageous custom except in the case of children, who can be bathed in the family cooking vessels if need be. Until the well-being of the Russian muzhik is levelled up to a decent standard it is utterly impossible for any government to dream of stamping out a disease that has now been rife in Russia for four years in succession. It is natural to ask what must be the state of the villages when the capital of empire, St. Petersburg has still to wait at least fifteen years for a pure water-supply and a sewerage system?

A FABLE FROM THE FAR NORTH

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

Every country has its own particular fables and legends either connected with its peculiar conditions of climate, the contour of its territory or the animals which are indigenous to it. So in the far north many fables exist which have for their subjects, Snow, Ice, Frost etc. and among the animals the Reindeer, Elk, Wolf, Bear, and Fox. In Finland the two latter frequently form the dramatis personæ, and are most consistent in living up to their characters, the Bear invariably being gruff and hearty in his manners, straight-forward in all his dealings and unsuspicious of guile alike in his friends and enemies. The Fox, on the contrary, is full of guile and possessed of that proverbial low cunning with which he is credited in all countries, which, by the way, proves that the theory that environment and climate are the main factors in the forming of character is a fallacy. Among the many ingenious stories which have been handed down from remote periods of this seemingly ill-assorted couple, the following, which was told me, during a stay in Finland, by a native of the country, seems worth recounting. I must explain that the definite article is always used by the Finn when referring to a character in these fables, the idea being, I suppose, that the Bear and the Fox are the originals of the species.

One very cold day in winter the Bear and the Fox were fishing together, in a lake, through a hole in the ice. They had had fairly good sport and had landed several fair-sized fish when the Bear, by accident, dropped the bait and line with which they had been fishing and it sank beyond their reach. "You clumsy idiot," said the Fox, "Now, look what you've done! We can't fish any more to-day. That was the only line and bait we'd got. You'd better go back home and fetch another one while I wait here and look after what few fish we have already caught!"

"Go yourself," said the Bear. "You can run faster than I. If I go, it will be too dark to fish by the time I come back. Besides, you would probably catch cold waiting so long; but for me, it doesn't matter, my fur is thick."

"Yes," answered the Fox, with a contemptuous sniff, "and so is your head. The first one who came along with some plausible tale would get all our fish from you. Softy!" And the Fox turned away in contempt, walking round the Bear in an accurate circle.

"Well then, let's share the fish and go home," suggested the Bear, with a grunt, "it'll soon be dark and we're only wasting time. I'm not going to fetch a new line and you say you won't, so what's the good of arguing?"

"An exceedingly well-thought-out and brilliant proposal, my friend," retorted the Fox with a sneer. "If you can tell me how we are going to divide five fish equally, you're smarter than you look."

The Bear, naturally, felt rebuked and crushed, and hung his head, looking particularly stupid, even for him, mentally resolving not to make any more suggestions to the Fox in future.

During the silence that ensued, the Fox thoughtfully described correct circles in the snow round the Bear, pausing now and then to glance at his discomfited friend. Suddenly he came to a halt behind the Bear and said, excitedly, "How silly of me. Why didn't I think of it before? The very thing; we'll use your tail for a bait. As you yourself say, your fur is thick and you won't feel the cold, so all you have to do is to sit over the hole in the ice with your tail in the water. When a fish gets hold of it, jump up suddenly!—and there you are, don't you know!" To think of how we have been wasting time arguing when we might have been fishing! We'll commence at once. Just wait a minute while I break the thin ice which has formed while we have been wrangling. Now sit down. A little more this way—that's right!"

The Bear grunted several times in a very low key and looked rather dissatisfied and uncertain, but nevertheless allowed himself to be directed and coaxed into the exact position required, the Fox inserting his tail with some difficulty into the hole in the ice, which was barely large enough.

"We shall soon get a bite," said the Fox, and became very genial and talked in the most brilliant manner on a variety of subjects. In fact, the Bear had never known him to be so charming.

The Bear however at last began to get cold and cramped through being so long in one position.

"I'm going to get up, bite or no bite," said the Bear losing all patience; and attempted to rise, but found it impossible.

The Fox pretended to be very excited and capered round the Bear exclaiming, "You've got a bite. That's what it is. Can't you pull it out? It must be a big one."

The Bear made prodigious efforts, getting into every conceivable position, but was unable to withdraw his tail and to land the supposed fish; and at last, baffled, out of breath, and with tears in his eyes he gave up the attempt, sat up and endeavoured to keep calm and think the matter out.

"Look here," said the Fox, "I'll tell you what! I can't wait till you land your fish; much as I'd like to; so I'll take the five fishes we have caught up to now, for my share, and you can have your big fish all to yourself! Good-bye! see you in the morning," and before the Bear hardly realized it, he was off.

Early the next morning the Fox issued cautiously from the forest at the edge of the lake, and seeing the coast clear, made for the hole where he and his friend had fished the day before. "Ah," soliloquized the Fox, as he caught sight of a lump of fur protruding from the ice in the centre of which was something red, "That awkward Bear has again lost his bait."

And that is why the Bear has no tail to-day.

CHINA NEWS AND NOTES.

EDUCATION.

With agitation from so many sources, it would be remarkable if China did not awaken, and this appears to be the case, along all lines. The prevailing development recorded in current publications however, seems to be in the matter of education.

One of the best expressions on this subject comes from a Chinese teacher. He says:

Finding that guns and warships have utterly failed to relieve her from sinking into a hopeless condition, China turns her attention to the improvement of her national education, on which, it is recognized, the salvation of the country chiefly depends. By the encouragement of the Government and with efforts of the people, primary and middle schools, colleges and universities have sprung into existence throughout the length and breadth of the Empire within the short space of a few years. This rapid development of educational institutions is surely a welcome movement.

With a view to placing the national education on a sound basis, the Government has created the Board of Education, which is entrusted with the duty of encouraging education and supervising the general work of the institutions. The Board has indeed done a great deal in the way of drawing up rules and regulations for the guidance of both teachers and pupils and of deciding upon text books and curricula for schools of all grades. The Board, fearing that the institutions may not carry out their work in accordance with the fixed rules and regulations, has appointed Resident Chancellors to the various provinces whose duty it is to encourage and supervise educational matters within their respective jurisdictions, and it also appoints General Chancellors whose duty is the same as that of Resident Chancellors with the exception that they travel from one place to another and they do not stay at a place for years. If we peruse the curricula decided upon by the Board for schools of all grades and estimate the amount of work done by the Board in proportion to the amount of time, we cannot deny that the steps taken in China toward a national education are highly satisfactory.

CHINESE STUDENTS SAIL FOR AMERICA.

The United States Government certainly showed wisdom and diplomacy in its treatment of the surplus of the Boxer Indemnity Fund, which, it appears, is to be used to send Chinese students to American educational institutions. Such a course cannot fail to be of mutual benefit. The following item gives the account of the departure of seventy students for America.

During the week the detachment of students selected by examination in Peking for a course of study in the United States under the Boxer Indemnity Scholarship scheme has arrived in Shanghai and a fine intelligent-looking set of youths they are too. The arrangements for their stay in Shanghai have been in the hands of H.E., Y.C. Tong who has been especially charged with this duty by the Waiwu Pu and who has been assisted in every possible way by Dr. Amos P. Wilder, Consul-General for the United States here. Dr. Wilder has had his hands very full, as several of his junior staff are away on vacations and quite a number of unusual matters have had to be dealt with, but his energy is equal to anything, and his fruitful suggestions for the youths' comfort have considerably reduced Taotai Tong's difficulties and anxieties. The party, which consists of some seventy Government students as well as a few private ones, will leave Shanghai next Tuesday by the P. M. S. S. China, accompanied by Taotai Tong as far as Yokohama and thenceforth under the care of Mr. Hu Ting-fuh who will see the party to the U. S. A. and will supervise the allocation of the students to various educational institutions.

THE CHINESE QUEUE.

It took a long time to get a start toward the removal of the Chinese Wall about the old City of Shanghai, but it would appear this is now to be accomplished. So with the queue. For a long time papers have agitated on this subject, it being realized that the cutting off of the queue would symbolize the change from many old time ideas and customs. It appears, however, from reports in recent papers that definite steps are now being taken and that this too may become a reality.

The question of the removal of the queue has again been attracting attention in Peking. It will be remembered that H.E. Wu Ting-fang recently memorialized the Throne advocating the abolition of the queue on several grounds, and it was reported some time ago that Prince Tsai Tao, whilst on his tour abroad as Army Commissioner, had telegraphically memorialized in the same sense. It appears that since his return to Peking the Prince has again brought the matter to the notice of the Prince Regent who is in favour of the proposal, as are most of the high officials in Peking.

PROTECTION OF FOREIGNERS.

The following paragraph on this subject taken from a native paper is self-explanatory and witnesses another of the satisfactory developments of the last year.

It is well known that when for any reason a disturbance takes place in the interior there is a tendency for the lawless to vent their anger on the foreigner, although the cause of the trouble may not be anything at all connected with foreigners. Invariably such diversion of the popular anger is described as an outbreak of anti-foreignism, though those living on the spot are quite well aware that the anti-foreignism is incidental and not at all of the essence of the disturbance. Cases in which there is genuine anti-foreign feeling are all alike put down to the one cause, and officials are blamed for not affording protection to the foreigner. The Waiwu Pu and the Yuchuan Pu have realized that definite steps need to be taken that local disturbances connected with purely local affairs, as well as really anti-foreign demonstrations, may not result in injury to foreigners, and it has been decided therefore that in future viceroys and governors are to be held responsible for the despatch of sufficient forces to protect any foreigners residing in or near the seat of any disturbance. The same officials are also held responsible for keeping open the lines and means of communication, such as telegraphs, railways, and shipping. The decision should be very effective in fixing responsibility and as a preventive measure.

THE PASSING OF THE JUNK FROM CHINA SEAS.

Many old-timers in the Far East have felt a sense of personal loss in the change from the good old easy days to the conditions of bustle and hurry which are coming to prevail, almost as much as in Western countries. Of course the "new times" bring new luxuries, comforts, and pleasures, but, with all these, there is a loss of something which we can hardly describe—something which made the East call us back whenever we went home.

A correspondent in China voices this feeling in a recent article under the above heading.

The advent of foreign trade in China has certainly changed the old order of things very seriously. In olden days there was little or no interport trade, and what there was was carried on in a somewhat haphazard manner by means of junks which pursued their leisurely way along the coast, taking sometimes months to reach their destinations.

"Come day, go day, God send a holiday," was their motto, and time was no object to them. Steamers have altered all this, and the old and picturesque junk is becoming a thing of the past. Steamers are rapidly running them off the coast. One line of perhaps the most celebrated junks existed in the early eighties—Tientsin to Canton. The junks went down in the N.E., and returned to Tientsin on the first burst of the S.W., monsoon. Now and again one hears old lowdahs spinning yarns about them and telling tales of their individual prowess when attacked, as they frequently were by pirates, but the stories, like the junks, are becoming mere memories.

These old-time junks, navigated with the rudest and roughest implements, did an astonishing trade sometimes reaching to far off Arabia and the Persian Gulf. In the South, a certain amount of the old time romance is still extant. Junks still leave Amoy year by year bound for the Nicobars, and the islands that may be called the Dutch Archipelago. They coast most of the way and set their courses as their fore-fathers did for generations.

Fukien still sends a few junks, but the death knell of the junk trade was sounded when the first steamer ploughed the China Sea. It brought in its wake a condition of things hitherto undreamt of, a sense of rush, hustle and worry never before heard of. Where months were concerned, now a few days only suffice. Railways, steamers, and improved communications have conferred their undoubted blessings on people who are gradually educating themselves up to them.

Probably the first serious shock to the status quo was the opening of the Suez Canal which put far off Tientsin within two months of England. The trans-American lines cut in and shortened time and distance. Now our mails can be delivered in England within fourteen days of postage here, by the Siberian Railway. The effects of these rapid changes have not been wholly good for either Chinese or foreign trade. The margin of profit grows less and less, while competition grows keener and more wearing.

LAWLESSNESS.

With her advancing education, how long will China permit the present state of lawlessness? Each week brings its quota of items like the following:

HEAVY RANSOM DEMANDED.

A few days since we reported that some robbers had, after looting property from six houses in Wang Kong in the Sanyui district, carried off six of the inhabitants to be ransomed by the clan. Among these was the infant child of a widow. They also carried off a young slave girl to look after the infant. The robbers have written to the heads of the clan and demanded the sum of $3000. The people of the clan are busy trying to raise the money for they are in dread that unless it is paid on the specified date that the lives of those who have been kidnapped will be forfeited.

COLOWAN PIRATES AGAIN.

It is understood that pirates have sent a threatening letter to the advocate, Mr. Constancio da Silva, of Macao, who informed the Government of the whereabouts of the pirates.

The letter is said to contain a threat to have him and all the members of his family beheaded.

PIRATES AT KAMCHUK.

The Canton correspondent of the "South China Morning Post" telegraphed on July 25:—The passenger boats plying between Hochunn, of Sanwui district, and Sainam, are always subject to attacks by robbers and pirates, in the vicinity of Kamchuk, who open fire on them from the shore whenever they fail to satisfy their blackmailing demands. The boat-owners pay their extortions and consult with them for protection, but the blackmailers are unable to give them any definite period in which their boats can sail to and fro without being molested by the marauding fraternity.

Lest their extortionate demands should be made from time to time without end, all the passenger boats have from this month suspended plying for the time being, and the commercial community find great inconvenience by the suspension of traffic.

PRIESTS SENTENCED TO DEATH.

A missionary writes from the interior as follows:

It is always de capo in China where mal-administration of justice is concerned. I knew of the case of the two priests falsely accused and sentenced to death at Soochow, before a word of it had been seen in the Shanghai papers, and am surprised that the matter has hung on so long. Having been referred to Peking, there is still a chance for the poor wretches though a small one. The case is on all fours with many of the same kind which have come to my notice. How long it will be before Chinese jurisprudence will have purged itself of such incidents Heaven only knows. But till it has, it is evident to all concerned, intelligent natives and foreigners alike, that any talk of the abolition of extraterritoriality would be moonshine. Foreigners could not possibly put themselves into the power of a man who can take two obviously innocent men, torture a "confession" out of them, and then decree their execution!

THE REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENT.

An article written by a native opens with the paragraph printed below. These are the exact discoveries which led to the French Revolution; in fact, to practically every other revolution which has broken down established governments, since the world began.

Recent events have proved once more that when a whole countryside in China feels itself oppressed, the most tyrannical officials are forced to give way. The successful tyranny which we see in China is due to the apathy of some, the self-interest of a few, and the divided counsels and dissensions of the many. But rouse apathy to quickened life, divert the channels of self-interest, weld the diverse and mutually suspicious elements into a homogeneous entity imbued with one idea, and you have a force that can upset, though it may not create, a Government.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The following letter has been addressed by the Foreign Chamber of Commerce of Yokohama to the Acting Mayor, with reference to the Yatozaka road:—

M. SAITO, Esq., August 22nd, 1910.
Acting Mayor Yokohama.

DEAR SIR:—The attention of this Committee has been drawn to the very unsatisfactory condition of the roadway on Yatozaka, due to the manner in which work is being carried on in the removal of earth from the lot below the American Naval Hospital Grounds.

The excavating at this point has been going on for a very considerable time, and is causing great inconvenience to those who are obliged to use the road in question as a thoroughfare. The party responsible for the work has been steadily encroaching upon the roadway with the stones removed from the wall, until the road, which under normal conditions was not of sufficient width for the traffic making use of it, has now been still further narrowed. Further, the position in which the stones are placed has diverted considerable water from the channel above the drain, with the result that the surface of the road has been washed away.

We would respectfully suggest that this work might have been conducted much more expeditiously, and with more regard to the safety and convenience of the public; and even at this late date, we venture to hope that some measures will be taken to minimize the inconvenience and danger complained of.

The Committee feel sure that this grievance will have your prompt attention, and that a speedy remedy will follow.

I have the honour to remain,
Very respectfully yours,
(Signed) D. H. BLAKE,
Chairman.

A SEOUL despatch says that political party called the Il Chin-hoi which has been earnestly advocating the annexation, will be dissolved simultaneously with its realization.

LANGFELDT & CO., LIMITED.

HALF-YEARLY GENERAL MEETING.

The half-yearly general meeting of the shareholders in Messrs. Langfeldt & Co., Ltd., was held at the Company's offices this afternoon.

Mr D. H. Blake was in the chair and Messrs. Bernard, Dentici, Edwards, Fisher, Weinberger, Bengen, Bowden and Torneo were present.

The first business being the passing of the minutes of the last meeting, the Chairman moved that the minutes of the last semi annual meeting be adopted as read. Mr. Fisher seconded and the motion was carried.

In moving the adoption of reports and accounts the Chairman said:—

Gentlemen:—The Report and Accounts have now been in your hands for the prescribed period, and I trust have been found to your entire satisfaction.

The Directors are extremely gratified in being able to present such a favourable statement, and they feel that the Share-holders have cause for congratulation.

The Dividend recommended is the largest we have seen for a number of years, and what is more to the point, it is fully warranted by the condition of the Company's business.

I think the Shareholders will agree that the Directors have been conservative in the handling of the present accounts, for in addition to providing for a dividend at a rate of 12 per cent. per annum, they wrote about 20 per cent. off the Steam Launch account, transferred yen 1,519.84 to Reserve, bringing that account up to the substantial sum of yen 14,500, and carried forward to the next account yen 2,184 63.

Seeing that the Company has emerged from the difficulties it laboured under for so many years, the position of Managing Director was considered no longer necessary, and was abolished last May. This action was taken at the suggestion of Mr. Bernard, who held the position at that time.

The Company's affairs at present are going along very satisfactorily, and it is sincerely to be hoped that we are at the beginning of an era of prosperity.

With these few remarks, I will formally move from the Chair the adoption of the report and accounts, and will ask some gentleman to kindly second the motion.

Mr. Fisher seconded the Chairman's motion and it was unanimously carried.

The Chairman stated that definite warrants for dividends would be issued to-morrow (26th).

Mr. Fisher proposed a vote of thanks to the Directors, Secretary, Manager and his staff.

There being no other business the meeting adjourned.

The semi-annual report and accounts follow:—

The Statement of Assets and Liabilities, and Profit and Loss Account for the half year ended June 30th, 1910, accompany this Report.

The working for the half-year, after providing for general expenses, bad and doubtful debts, and bonus to the Manager, leaves a balance of 10,359.41 yen, from which amount 694.94 yen has been written off Steam-launch, and 1,519.84 yen placed to reserve. The balance remaining is 8,184 63 yen, which the Directors recommend be dealt with as follow:

In payment of a dividend of 6 per cent.
for the half year..... 6,000.00
To be carried forward to next account ... 2,184 63

8,184.63

The Directors feel that the result of the Company's work for the term under review has been highly satisfactory, and that it further emphasizes the wisdom of the reduction of capital.

The services rendered by the Manager and his staff have again been found very efficient, and the Directors have pleasure in recording their appreciation of the co-operation received from the employees of the Company.

There has been no change either in the Directorate or in the foreign staff during the period.

THE HEAVY LOAD OF LOVE.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

Being some passages from a Nô. A humble gardener is consumed with passion for a noble lady. She sends him a packet, beautifully enveloped in brocade, and promises to shew herself to him if he will carry it a thousand times around the garden. But the load is heavier than it seems, the task beyond his strength, and so he dies of grief

CHORUS Though 'tis a heavy load until they meet

Love's porter he 'll become.

GARDENER Who newly treads the path of Love

CHORUS Will at the cross-roads lose his way.

GARDENER O! Fitting name, the Heavy Load of Love, Too great a burden for poor me to bear.

* * * * *

GARDENER Far as the lofty hills beyond my reach,

Deep as the ferried waters my desire.

CHORUS Whether the mountain to scale,

Whether to compass the sea,

Which is the easier, tell me true.

Vain are thy hopes, poor heart, and thou

Low as the dust, that liveth on,

In this inconstant, windy world.

* * * * *

Now his longing something bated,

Comes Evening Glory to reproach

the dew,

And quickly past the golden sunset-time

He will take up the Heavy Load of Love

CARDENER Whate'er its weight, and shall not cast it down.

In China once an archer's arrow pierced

A stone he thought a tiger lying there.

His heart was in his task. Not otherwise

Shall this my Heavy Load seem light to me.

My Lot is humble. I shall not complain.

If I become the slave of Love, and end

My life in servitude and pass away.

* * * * *

Consumed by hopeless love he lies alone

And tosses sleepless on a humble couch,

His arm his pillow, shifts from side to side

This burden that he holds but cannot bear.

O heavy, heavy Load of Love.

[He dies, his spirit enters the Noble Lady, who exclaims].

Love, O! Love.

Do thou not wrench us untimely apart, Love!

Of hopeless longing men have died.

Beware!

So brutal is the Heart of Things.

There is something of the Precious Ridiculous about this which is quite attractive, and the personification of Love is interesting because unusual.

LAUNCHING OF THE LARGEST BATTLESHIP IN THE WORLD.

London, August 21.

Lady Winchester launched the Orion the most powerful battleship in the world, to day.

The Orion has an armament of ten 13.5 inch guns and a displacement of 22,500 tons. She steams 21 knots and carries the new 21-inch torpedoes with a range of four miles.

The Orion cost over £2,000,000.

U.S. POLITICS.

A feature of the split in the Republican ranks in the United States, is that Roosevelt will run as President in 1912, if he does not like the Republican policy which prevails at that time.

MR. ROOSEVELT AND THE NEGRO QUESTION.

London, August 22.

New York.—Mr. Roosevelt has addressed the National Negro Business League on opportunities of advancement for the coloured man. He urged self-help and hope—which, he said, were rare.

Bishop Clinton and Mr. Booker-Washington assured Mr. Roosevelt that the negro element would solidly support whatever promotion, in public life he, Mr. Roosevelt, might seek.

CHOLERA IN RUSSIA.

There have been 7,000 cases of cholera, and 3,000 deaths, in Russia during the past week.

GRECIAN ELECTION.

Later.

Athens.—The election of the Greek National Assembly for the revision of the Constitution is proceeding, so far in the quietest manner.

KAISER OPENS NEW PALACE.

The Kaiser, with his family, the Chancellor and Ministers, opened the new Imperial Palace in Posen. He hoped that the new residential town would be the nursery of German civilization.

ENTERTAINMENT OF "IKOMA'S" OFFICERS BY FRENCH PRESIDENT.

NATIVE DISCONTENT IN GERMAN SOUTH-WEST AFRICA.

The Standard's Berlin correspondent says that Maximilian Harden and Dr. Carl Peters declare that the inhabitants of Damaraland are so discontented that they contemplate abandoning the German flag and joining the British South African Union.

GERMAN SYMPATHY FOR JAPAN BECAUSE OF FLOOD.

Reuter's Berlin correspondent reports that the Norddeutsche, alluding to the Japanese floods, expresses the opinion that Japan with her steady, calm strength, will repair the terrible damage, and sympathises with the Government in its severe trial.

Later.

Herr Kiderlenwächter, at the command of the Kaiser, visited the Japanese Ambassador to condole with him on account of the floods.

CRUISER "BEDFORD" ASHORE.

His Majesty's S.S. Bedford accompanying the British squadron from Weihaiwei to Nagasaki grounded on Quelpart Island. A Japanese warship was despatched thither to assist. The weather is bad.

London, August 23.

The Bedford was carrying out full-speed trials when she ran aground early yesterday on the Samarang Rocks in the Straits of Korea. Eighteen men were drowned.

Owing to the inrush of the waters there is very little hope of salvaging the ship, which is full of water to the engine-room bulkhead. The survivors were taken off by the Minatour and the Kent, which anchored near by in the daytime, but were compelled by the heavy sea to put out into the open at night.

FOREST FIRE IN N.W. STATES.

Later.

A forest fire in Idaho, Oregon, and western Montana is sweeping vast areas, 24 persons being killed and 25 injured. At Wallace, Idaho, 280 foresters are missing.

The Forestry Department at Washington reports that it has discovered positive evidence that the fire in Oregon had an incendiary origin. When the fire is extinguished, the death-roll, it is believed, will be appalling.

DREADNOUGHTS OBSELETE.

MOTOR BATTLESHIP TO BE BUILT AT PORTSMOUTH.

London, August 24.

The Admiralty is about to build at Portsmouth an experimental battleship with motor engines. No stoking would be required and the vessel would have no funnels. Great economies would thus be effected in weight and space.

The Portsmouth Evening News says that the new battleship will render obsolete the Dreadnoughts of all Powers.

AMERICAN POLITICS.

Roosevelt has expressed his pleasure at Taft's statement, which, he says, makes the situation perfectly clear.

REVOLUTION THREATENED IN PORTUGAL.

London, August 24.

Despite official denials details are leaking out of a revolutionary plot in Portugal. Not since the murder of Don Carlos has there been such a military display. The first division of the field army is under arms. The Lisbon forts are fully garrisoned and ammunition. The warships on the Tagus are reported to be ready to shell the revolutionaries.

These precautions are believed to have frustrated an effort to establish a military government.

LITTLE SYMPATHY WITH LABOUR.

CONSERVATIVES AND LIBERALS OPPOSE LABOURITE DEMAND.

The Labourite demand that a Bill should be passed reversing the Osborne Judgment is meeting with little sympathy from the Liberals and strenuous opposition from the Conservatives.

[This judgment precludes the funds of trade unions from being used for the support of Members of Parliament.]

BRITISH VIEWS ON ANNEXATION.

London, August 25.

Reuter's London correspondent learns that the British Government does not object to the Annexation of Korea politically, but has been considering the commercial effect the change will have. But no statement regarding what commercial effect will be can be made until conditions accompanying the annexation are made public.

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE TOKYO "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

AUSTRALIA TO MAINTAIN EXCLUSION REGULATIONS.

London, August 19.

Reports from Sydney are to the effect that the new Defence Bill provides 127,000 Combatants at a cost of £2,000,000. The Minister in moving the 2nd reading in the Senate declared Australia would refuse to arbitrate the matter of Asiatic Exclusion.

BRITISH SECTION AT EXHIBITION TO BE REBUILT.

The British Government has decided to reconstruct the destroyed section at the Brussels Exhibition.

SIR WILFRID LAURIE AND THE LABOUR UNIONS.

Sir Wilfred Laurie informed the labour unions that the Government would consider increasing the head tax of the Chinese but would not entertain for a moment any proposal to subject the Japanese emigrants to the indignity of a head tax, even if it involved the downfall of the Ministry. He considers that the day is over when it is politic to treat other races with contempt and harshness and says that Canada must follow the lead of Britain and treat all men with fairness and equality.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN FRIENDSHIP.

London, August 20.

The St. Petersburg Press hails the arrival of Lord Roberts' Mission to Announce the Accession of King George as a fresh sign of Anglo-Russian friendship. Lord Roberts having formerly been the exponent of the theory of Russian advance in India.

GERMANY.

It is reported from Berlin that practically the whole of the Imperial family accompanies the Emperor to Posen. Public opinion differs as to whether an era of Polish conciliation is approaching or whether it is the beginning of the enforcement of the expropriation law.

ROOSEVELT AND THE REPUBLICANS.

New York correspondents report an important Republican conference at Oyster Bay. Roosevelt resented his rejection as a candidate for chairman of the state convention and believes the majority of the Taft administration are hostile to him. As he desires to avoid a rupture he will not attend the convention or participate in factional fights. Roosevelt nevertheless will always defend his own policies against attack.

PROTEST OF PARIS PRESS.

London, August 22.

The Paris press protests against the Brazilian Government's decision to employ German military instructors, pointing out that French officers instruct the troops of the state of San Paulo, and that it would be unfair to engage Germans before the contracts expired.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY.

London, August 22.

Constantinople.—Russia has protested against the violation of the Persian territory Hayezid, close to the Russian border, by Turkish forces during the past two years. Turkey has occupied and administered considerable territory in the neighbourhood of the Urmiah ford.

THE JAPANESE TARIFF.

Lord Ridley, speaking at Blackpool, said that the country was beginning to understand Tariff Reform. Japan had formulated a tariff the effect of which would seriously injure British trade, especially that of Lancashire and Yorkshire, and which was unquestionably meant by Japan to apply to goods now sent them, so as to compete with British goods in the Far Eastern market.

THE CHOLERA IN RUSSIA.

London, August 23.

St. Petersburg.—The cholera is steadily declining.

THE RUSSIAN BLACK SEA FLEET.

AN INTERESTING SUGGESTION FROM TURKEY.

Constantinople.—A semi-official organ, referring to the increase of the Turkish Navy, suggests that any naval competition with Russia might be avoided by the Black Sea fleet joining that in the Baltic, Turkey guaranteeing the neutrality of the Black Sea.

ALBANIAN THIEVES SENTENCED.

London, August 24.
Constantinople.—Four Albanian thieves prominent in the fighting at Natchenalobu have been sentenced to death.

RUSSIAN ORDER TO GERMAN FIRM.

INDIGNATION IN ST. PETERSBURG

St. Petersburg.—The announcement that an order for artillery amounting to 2½ million pounds has been placed with a German firm, has aroused a storm of indignation in the Russian press, which declares that the Russian firm of Obuskoff is able to execute the order, and that the contract involves the betrayal of Russian interests and military secrets. The Duma has voted the money on the understanding that everything will be made in Russia.

RUSSIAN VIEW OF ANNEXATION OF KOREA.

London, August 24.
St. Petersburg.—The government has been informed of the impending annexation of Korea. It had been hoped Japan would refrain from that apparently superfluous measure. Russia will certainly not raise serious objections to the event which is not likely to prejudice Russo-Japanese relations.

RUSSIA'S PURCHASE OF ARTILLERY.

The Russian Novoe Vremya asserts that the new artillery has not been ordered from Germany, but understands Creusot Works in France will supply 100 field howitzers at a cost of £300,000. The remaining 500 are to be made in Russia.

ANNEXATION OF KOREA.

London, August 25.
The Times declares the annexation of Korea is inevitable and the only sound solution of many difficulties. Japan could never again leave Korea for a prey to the first-comer. The Times is convinced that Japan will face its new and larger duties with the unflinching courage it has always displayed in the domain of high politics, and trusts that the predominance of militarism during the early occupation will be modified. British trade must not be injured by the extension of the new tariff to Korea.

GERMAN VIEW ON ANNEXATION.

Berlin.—The Government regards annexation as the natural development. Germany is only interested in the future economic conditions and the regulation of Customs.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

FLOOD AT HSINMINTUN.

Mukden, August 23.
Owing to the recent long-continued rain, the Ryu River, running by Hsinmintun, overflowed this evening so that the town was submerged. The branch office of the Japanese Consulate is flooded some 1½ feet deep on the ground floor. On receiving an urgent message from Mr. Hojo, the official in charge, stating that, as the inundation occurred suddenly, it was difficult to furnish a detailed report with regard to the residents in the foreign settlement, Mr. Kasuya, a student interpreter, with a police officer, was despatched to the scene, while simultaneously a quantity of food was forwarded. A bridge at Linkatai on the Antung-Mukden line was washed away, and railway traffic was suspended.

SYMPATHY FROM THE POWERS.

A similar expression of sympathy from the Italian Government has also been tendered through the Italian Ambassador, expressed his own deep sympathy with Japan. The Portuguese Minister in Tokyo has tendered the profound sympathy from the King and Government of Portugal to the Japanese Government, while the Dutch Minister has submitted to the Japanese Emperor and Government the most sincere sympathy of his Country to the Japanese Government.

CONTRIBUTIONS.

The French and Russian Ambassadors in Tokyo have each contributed the sum of 100 yen toward the relief fund for the sufferers from the recent floods.

(RECEIVED BY THE NAVAL DEPARTMENT.)

THE "BEDFORD."

In compliance with the request of the Commander-in-Chief of the British Asiatic Squadron to render aid to H.M.S. Bedford, which ran on a rock off the south west of Quelpart Island on Sunday morning, the Naval Department has instructed the Commander of the Sasebo Naval Station to make arrangements for the rescue and to render assistance immediately. The rescue boat and lighters left Sasebo in haste on Monday evening for the scene.

The warship Yodo anchored at Chinampo, being also ordered by wire to proceed to the scene, left Chinampo at 5 a.m. yesterday.

On account of stormy weather the Commander-in-Chief of the British Asiatic Squadron has telegraphed to postpone the despatch of a rescue party to the scene of the Bedford's disaster. The weather having been on a fair way to recovery since Tuesday morning, the Commander of the Sasebo Naval Station despatched the warship Isumi, the steamers Chifoo Maru and Sasebo Maru, and two lighters, under the command of Cap'tain Kitano. Two ship-building engineers, three assistants, some 100 workmen, and a naval surgeon joined the rescue party.

At 6 a.m. on Wednesday the warship Yodo arrived at the scene of the Bedford's disaster, and found the Minotaur, Monmouth, Isumi and Sarukashi Maru already on the spot. There was a heavy swell on the sea, though the force of the wind was not great.

The Commander of the cruiser Yodo reports that the rescue party for the Bedford commenced work at noon on Wednesday discharging heavy articles from the stranded vessel. Although the force of the wind was not great, there was a heavy swell on the sea and the tidal current was rapid. At half past three in the afternoon a British destroyer arrived at the scene but left in a short while. As the British Admiral desired that the rescue party leave the scene before the weather changed, the Yodo was about to proceed to Mokpo.

CONTRIBUTION OF U.S. RED CROSS SOCIETY.

The U.S. Red Cross Society has contributed the sum of 100,000 yen towards the relief fund for the sufferers from the recent floods.

HOLLAND.

The Council of Honour of Statesmen of the Netherlands has dismissed the charge of bribery against the ex-Premier de Kuyper.

A NATIVE LION HUNT.

BY MR. THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

At Sergoi Lake there is a store kept by Mr. Kirke, a South African of Scotch blood. With a kind courtesy which I cannot too highly appreciate he, with the equally cordial help of another settler, Mr. Scally—also a South African, but of Irish birth—and of the District Commissioner, Mr. Corbett, had arranged for a party of Nandi warriors to come over and show me how they hunted the lion. Two Dutch farmers, Boers, from the neighbourhood, had also come; they were Messrs. Monton and Jordan, fine fellows both, the former having served with De Wet during the war. Mr. and Mrs. Corbett—who were hospitality itself—had also come to see the sport; and so had Captain Chapman, an English army officer who was taking a rest after several years' service in the Northern Nigeria.

The Nandi are a warlike pastoral tribe, close akin to the Masai in blood and tongue, in weapons and in manner of life. They have long been accustomed to kill with their spears lions which become man-eaters or which molest their cattle overmuch, and the peace which British rule has imposed upon them—a peace so welcome to the weaker, so irksome to the predatory, tribes—has left lion killing one of the few pursuits in which glory can be won by a young warrior. When it was told them that they could come to hunt lions at Sergoi, 800 warriors volunteered, and much heartburning was caused in choosing the sixty or seventy who were allowed the privilege. They stipulated, however, that they should not be used merely as beaters, but should kill the lion themselves, and refused to come unless with this understanding.

The day before we reached Sergoi they had gone out, and had killed a lion and lioness; the beasts were put up from a small covert and dispatched with the heavy throwing spears on the instant, before they offered, or, indeed, had the chance to offer, any resistance. The day after our arrival there was mist and cold rain, and we found no lions. Next day, November 20, we were successful.

ADVANCE OF THE WARRIORS.

We started immediately after breakfast. Kirke, Scally, Monton, Jordan, Mr. and Mrs. Corbett, Captain Chapman, and our party were on horseback; of course, we carried our rifles, but our duty was merely to round up the lion and hold him, if he went off so far in advance that even the Nandi runners could not overtake him. We intended to beat the country toward some shallow, swampy valleys, twelve miles distant.

In an hour we overtook the Nandi warriors, who were advancing across the rolling, grassy plains in a long line, with intervals of six or eight yards between the men. They were splendid savages, stark naked, lithe as panthers, the muscles rippling under their smooth, dark skins: all their lives they had lived on nothing but animal food, milk, blood, and flesh, and they were fit for any fatigue or danger. Their faces were proud, cruel, fearless; as they ran they moved with long, springy strides. Their head-dresses were fantastic; they carried ox-hide shields painted with strange devices, and each bore in his right hand the formidable war spear, used both for stabbing and for throwing at close quarters. The narrow spear heads of soft iron were burnished till they shone like silver; they were 4-ft. long, and the point and edges were razor sharp. The wooden haft appeared for but a few inches, the long butt was also of iron, ending in a spike, so that the spear looked almost solid metal. Yet each sinewy warrior carried his heavy weapon as if it were a toy, twirling it till it glinted in the sun rays. Herds of game, red hartebeests, and striped zebra, and wild swine, fled right and left before the advance of the line.

It was noon before we reached a wide, shallow valley, with beds of rushes here and there in the middle, and on either side high grass and dwarfed and scattered thorn-trees. Down this we beat for a couple of miles. Then, suddenly, a maned lion, rose a quarter of a mile ahead of the line, and galloped off through the high grass to the right, and all of us on horseback tore after him.

He was a magnificent beast, with a black and tawny mane; in his prime, teeth and claws perfect, with mighty thews, and savage heart. He was lying near a hartebeest, on which he had been feasting; his life had been one of unbroken career of rapine and violence, and now the maned master of the wilderness, the terror that stalked by night the grim lord of slaughter, was to meet his doom at the hands of the only foes who dared molest him.

MANED MONSTER AT BAY.

It was a mile before we brought him to bay. Then the Dutch farmer, Monton, who had not even a rifle, but who rode foremost, was almost on him; he halted and turned under a low thorn tree, and we galloped past him to the opposite side, to hold him until the spearmen could come. It was a sore temptation to shoot him, but, of course, we could not break faith with our Nandi friends. We were only some sixty yards from him, and watched him with our rifles ready, lest he should charge either us, or the first two or three spearmen, before their companions arrived.

One by one the spearmen came up, at a run, and gradually began to form a ring round him. Each, when he came near enough, crouched behind his shield, his spear in his right hand, his fierce, eager face peering over the shield rim. As man followed man, the lion rose to his feet. His mane bristled, his tail lashed, he held his head low, the upper lip now drooping over the jaws, now drawn up so as to show the gleam of the long fangs. He faced first one way and then another, and never ceased to utter his murderous grunting roars. It was a wild sight; the ring of spearmen, intent, silent, bent on blood, and in the centre the great man-killing beast, his thunderous wrath growing ever more dangerous.

THE RING OF DEATH.

At last the tense ring was complete, and the spearmen rose and closed in. The lion looked quickly from side to side, saw where the line was thinnest, and charged at his topmost speed. The crowded movement began. With shields held steady, and quivering spears poised, the men in front braced themselves for the rush and the shock, and from either hand the warriors sprang forward to take their foe in flank. Bounding ahead of his fellows, the leader reached throwing distance, the long spear flickered and plunged; as the lion felt the wound he half turned, and then flung himself on the man in front. The warrior threw his spear; it drove deep into the life, for entering at one shoulder it came out of the opposite flank, near the thigh, a yard of steel through the great body. Rearing the lion struck the man, bearing down the shield, his back arched, and for a moment he slaked his fury with fang and talon. But on the instant I saw another spear driven clear through his body from side to side; and as the lion turned again the bright spear blades darting toward him were flashes of white flame. The end had come. He seized another man, who stabbed him and wrenched loose. As he fell he gripped a spear head in his jaws with such tremendous force that he bent it double. Then the warriors were round and over him, stabbing and shouting, wild with furious exultation.

From the moment when he charged until his death I doubt whether ten seconds had elapsed; perhaps less; but what a ten seconds! The first half-dozen spears had done the work. Three of the spear blades had gone clear through the body, the points projecting several inches; and these, and one or two others, including the one he had seized in his jaws, had been twisted out of shape in the terrible death struggle.

We at once attended to the two wounded men. Treating their wounds with antiseptic was painful, and so, while the operation was in progress, I told them, through Kuke, that I would give each a heifer. A Nandi prizes his cattle rather more than his wives; and each sufferer smiled broadly at the news, and forgot all about the pain of his wounds.

Then the warriors, raising their shields above their heads, and chanting the deep-toned victory song, marched with a slow dancing step around the dead body of the lion; and this savage dance of triumph ended a scene of as fierce interest and excitement as I ever hope to see.

The Nandi marched back by themselves, carrying the two wounded men on their shields. We rode to camp by a roundabout way, on the chance that we might see another lion. The afternoon waned, and we cast long shadows before us as we rode across the vast lonely plain. The game stared at us as we passed; a cold wind blew in our faces, and the tall grass waved ceaselessly; the sun set behind a sullen cloud bank; and then, just at nightfall, the tents glimmered white through the dusk. London Telegraph.

JAPANESE VISITORS IN ENGLAND.

London, July 24.

The deputation of members of the Japanese Parliament who are at present visiting this country were entertained at Hampton Court last Friday by Mr. Lewis Harcourt on behalf of the Government.

Sir Edward Grey, proposing the health of the Emperor of Japan, said the alliance between the two countries was one which was renewed a few years ago in the expectation that it would result in the benefit of both. The years that had passed since it was renewed had, he thought, amply justified the policy of the alliance. The peace which they and we desired had been secured, and the success of the alliance might be emphasized by the fact that, although Japan had subsequently made several agreements with other nations, those agreements had not impaired, but, on the contrary, had contributed to secure the original policy of our alliance—the maintenance of peace. Japan desired in the Far East the maintenance of her own security, of her own prosperity, and of peace. The peace which was maintained there was of benefit to the whole world.

Baron Oura, Japanese Minister for Agriculture and Commerce and president of the Japanese section of the Japan-British Exhibition, entertained the officers of the Ikoma at luncheon at the Hotel Cecil on Saturday. On the same day the crew of the Ikoma had a gala day at Gravesend. Races were rowed in the ship's boats for prizes presented by the Mayor. Five hundred sailors were present at a dinner at the Rosherville Gardens, and in the afternoon marched through the town headed by the band of the 1st Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry. Then they were treated to representations of old English dances and revels by 500 of the local school children.

On Saturday also Prince Tokugawa gave away the prizes at Heath Brow School, Hemel Hempstead, the headmaster of which was a school-fellow of the Prince at Sydenham 28 years ago.

At the Japan-British Exhibition on Saturday night the Mayor of Tokyo, Mr. Mukio Oguki, and several members of the Japanese Commission were entertained at dinner by the Mayor of Hammersmith, and were welcomed by a representative gathering which included the Chairman of the London County Council and many London mayors.

A party of 425 seamen from the Ikoma visited Madame Tussaud's on Monday. They were much interested in the new figure of the Emperor of Japan wearing the uniform of a field-marshal of his army.

The principal officers of the Ikoma were given an opportunity to become acquainted with many British naval men on Monday night, when they were the guests of the Japanese Ambassador at the Hyde Park Hotel. The First Lord of the Admiralty and a number of admirals and vice-admirals attended.

"EVERY boy and girl ought to know how to swim," says Mrs. Eliza Flagg Young, Superintendent of Public Schools, of Chicago, "and every boy and girl attending the public schools will soon be compelled to learn to swim, just as he or she is taught to read and write in the regular grammar course. Every teacher ought to know how to swim, and the first step in accomplishing this fact will be the introduction into our teachers' training course at the normal school of a course of swimming."

AMERICAN SQUADRON VISITS ENGLISH PORT.

A MIDDY'S IMPRESSIONS.

A midshipman on one of the American squadron recently at Plymouth describes his impressions of the visit as follows:—

They say Plymouth is one of the prettiest harbours in the world, and it certainly seemed so to us as we steamed slowly in after a rather stormy passage, the first that most of us had ever made across the Atlantic. Even the Massachusetts had never made the trip before, though she behaved the best of the three ships, and burned less coal by far than any other. By the way, in foreign ports the coal merchants put the coal aboard themselves. Hence the three-day vacation we had while this was going on.

On one side of the entrance is a cliff with a frowning fortress above it. On the other is a woodland country of surpassing beauty, adorned with ruined castles or beautiful modern summer places. But our officers tell us that even this peaceful-looking country fairly bristles with masked batteries.

I have a much more concrete respect for the British Navy than I had before my arrival. We passed ship after ship as we came in, more than I had ever seen before and I decided that there must be a big rendezvous here. As a matter of fact Plymouth is not much of a naval port, and there is actually a naval gathering now at Portsmouth. None of the ships here are of the Dreadnought or super-Dreadnought class, but the twenty-seven battleships and cruisers, the dozen torpedo-boats and destroyers, and numerous old receiving ships nearly a century old, of the "thirty decks and no bottom" class.

The enlisted men were impressed, too. Jack, though a good-natured man, enjoys a fight with the next one when he has taken a bit of liquor aboard, and ordinarily counts himself the equal of two or three of other navies. But I heard one of them say as he looked with growing amazement at the assembled ships, "I hear there's fine liquor here, and cheap; but it doesn't look to me like a good port to get drunk in!" And the enlisted men are loud in their praises of the hospitality of the English, and particularly of Plymouth.

And so are the middies, and there are some good stories going the rounds about the trip to London; of the middies who occupied the box of the Duchess of Westminster; of the two who saw the two sons of Lord C.—army officers—under the table; and last, and best, of how the littlest midshipman in the navy put an English rear-admiral under in a table contest.

SPAIN AND HER SOVEREIGN.

To Anglo-Saxons the main interest of the crisis through which Spain is now passing lies in its probable effect on the position of the dynasty. The religious issue now raised goes to the very root of Spanish national life. The relations between Church and State in Spain are still medieval in character, a fact which may be either good or bad in itself, but which is at any rate thoroughly obnoxious to the eminently modern province of Catalonia. Alfonso XIII. has worked hard at the business of reestablishing loyalty in Barcelona, and has had much support from Senor Maura, a Conservative statesman of enlightened views, who is anxious for reform without revolution. Senor Maura has failed, and a bolder scheme has been launched. The men behind Senor Canalejas would prefer an open breach with the Vatican to an agreement and the Vatican is now driven to offer concessions for which Senor Maura looked in vain. But the strong Liberal in Spain is also a Republican, while the Southern Spaniard may well abandon faith in a dynasty which traffics with disloyalty in the Church. King Alfonso has been anxious to rally round him the moderate element in Spanish politics, with a view to the establishment of a Constitutional monarchy as the term is understood in England. Unhappily, the reformers abused their freedom, and the effort to stamp out sedition lost the King such sympathy as Catalonia had previously cherished. Now, in his attempt to recover it, he may drive the Church into active support of Carlist propaganda. Tho King is perfectly right in his view that only a coalition of moderate opinion can hold the progressive North and the medieval South together in a single kingdom, and all who wish Spain well will trust that his policy may yet be crowned with success. But never since his accession has the Throne been so isolated.

FEMININISM TO TRIUMPH IN FRANCE.

France is to be the scene of triumph for feminism, and the twentieth century is to be a woman's century, says Jean Finot, writing in the Revue (Paris), of which he is editor-in-chief. Neither America nor England will pass a women's charter, for women in those countries, we are told, are too noisy and turbulent in their self-assertion to gain the rights for which they often sigh and sometimes clamour and fight. After coupling the women of France with the old adage that "what woman wills, God also wills," this writer tells us:

"We shall have the spectacle of a sort of social transformation, the most imposing since the fall of the Roman Empire. The human race has so far been under the direction of the men; henceforth it will be found guided and inspired by the two sexes conjointly."

It seems that the French men are to surrender readily to the women the rights which for ages they have refused to share with them. This is not a matter of woman's self-assertion, but of man's recognition of the fitness and power of the softer sex. Says Mr. Finot:

"This is undoubtedly the way the duel between man and woman is to end in France. The contest proceeds with the utmost correctness and dignity. The grace with which the champions of woman's rights wield their weapons is only equaled by the chivalric bearing of their antagonists. While in England and the United States society unhesitatingly opposes the violent and sometimes eccentric demonstrations of feminism, everybody in France appears to sympathize with the claims of the French women for political rights. Many people are indifferent, and some vacillate in a kind of passive revolt, but in general we see a silent acquiescence in the idea that the new charter of women is to be granted. The adherents of this feminism are recruited not only from among working women, but the middle classes and the intellectual rich also are joining the ranks and flock to the standard even from that immemorial citadel of the old régime the Faubourg Saint-Germain. Duchesses, representing the most aristocratic families in France, join societies whose aim is the political triumph of women."

The admission of women to public life will not destroy their womanhood, but rather deepen and enhance it, avers Mr. Finot, who sees in the political woman the great savior of society; and he enthusiastically breaks out in the following glowing prediction which rivals the apotheosis of the fair sex celebrated by Comte:

"The question put by many investigators of feminism, 'Has woman lost her womanliness by mixing in politics?' has been answered in the negative."

"In our puzzled wonder on being set face to face with a new condition of things we are too ready to leap to the conclusion that a woman before seizing the ballot must strip herself of those qualities she had hitherto possessed, as a novice lays aside the attire of fashion before entering the cloister. But the woman will remain just as she was, as the man has done. Political sovereignty has not changed the latter into either an angel or a devil. His only change is that he has become master of his own destinies."

A glowing picture of the woman politician follows in Mr. Finot's eloquent argument:

"Let us imagine that the French woman at length presides like man over the future of her country. We see in a few years problems hitherto insoluble solved without delay. Depopulation, alcoholism, criminality, the squandering of the nation's money, nepotism, and those many social and political evils against which we have vainly fought for years will gradually be diminished until they disappear entirely. Let it be granted that the movement spreads from France to other countries, and the perpetual menace of war which never ceases to ruin and poison the existence of all the nations will vanish before the influence and vigilance of mothers watching over the health and life of their children.

"The diminution of armaments, followed by universal disarmament, can take place only with the concurrence of the women of every land. The political vote of wives and mothers will attain a solidarity which laughs at frontiers and will bring on, sooner than we think, realization of the golden dream of peace"—The Literary Digest.

HONGKONG AND SHANGHAI BANKING CORPORATION.

At the ordinary half-yearly general meeting of shareholders held at the City Hall, Hongkong, on Saturday, the 20th August, 1910, the following report of the Court of Directors was presented.

GENTLEMEN,—The Directors have now to submit to you a General Statement of the Bank, and Balance Sheet for the half-year ending 30th June, 1910.

The net profits for that period, including $2,928,987.95, balance brought forward from last account, after paying all charges, deducting interest paid and due, and making provision for bad and due, and making provision for bad and doubtful accounts, amount to $5, 89,127.67.

The Directors recommend the transfer of $500,000 from the Profit and Loss Account to credit of the Silver Reserve Fund, which Fund will then stand at $16,000,000.

They also recommend writing off Bank Premises Account the sum of $150,000.

After making these Transfers and deducting Remuneration to Directors there remains for appropriation $4,724,127.67, out of which the Directors recommend the payment of a Dividend of Two Pounds Sterling per Share, viz.: £240,000 which at 1/9%, the rate of the day, will absorb $2,694,736.84.

The Balance $2,029,390.83 to be carried to New Profit and Loss Account.

STERLING RESERVE FUND.

Owing to the redemption of the National War Loan a re-arrangement of the securities held in this account became necessary, and £270,000 3 per cent. Exchequer Bonds due 1915 were purchased, which stand in the books at 98. The opportunity was taken to adjust our holding of Consols to 85 and to write down Other Sterling Securities.

The expenditure incurred in effecting these changes, viz.: £7,170, has been met out of the Profits of the half-year.

BRANCHES AND AGENCIES.

Sub-Agencies of the Bank have been opened at Ipoh and Johore (Malay Peninsula).

DIRECTORS.

Mr. E. G. Barret, Mr. H. E. Tomkins, Mr. C. S. GUBBAY and the Honourable Mr. W. J. Gresson having resigned their seats on leaving the Colony, Mr. G. H. Medhurst, Mr. F. H. Armstrong, Mr. S. A. Levy and the Honourable Mr. Henry Keswick have been invited to fill the vacancies. Mr. Andrew Forbes has been invited to join the Board. These appointments require confirmation at this meeting.

Mr. G. Balloch has been elected Chairman for the remainder of the year and Mr. Robert Shewan Deputy Chairman.

AUDITORS.

The accounts have been audited by Mr. F. Maitland and Mr. J. W. C. Bonnar, the former acting for Mr. W. Hutton Potts who is absent from the Colony.

G. BALLOCH, Chairman.

"CANADA'S greatest problem, undoubtedly, is the assimilation and training of her new citizens," says the Canadian Courier. "The official homestead returns for April indicate this problem clearly. In that month there were 7,209 homestead entries in the three western provinces. Of these, 3530 were Canadian or British, while the rest were foreigners made up as follows: United Statesers, 2418; Austria-Hungarians, 338; Russians, 337; Norwegians, 144; Germans, 122; Swedes, 100; others, 320. Each of these entries represents 2½ people, or a total of 18,778 persons. Two out of four of these people are foreigners, trained in the ideals and circumstances and historical associations of a foreign citizenship. To transform them into Canadians, with a knowledge of Canadian history, Canadian institutions, and Canadian ambitions, is a task of supreme importance."

MISS FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE's body will not be buried in Westminster Abbey, says the London correspondent of the S.-C. Morning Post. It is understood that this is an honour which the lamented heroine of the Crimea expressly declined before she died. Overwhelmed with grief at the death of his mistress, Miss Florence Nightingale's old soldier servant in the Crimea died on the night of August 15th. The man was Miss Nightingale's orderly and served her at Scutari and other places. He was so devoted to her that her death broke his heart.

JAN Cayen, a little ice-bound island 300 miles east of Greenland, which is generally enveloped in fog, has just been seen for the first time in fifty years. The island, which was discovered by Henry Hudson, the English navigator, in 1607, was next seen about the year 1860 by a party which included Lord Dufferin. Since then all traces of the island vanished until recently, when the tourists on the Hamburg-America liner Oceana awoke one morning to find themselves passing within a mile of it. The captain of the Oceana telegraphed from Hammerfest, in Norway, to his company's headquarters to announce the fact that the island had been seen. Prince Henry of Prussia and Count Zeppelin, who are planning the North Pole airship trip at Hammerfest, were much interested when they heard of the discovery.

MR. PIERPONT MORGAN recently bought, through M. Jacques Seligmann of Paris, 86 of the most wonderful little watches in the world. He paid £60,000 for them, or an average of nearly £700 a watch. They formed the Marfels collection, and came to Paris from Berlin. All of them date from the sixteenth to the eighteenth century. As will be remembered, the first little watches were made in the sixteenth century in Nuremberg, in Paris and in Italy. The Marfels watches are very tiny and very beautiful. One is egg-shaped, made of Limoges enamel, and is no bigger than a canary's egg. There are only two of these in the world, and both are in Mr. Pierpont Morgan's possession. Many of the watches are in the form of crosses, and can be worn as pendants. The smallest of them might be worn as a cravat pin.

It is stated that the decision of the Senate of the National University of Ireland to make the Irish language compulsory for matriculation in and after the year 1913, was taken by a majority of 21 votes to 12. The Gaelic league is jubilant over the victory, which is mainly due to the pressure which the league was able to exercise through the Nationalist county councils. The councils are authorized by the Universities Act to strike rates in aid of scholarships to a total amount of about £60,000 per annum. Many of them made the striking of the rate conditional upon the adoption of compulsory Irish. If the new rule is strictly enforced hundreds of students will be diverted to Dublin university or to Belfast. The "Irish Times," in expressing regret at the Senate's decision, says that it does not think that either Trinity college or Belfast university wishes to be enriched at the cost of Roman Catholic Ireland's first venture in educational Home Rule.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, SEPT. 3RD, 1910.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

SECRETARY Richard Achilles Bailingier has resigned his position in the Cabinet of President Taft. The resignation will be effective September 15.

THE Emperor of Austro Hungary expressing profound sympathy at the recent floods in Japan, has donated the sum of 10,000 francs towards the relief fund.

A SHIZUOKA despatch says that the function for the closing of Mount Fuji was held on Tuesday at the Sengen Shrine, ten days earlier than in normal years.

THE steamer Ryoto Maru, which on the 25th ultimo ran aground on a shoal off Fumiyaama, Chiba prefecture, was refloated and left for Oturu the next day.

A SEOUL despatch says that a thunderstorm raged there on the 24th ultimo, when lightning struck a house near the branch office of the Oriental Development Company. Seven Koreans were killed and four others more or less seriously injured.

A KAGOSHIMA despatch reports that an explosion took place on the 25th ult. on board a tank steamer owned by the Rising Sun Petroleum Company. Four members of the crew were blown to pieces.

A NAGASAKI telegram says that the crew of the Bedford, numbering over 500, have arrived there on board the cruiser Monmouth. They were expected to leave for Hongkong on the 28th ult. by a P. & O. steamer.

A FUKUSHIMA despatch reports that the damage caused by the recent floods in that prefecture is estimated at over 5,000,000 yen. Some fifty houses at the foot of Bandai-san are buried about 20 feet deep under a landslide.

It is reported from Kure that the construction of three submarines has been begun at a special workshop in the Kure Naval Arsenal. Those who have not obtained permission of the Naval Minister, are not admitted to the workshop.

A MISSIONARY JOURNAL publishes the following interesting and instructive statement under the heading "How Americans Spend their Money": Foreign Missions, $7,00,000; chewing-gun, $11,000,000; confectionery $178,000,000.

CAPTAIN NOGUCHI TOKUTARO and Lieutenant Shibuya Tatsuhiko who some time ago were arrested at Osaka, have been dismissed and deprived of court rank. Captain Noguchi is alleged to have attempted to sell a map of strategic importance

WE learn that Mr. Leon v/d Polder, Councillor at the Netherlands Legation, Tokyo, has been informed, by cable from The Hague, that he has been nominated an officer in the Orange Nassau Order, which mark of distinction, no doubt, will greatly please his many friends here.

ON Monday morning a passenger train dashed into a wagon, laden with sand and lumber, which was standing in the compound of Kosaku Station on the Aome line. The wagon and ore of the carriages sustained some damage, and four passengers in that carriage were more or less seriously injured.

DON LUIS TERRAZAS, whose Mexican farm is 150 miles in extent north to south and 200 miles from east to west, is receiving some government attention on account of the magnitude of his holdings. His "farmhouse" is the most magnificent in the world—a palace, costing $ 600,000 in gold, superbly furnished, with rooms to accommodate five hundred guests.

ON the 25th ultimo the Kaga cho police of this city having received intelligence that a free fight was occurring in the Honmura road among a number of bluejackets, of the U.S. cruisers Rainbow and Charleston, proceeded to the spot. On attempting to put a stop to the disturbance, it was explained by the sailors that it was merely a boxing contest.

AT an extraordinary general meeting held on August 30th the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce voted an address of felicitation to H. M. the Emperor on the annexation of Korea, and also sent a telegraphic message to the Seoul Chamber of Commerce suggesting that it coöperate hereafter with the Tokyo Chamber to realize benefits arising from the fusion of the two countries. After these proceedings were over the President of the Chamber reported that in pursuance of a previous resolution Mr. T. Miyaoka was appointed to be its legal adviser.

THE death of Dr. Ume Kenjiro, the Legal Adviser to the Residency General in Korea, is announced to have taken place on the 29th ultimo at the Daikan Hospital, Seoul. The deceased was a distinguished authority on civil law.

SIR WILFRID LAURIER in a recent speech at Brandon, said that in considering the tariff two conditions were supreme. British preference must stand first and last and for all the time, and vested interests must be regarded. He was anxious to secure a fair, workable, trade treaty with the United States in order to secure that market for the Canadian people, but Canadians should follow the American example and put their interests first.

A FAMILY of three people have been murdered on a ranche in California and their remains burned. Evidence seems to point to a young Japanese workman, Manjiro Yamaguchi, as the murderer. He has disappeared and is being sought all over the State of California. It is thought that he may possibly have escaped to Japan, and an effort will be made to investigate the whereabouts of young Japanese men who have recently returned from America.

TELEGRAMS from Saitama, Fukushima, and other northern prefectures report that on the 30th ultimo a heavy fall of rain and hail with a cyclone was experienced in these districts. A numbers of houses and other buildings sustained damage and several persons were more or less seriously injured by lightning. Mulberry-leaves and vegetable products were much damaged. The Oisube River in Saitama prefecture rose five feet, and two bridges were swept away.

MISS LILLIAN SHUTTLEWORTH, a young woman living in a suburb of New York, wore a hobbleskirt yesterday for the first time, much to the admiration of her companions. But while walking down a terrace she suddenly fell. Her friends found that she was suffering great pain and called the ambulance, when it was discovered that she had broken a leg. She will be confined to hospital for several weeks. The hobble skirt fashion now extends to all classes in America.

AN overlooked wealth of fine timber has been revealed in Papua, or New Guinea, which is practically on the equator and has an area of 300,000 square miles. The late investigation has shown 79 useful woods in considerable quantities—including 15 varieties of cabinet woods, 15 suitable for joinery, 16 adapted for beams, girders, etc., 10 that may serve for carriage material, 4 that are good for piles and 14 that may be applied to many miscellaneous purposes.

A SOFA pillow tufted with $150 worth of silk goods and belonging to Mrs. Su Nishii a Japanese passenger on the Tenyo Maru, Aug. 8 was seized yesterday by Customs Inspector E. E. Enlow. When Inspector Enlow was passing through the apartment in the second cabin he noticed the pillow and thought it was too heavy to contain feathers. So he cut it open and found the goods prepared for smuggling. Mrs. Nishi denied knowing that the goods were in the pillow, saying that it had been given to her by a friend on leaving Japan. No arrest was made, as Mrs. Nishi had not tried to take the pillow ashore and through the customs lines,

KOREA.

Friday, August 26.

There are sundry and various conjectures as to the date which has been selected or will be selected for promulgating the annexation of Korea, but with regard to the annexation itself nobody appears to entertain any doubt. Concerning finance, there was at one time a supposition that it would be necessary to convene a special session of the Diet, but that idea has now been abandoned, the usual procedure as to post facto assent being sufficient to cover all the circumstances.

There had been much talk of a possible necessity of increasing the Japanese military force in the Peninsula, but that anticipation also is no longer entertained. Our readers are already doubtless aware that the force of Japanese troops now in Korea totals a division and a half.

One measure which will not immediately occur to everybody is a change of all the school readers in use throughout Korea. Those now in students' hands have all been compiled on the supposition that Korea is an independent country. That will have to be altered.

Curiously enough, Seoul and Nikko were both visited on the 24th inst., by a violent thunder-storm. That in the Korean capital occurred at 10 in the forenoon, and that at the celebrated Tokugawa mausoleum at 5 p.m. We do not suggest that there was any connection between the two phenomena, but as the Korean quidnuncs declared that the storm in Seoul was an indication of the approaching fall of the Yi Dynasty, it may suggest itself to some people to draw cognate conclusions from the visit paid by the storm to the tomb of Iyeyasu.

Saturday, August 27.

The meeting of Cabinet Ministers and high dignitaries of State in the presence of the Emperor of Korea on the 24th inst. is described as having been a very pathetic scene. The Premier, Mr. Yi Wan-yong, spoke for about an hour in a solemn voice and not without emotion. He explained that his country was confronted by the hard fate of being obliged to surrender its independence in deference to the welfare of the people and the security of their lives and property. The telegram does not convey a detailed account of this historical speech, but it says that the Premier's words were listened to with grave anxiety by the illustrious audience, his Majesty preserving his self-possession with evident difficulty. When the speech was concluded, the Emperor leaned back and with closed eyes pondered profoundly for a few minutes. He then in a low voice said, "I have fully understood the representations made by the Prime Minister, and I leave it in your Excellencies' hands to deal with the situation." In short, the meeting appears to have been conducted with a degree of gravity and dignity becoming the situation.

Unfortunately the ex-Emperor does not seem to be able to rise equally to the level of the occasion. While on the one hand receiving with not unnatural tears the news of the downfall of his Dynasty, he has ordered, on the other, that the anniversary of the coronation of the reigning Emperor shall be celebrated with exceptional pomp and magnificence.

Japanese newspaper reporters agree in saying that the Emperor of Korea regards his own future with entire confidence, and that he is leading his wonted life with absolute imperturbability. His Majesty is justified in taking that line. It is an open secret that his fate has been an object of exceptional solicitude to the Emperor of Japan, whose benevolent heart prompts every possible means of alleviating the pain of his brother-sovereign.

It is now pretty generally reported that the 29th inst. will be the day for promulgating the fact of amalgamation. Some slight hitch is said to have occurred in connection with consulting the views of foreign States, but whether the difficulty is in connection with consular jurisdiction, or customs duties, or both, the telegrams do not undertake to state.

It is reported that the foreign missionaries are doing everything in their power to restrain their converts from committing any excesses. The Presbyterian mission is specially mentioned in this context.

Of course these are various rumours. One is that the ex-Emperor has been completely prostrated by the prospect of amalgamation, another, that the Minister of Education has poisoned himself. But these tales are not consistent with truth.

A telegram from Vladivostock says that when the news of amalgamation was published on the 23rd inst. in that city, a meeting of the Korean residents was held, and on their way home they stoned the houses of the Japanese and assaulted any members of that nationality who happened to be passing. It is expected that more serious riots will occur, but the Vladivostock police know how to deal with such disturbers as these.

In San Francisco and Hawaii, also, efforts are being made by some Korean politicians to excite their fellow-countrymen in those places to acts of violence.

The Chuo Shimbun's Seoul correspondent says that there is a strong disposition among leading Koreans to transfer their place of residence to Tokyo. The correspondent adds that several friends in the latter city have been asked to look for suitable houses and lands. Mr. Yi, the present Prime Minister, is among these reputed transferreers of their residences.

We read in the Nichi Nichi Shimbun that the Yangpan and other persons entitled to monetary consideration in connection with the change of the Korean polity will receive pension-bonds totalling 20 million yen. These bonds will carry 5 per cent. interest and will be redeemable in 50 years, counting from the 5th year after the date of their issue. They will be regarded as entailed property, and therefore, not subject to be made security for loans. In addition to the above, the Japanese Government will have to saddle itself with 12 million yen of 6 per-cent. bonds which are now circulating in Korea. Thus altogether the payments which the Japanese Treasury will have to make annually on account of the amalgamation will aggregate about two million yen.

Sunday, August 28.

Tokyo newspapers are unanimous in predicting that the formal announcement of amalgamation will be made to-day. The conditions are said to be, 1st, that the Sovereign power in Korea shall be made over to Japan by treaty. Secondly, that the title of the Emperor of Korea shall henceforth be Yi Wang, and the title of the ex-Emperor, Yi Dai-Wang. Thirdly, that a certain number of members of the Korean Imperial Family shall have the title of prince, and that, with regard to the other members of the Family and distinguished personages, they shall be included in a Korean peerage. Fourthly, that the name of Korea shall henceforth be "Chosen." Fifthly, that a Viceroy shall be placed in Korea. Sixthly, that the Viceroy of Chosen shall have the same legislative and administrative functions as the Viceroy of Formosa, and that for the present the position of Viceroy shall be occupied by the Resident-General. Seventhly, that during the period of transition the various official institutions shall remain undisturbed, with the exception of unavoidable changes. Eighthly, that a suitable income shall be provided for the Sovereign and the ex-Sovereign, and a pension shall be given to others who are entitled to such consideration. Ninthly, that for the purposes of the above payments public loan bonds shall be issued to the maximum extent of 30 million yen. Tenthly, that the present customs dues shall remain unaltered for 10 years, but shall be called transit dues of entry (inyu-zei) and transit dues of exit (ishutsu-zei). Eleventhly, that to commemorate the amalgamation a general amnesty shall be proclaimed and the taxes reduced. Twelfthly, that the most influential men in various localities shall be assembled to form an advisory council. Thirteenthly, that there shall be freedom of religious belief. Fourteenthly, that charity hospitals shall be established in each country. Fifteenthly, that a sum of 17 million yen shall be furnished by the Japanese Treasury for the purpose of developing industry and education throughout the Peninsula. Sixteenthly, that consular jurisdiction shall be abolished.

With regard to the above titles to be granted to the Emperor and ex-Emperor of Korea, we are unable to say with absolute confidence what the English equivalent of Wang is intended to be. The literal translation of the word is "king," but it occurs in the nomenclature of Japanese princes, and moreover we read that the deposed Emperor is to rank immediately after the Crown Prince of Japan. Thereafter, we take it for granted that the Emperor and the ex-Emperor will be known as "Prince Yi" and "Great Prince Yi."

It will be observed that the general amnesty includes the would-be assassin of the Prime Minister, the case having been carried to the Appeal Court. It is rather curious that the very event which the would-be assassin endeavoured to avert should, by its consummation, become the means of saving his life.

On the 26th inst. the Resident General invited to the Residency-General all the editors of the Japanese papers published in Korea and addressed to them some very wholesome words. His Excellency said that he had observed a tendency on the part of these journals to speak slightly of the Emperor of Korea and to allude in terms of something like contempt to the people of the Peninsula. The Resident-General considered that without any words from him the newspapers themselves ought to appreciate the importance of refraining from such writing, since, to say nothing of its injustice, it must seriously tend to estrange Korean good-will and to imperil the friendship between the two countries; further, he observed that some Japanese residents in Korea were preparing to leave the country in anticipation of trouble on account of amalgamation. He denounced such a step as pusillanimous and unwise. People acting in that manner appeared to forget that Korea is to pass under Japanese rule, and that all persons within the limits of the Peninsula will enjoy every advantage and protection accruing to Japanese subjects in Japan. His Excellency went on to say that he did not offer this advice necessarily in his capacity of Resident-General. He considered that every loyal Japanese subject should be able to appreciate the obligation devolving on him at this juncture; namely, the obligation of assisting to promote friendship between the peoples of Japan and Korea, and to secure to their future fellow-subjects, the Koreans, the same peace and prosperity as they, the Japanese, enjoyed at home.

These words of the Resident-General are said to have produced an excellent effect, and they furnish a clear clue to the severity of the censorship recently exercised by the Residency-General towards Japanese journals published in Korea. The offence on account of which these journals have been suspended and otherwise penalized is not that they attempted to stir up sedition in the ordinary way, but that their language was calculated to offend the Koreans and to imperil the friendship which it is the object of the Japanese Government to promote.

It is stated that Prince Wong Heung, better known as Yi Chai-Myung, will soon proceed to Japan as Ambassador, accompanied by Mr. Kim In-sik, in the capacity of assistant Ambassador. The object of the mission will be to thank the Emperor of Japan for the benevolent methods pursued by him in the matter of amalgamation.

Things seem to be perfectly quiet in the Peninsula, and it would even appear as though the people knew, and were prepared for, the various changes which are to be made. Among the Koreans in Vladivostok, however, there is said to be a considerable unrest.

It is not surprising to find that a hitch has occurred in connection with the proposed mission of Mr. Yi, Minister of Education, who was to have come to Japan to offer condolences in connection with the floods, and for some other purpose which was not explicitly defined. It is now said that Mr. Yi, who is a sturdy patriot, declines altogether to visit Japan.

Monday, August 29.

The method pursued by Japan with regard to amalgamation is said to be dictated by a code of punctilious courtesy. The Korean Emperor is to make application to have his dominions amalgamated with those of his Japanese brother and the Emperor of Japan will signify his assent. This is unquestionably the wisest manner of contriving that the transfer shall present itself to the Korean people as a voluntary act on the part of their sovereign. There is absolutely no precedent in the history of the world for such an incident as that now occurring in the Far East, and the nations will watch the various steps with much interest.

It is stated that the number of Japanese Imperial ordinances which will have to be issued in order to resuscitate the Korean administrative machine will exceed one hundred. It will of course be impossible to issue all these at once: the operation will have to be gradual.

With regard to the Resident-General, his routine of procedure on the 29th inst was, first, to repair to the Palace and pay his respects to the newly nominated Imperial Korean Princes, in other words, to the two ex-Emperors; secondly, to receive at the Residency General the congratulations of the various consuls in Seoul; and thirdly, to issue instructions for the conduct of business.

For the present the Imperial Princes Yi will continue to reside entirely in Seoul, but it is expected that they will shortly provide themselves with suitable dwellings in Tokyo, so that a part at least of their time may be spent in the Japanese capital, which city becomes henceforth the Korean capital also.

As for the Korean Prince Imperial he will of course cease to have that title, and there will be corresponding changes in his treatment at the Japanese Court. Thus his guard of honour will be withdrawn and he will no longer enjoy the same privileges as the Japanese Prince Imperial.

It appears that the Japanese newspapers were mistaken in the term applied by them to the amnesty which is to be granted in connexion with the amalgamation. The word they used was taisha, which means universal amnesty without distinction of crime, but the fact is an amnesty limited to political offenders. Thus the would-be assassin of the Prime Minister will not benefit.

Of course certain steps will be taken of a religious character to mark the occasion. Thus an Imperial messenger will be sent to notify the fact at the shrines of Ise and at the Tombs of the founder of the Japanese Dynasty and of the reigning Emperor's father. It is also stated that a special envoy will be despatched to announce the amalgamation at the grave of Prince Ito.

There is a rumour, unconfirmed however, that seven Korean subjects have entered Seoul with the object of compassing the death of the Prime Minister.

Tuesday, August 30.

The Emperor and the Empress of Japan, who never fail to find opportunities for graceful and gracious action, have sent a special envoy, Viscount Inaba, to Seoul bearing a letter, the terms of which are of course unpublished, though the document is said to be couched in terms of strong sympathy and appreciation. The Viscount also carries with him some handsome mementos for this Korean Household.

The Jiji Shimpō makes an interesting comment. It is that until the ex-Emperor of Korea adopted for himself a few years ago the title of "Emperor," he was known throughout the whole of the East by the title of O. Thus it may be said that he does not lose rank on the present occasion, but simply reverts to the title by which the members of his family had been designated for 5 centuries prior to the recent arrogation of the new nomenclature. To this we may add that the change of title from O to "Emperor" was one of the direct consequences of Japan guaranteeing Korean independence; or, to speak more correctly, recognizing it by treaty. Thus it is natural that, Japan having withdrawn that guarantee and annexed the Peninsula, the sometime ruler of the latter should cease to call himself "Emperor." But we are bound to say that the Jiji's analysis seems incomplete. For the title O, held during 5 centuries by the representatives of the Yi, Dynasty, did not signify "Prince," as it will henceforward signify, but had the full meaning of "King."

During the days when treaty revision engrossed so much attention in Japan, one constantly heard, on the side of foreigners, accusations of illiberality preferred against Japan because she confined the foreign residents within the limits of settlements. Japan on her side contended that such a restriction was inevitable, inasmuch as no provision for the efficient discharge of judicial functions outside the settlements had been made by foreign Governments. It is well to recall these facts now. Korea has hitherto been under the so called extra-territorial system, and the area of foreign residence and trade has been strictly limited. But in the immediate sequel of annexation the whole of the Peninsula, with the exception of one naval port, is thrown open for foreign trade, travel and residence. Hence one of two things become necessary, namely, either that consular courts should be established at all centres throughout the country, or that the extraterritorial system should be abolished. We mention this because there apparently exists some misapprehension as to the possibility of continuing consular jurisdiction.

It is calculated that the number of persons affected by the amnesty in Korea will total 800. So far as we can see, the only exceptions made relate to assassins or would-be assassins and to criminals who are expressly disqualified by law to profit by such indulgence.

The 28th inst. appears to have been a very busy day in Seoul. It had then become definitely known that annexation was imminent, and the precincts of the Imperial Household were crowded with Yangpan and other persons, who, either honestly or dishonestly, believed that they had claims to national gratitude, and that any such claims as had obtained official recognition before annexation would be duly acknowledged by the Japanese Government afterwards. Doubtless the Korean Court felt itself morally constrained in these circumstances to recognize many claims which in ordinary times would have been rejected incontinently. The Japanese Authorities will of necessity be unable to institute any close scrutiny into the validity of claims which have already been endorsed by the Korean Court. It will be better to treat this matter with the utmost leniency. Some discontent is inevitable. Already we hear of Yangpan and others who, failing to obtain what they desired on the 28th inst., are now in a mood to lend themselves to a demonstration of some kind.

Meanwhile there are as yet no palpable signs of disaffection, though certain smouldering embers may easily be fanned into flame.

In Vladivostok on the 29th inst. the Korean residents held a meeting and decided to present anti-annexation memorials to the Governments of the United States of America, Germany and Great Britain.

The Shōgyō Shimpō, as is natural in a commercial organ, recalls the enormous cost of blood and treasure that has been entailed upon Japan by the Korean problem. Our contemporary does not go further back than the days of Hideyoshi, but it might have referred to much more remote antiquity had it desired to be exhaustive. Modern times, however, are quite sufficient for the Shōgyō's purpose. Indeed, it might better have left Hideyoshi's case unmentioned, for that great man's expedition to the Peninsula was dictated solely by ambitious aggression. The war with China in 1894-5, however, and the war with Russia ten years later, were both caused directly by Korea, and in all human probability another terrible conflict would have been added to the list sooner or later, had not Japan resorted to annexation. There is no action, however, without reaction. It remains to be seen what new perils will grow from the seed now sown.

Wednesday, August 31.

We read in the telegraphic correspondence of the Mainichi Dempo that the number of prisoners released under the amnesty in Seoul totalled 284. They were called out in batches and addressed by the Chief of Police, Major-Gen. Adachi. He informed them that as they had now become Japanese subjects, the Sovereign of Japan had been graciously pleased to pardon their offences, but they must take warning that any repetition of crime would expose them to the severest punishments. Among them there were several political offenders. The Major-General addressed these men specially and invited any of them to stand forth who were not prepared to abstain from the intrigues and agitations which had brought them into collision with the law. It is scarcely necessary to say that no one responded to this invitation. Each prisoner on being released was handed a sum of money sufficient to carry him to his native place, on the supposition that he travelled 6 ri per diem at an expense of 15 sen.

The correspondent of the Asahi Shimbun in Seoul wires that he has visited all parts of the city and has been struck by the quiet and peaceful appearance presented by the streets and the citizens. The only visible evidence of an abnormal state of affairs was the presence of a few armed police constables in the neighbourhood of the West Gate. He observed several groups of Koreans perusing the various announcements posted here and there by order of the Japanese Authorities. It appeared from the demeanour and comments of these readers that they were quite satisfied with the new arrangement, and some of them did not hesitate even to express satisfaction, that their country, in association with Japan, had become one of the great Powers of the world.

At Pyong-yang, also, a place where some unruly manifestations were anticipated, nothing of the kind showed itself, and from Yongdupo comes news that the people celebrated the announcement of annexation by immediately proceeding to cut off their top-knots in token of their new allegiance.

The Resident-General, in an Instruction issued by him on the 29th inst., laid special emphasis on the fact that all those who have hitherto been Korean subjects and all foreigners residing in Korea will be treated exactly as though they were Japanese subjects or residents in Japan. There are two notable exceptions to this rule. One is that the judicial and legislative systems will be after the model of those operative in Formosa. In other words, special powers will be entrusted to the Governor-General in the matter of enacting laws, and in judicial affairs appeals will not be carryable outside the bounds of the Peninsula. The second difference is that the present system of foreign-settlement organization will be continued for the time being. It is obviously the intention and desire of the Japanese Government to demonstrate practically to the Koreans that they will henceforth be in full enjoyment of all the privileges enjoyed by Japanese subjects.

Korea having ceased to exist as an independent country, and its very name having been changed to Chosen, it has become necessary for the vernacular newspapers of Seoul to alter their nomenclature. This they have done by eliminating the ideograph "Han" from their titles, and we have now simply the Minpo, the Kanyo Shimbun, the Kanjo Shimbun and the Mainichi Shimpō. But a change of name is not the only alteration. There has been also a corresponding metamorphosis of tone. All the four above journals are said to unite in congratulating their countrymen on the change that has taken place, and in urging the inexpediency of any recalcitrant acts. How long this gentle mood will survive may be doubtful, but it is plain that these newspapers are placed in a difficult position.

The Koreans in Vladivostock have rendered themselves conspicuous by their resort to violence. Several days before the official announcement of annexation they began to indulge in riotous conduct, forming bands to assault Japanese subjects and to wreck Japanese places of business. They appear to have succeeded in some instances, but information on this score is meagre. The Russian police, however, have organized a system which seems to be thoroughly effectual in preserving peace and order. The Japanese citizens of Vladivostock being largely in the minority, as compared with their Korean fellow-residents, the assistance of the police becomes doubly necessary and welcome. We observe that Tokyo newspapers are writing in most grateful terms about the aid rendered by the Russian constables on this occasion.

It is alleged that the Koreans in Vladivostock have compiled and addressed to Occidental Governments a strongly worded protest against the destruction of their country's independence. So far as this action can be attributed to motives of genuine patriotism, it has the sympathy of all on-lookers. But we find it difficult to determine how far any sentiment of true patriotism can be ascribed to men who in ordinary times make no effort whatever to promote their country's progress and prosperity.

Among the incidents of the past few days in Seoul one of the most characteristic is the payment of the debts of Mr. Yung, father of the Empress. This gentleman had incurred such heavy liabilities in connexion with his daughter's elevation to the post of Empress that he had to become a prisoner in his own house, and remained so for many months. One of the Resident-General's first acts was to provide for the satisfaction of these debts, and thus Mr. Yung has been enabled to visit the Palace and meet his daughter after an interval of a whole year. The sender of this news (Mainichi Dempo's correspondent) adds that the Empress seems to think of nothing except acquiring the Japanese language, which she is diligently doing under the tuition of Countess Kodama.

We read in the Fiji Shimpō that the Emperor of Japan, whose desire is to pay all possible respect to the deposed Sovereign of Korea, has determined to set aside for the latter's use one of the detached palaces belonging to the Crown in Tokyo. It is obvious that the former Emperor of Korea will ultimately have to visit Tokyo. The journey may not be made immediately, and indeed the expedience of making it at once is doubtful. But it will have to come sooner or later, and thereafter it may be expected to be repeated at lessening intervals. Therefore the necessity for a place of residence in Tokyo becomes apparent, and if the Emperor of Japan carries out the intention attributed to him above, it will be a very gracious act.

There is already a Privy Council (Sumitsuin) in Korea, but it has been decided that the number of councillors should be largely increased so as to admit all the statesmen who can reasonably claim a voice in Korean affairs. Moreover, local councils are to be organized in various provinces for the purpose of consulting the Koreans themselves about the management of their country's affairs. These measures are emphatically wise. It is inevitable that a large number of the present holders of office in the Peninsula will have to be replaced by men of Japanese nationality, and the resulting impression would be one of marked exclusion from the management of their country's affairs unless some such steps as those indicated above were taken.

The Shogyo Shimpō is the sole possessor of an important piece of news, namely, that General Viscount Hasegawa will be ultimately appointed Governor-General of Korea. He will not take up the duties of his post, however, until the middle of November, whereas Viscount Terauchi intends to return to Tokyo in the middle of September. Therefore there will be an interval of two months between the withdrawal of the present Governor-General and the succession of General Hasegawa, during which interval the duties of the post will be discharged by Mr. Yamagata.

With regard to the 30 million yen worth of bonds which it is proposed to issue in connexion with the annexation of Korea, it is stated that the money will be distributed in the following proportions, namely, 13 millions to provide an income for the Yangpan and the new noblemen; and 17 millions to be distributed among various localities for educational, medicinal, transportation and other useful purposes.

Thursday, September 1.

A correspondent remonstrates with us that owing to printer's blunders an attempted explanation of the new titles of the deposed Korean Potentates makes confusion worse confounded. It is true. To put the matter in the simplest form, Yi (Japanese Ri) is the family name; Ō (Prince) is the rank; denka (Imperial Highness) is the honorific, and Shotoku-kyu and Tokuju-kyu are the names, respectively, of the Palaces where the Emperor and the Ex-Emperor are living. These names of palaces are employed to construct the title, not to indicate the rank. Thus the Emperor becomes Shotoku-kyu Ri Ō Denka (His Imperial Highness Prince Ri of the Shotoku Palace), and the Ex-Emperor is designated Tokuju-kyu Ri Tai-Ō Denka (His Imperial Highness Great Prince Ri of the Toku-ju Palace).

We find in the Kokumin Shimbun a statement of the amounts involved in the Japanese Government's announced policy of remitting 5 per cent. of the Korean taxes for the current year, and drawing the sponge through all taxes previously unpaid. In the 5 per cent. category the amount shown is 630,000 yen. Under the heading of uncollected taxes up to the close of the year 1908 a figure of 10 millions appears, and to this has to be added more than 100,000 yen of taxes unpaid during 1909. Thus altogether the sums involved aggregate about 11 million yen. On the other hand it has to be remembered that a large part of this amount could not have been recovered in any circumstances, and that even the recoverable portion would have involved much trouble and expense.

News comes from Chemulpo that on the 27th ult. a Chinese vessel entered that port carrying two mortars, nine rifles and 2319 rounds of ammunition. It was pleaded that these arms were intended to repel pirates, but as that allegation could not clearly be proved the consignment was stopped.

THE RESIDENT-GENERAL.

Viscount Terauchi has issued a notification which contains a great deal of information highly interesting to the people of Korea. But not the least striking feature of the notification is that it sets out by attributing annexation to the desire of the Korean Sovereign. This is in strict accord with the language of the last rescript issued by the retiring Emperor and is of course an expedient way of stating the case for the purposes of the Korean audience, but it is somewhat lacking in sincerity, and will consequently invite criticism. In fact, it is the only vulnerable point in the whole programme.

Another matter mentioned in the document is that a considerable sum of money is to be distributed among the provinces for educational and industrial purposes. The exact dimensions of the sum are difficult to ascertain, as one telegram mentions 7 million yen, another, 17. We ourselves are inclined to think that the latter figure is correct, since it tallies with previous statements.

Doubtless the pill of annexation will be swallowed much more resignedly now that it is gilded with a remission of 5 per cent. of taxes for this year and of all unpaid fiscal dues. People who cannot afford to pay taxes are generally the most distressed class of the community, and this indulgence extended to them will be very welcome.

The total sum of the bonds to be issued for the support of the Yangpan and the meritorious Korean subjects as well as those upon whom titles of nobility are conferred, is 30 million yen. These bonds are to be registered, so that their sale or hypothecation will not be permissible.

As for the yearly allowance to the Imperial Household, we do not as yet find any official statement of its amount, but apparently it will be included in the ordinary expenditures of the Japanese State. Henceforth there will cease to be any Korean budget: the finances of the two countries being included in the same document.

THE LAST KOREAN IMPERIAL RESCRIPT.

The Emperor of Korea issued his last Imperial decree on the 29th ult. A Japanese version of the document is telegraphed to the Asahi Shimbun from Seoul, but as we shall soon doubtless be in possession of a direct English translation without the intervention of the Japanese language, we confine ourselves here to giving the gist of this historical utterance. His Majesty sets out with the usual formula of self-depreciation, and then goes on to say that he has exercised all his abilities and spared no endeavour to minister to the good of the nation over which he was called to rule. Nevertheless the state of weakness and debility into which the country had fallen refused to yield to any remedy within visible reach, and things only went from bad to worse, so that all hope of permanent improvement under the existing regime had to be abandoned. Rather than take the risk of a final catastrophe, it was deemed wiser, therefore, to transfer the control of affairs to hands at once abler and more competent to effect reform. Therefore, though with no small degree of moral suffering, the Emperor resolved to surrender his sovereign powers to the Ruler of a State which is Korea's neighbour and which had shown itself solicitous for her well-being. This seemed the wisest and the most effective course, not only for preserving peace with foreign nations, but also for securing the happiness of the Korean people. Finally his Majesty calls upon all his subjects to maturely consider and accurately appreciate the trend of events and the spirit of the time, and bids them, instead of raising any tumult, to attend quietly to their respective business and rest convinced that the security of their lives and properties and the development of their resources will be the aim of their new rulers. The last sentence of the rescript exhorts the Korean nation to realize that its sovereign, in taking this step, has not been forgetful of his people, but has been actuated solely by an earnest desire to promote their welfare and happiness.

Of course there is nothing striking in the above. It is just what might be expected in the circumstances. Greater interest would have attached to a cognate announcement by the ex-Emperor, but that is evidently out of the question. It is upon the attitude and the mood of the ex-Emperor that the peaceful achievement of Japan's purposes depends to a large extent.

THE TITLES CONFERRED ON THE KOREAN IMPERIAL PERSONAGES.

We foresee that there will be much confusion among foreigners as to the titles conferred upon Korean Imperial personages under the new regime. It is clear enough that the Emperor and the ex-Emperor are to become Princes, and that their rank of Prince will be rendered in the Japanese language by the term "O." But what do they become Princes of? In Japanese we say "Prince Arisugawa," that being the full title, just as in English we say "Duke of Cornwall." But if we desire to indicate the personal name of the bearer of the title we have to say "Takehito Prince Arisugawa" or "Edward, Duke of Connaught." The new Korean titles perpetuate the family name Yi as a matter of course and thus in Japanese we take Ri (Korean Yi) for the princely name and in order to obtain the term corresponding to "Arisugawa" or "Connaught" it has been decided to employ the names of the palaces—Shōtoku and Tokuju—so that the full titles become "Shōtoku-kyu Ri-O Denka" and "Tokuju-kyu Ri-Taio Denka." The Prince Imperial becomes "O Seishi" instead of "Taishi," and his title is "Ri-Kon Denka."

We may call attention here to the fact that in the official translation of the Japanese Imperial rescript the term "Governor-General of Korea" is applied to the office now specially created in the Peninsula, and to be held for the moment by Viscount Terauchi. The Japanese term thus translated is Sotoku-ku, being identical with the term applied to the cognate office in Formosa, which term has always been rendered "Viceroy" in order to distinguish it from the lesser term "Governor General" (Totoku), which is used to designate the Japanese representative in the Leased Territory of Kwantung. It must be confessed, however, that sinologues have not been unanimous in their rendering of the ideograph Sotoku into English. This is the title conferred on all the local satraps who are universally designated Viceroys in official documents, but on the other hand the list of Chinese Authorities published by the Assistant-Chinese Secretary of the British Legation in Peking calls all these satraps "Governor-General." Be that as it may, however, we must accept the Japanese official translation of the term Sotoku in the case of Korea, namely, Governor-General.

MASAMPHO AND SHIN-WIJU.

The closing of Masampho to foreign commerce and the opening of Shin-Wiju is an interesting fact from a strategical point of view. It means that Japan now regards herself as to a great extent a continental power. The southern entry to the Sea of Japan is closed and the northern entry to Korea across the Yalu is opened. Vice-Admiral Kimotsuki writes an interesting letter on this subject to the Nichi Nichi Shimbun. He points out that from a strategical point of view Japan's position in the Far East has now come to closely resemble the position of England in the Far West. The Sea of Japan has become the Mediterranean of the Orient, and Masampho represents Gibraltar, while the Straits of Tsugaru represent the Suez Canal. Tsugaru Strait, at its widest part, measures only 10.2 miles, and at its narrowest, 9.3. Thus the whole strait may be said to be within range of modern naval artillery. Tsushima is the Malta of the East, and Masampho on the opposite coast of Korea furnishes a port which, while in its position towards Tsushima it resembles Gibraltar in the latter's position towards Malta, has much finer harbour accommodation than the British stronghold on the south of Spain. Henceforth Japan will have to pay even more attention than ever to the development of her land-forces, and henceforth her range of maritime power will stretch from the Formosa Channel to the Tsugaru Strait. It is true that the western side of the Formosa Channel is in Chinese possession, but the presence of islands corrects that defect to a large extent. A modern battleship cannot remain at sea for more than seven days without replenishing her stores of coal and water. Therefore if a State desires to extend its maritime influence, the first necessity is to provide itself with naval stations. America was practically powerless in the Far East until she acquired the Philippines, and undoubtedly Japan's position is greatly strengthened by the acquisition of Masampho. In this context we may observe that an official announcement has appeared to the effect that from the 1st inst. tenders will be received from Japanese subjects for leases of lots of land at Masampho. The area of the lots is very small, namely, 100 tsubo, and the number is only 50.

A KOREAN PATRIOT.

News comes from Kimsan in Chholado to the effect that a district headman has committed suicide out of excessive grief for the loss of his country's independence. One can imagine that in remote rural regions in Korea there exist men whose families have probably resided in the same place from time immemorial, and whose interpretation of recent events is that their home is broken up and that their children are condemned to be the slaves of a foreign power. Such folks deserve profound sympathy. A very different point of view is represented by Mr. Chin, a well-to-do literateur, who, on the 31st ult., proceeded to the Residency-General carrying a flag on which was inscribed a legend amounting to "Welcome amalgamation! Long live the Emperor of Japan!" Mr. Chin then handed in a lengthy document congratulating the two countries on what had taken place. The difference between this literatus and the patriot of Kimsan is wholly one of knowledge and ignorance. To the category of the former belong numerous Koreans who are reported to be busily docking their top-knots on the plea that they cannot afford to be any longer old-fashioned.

Of course some curious rumours are in circulation. One of these is that to recoup its outlays in connection with annexation the Japanese Government intends to effect a forced purchase of all Korean properties which exceed a fixed minimum. Thrown into consternation by this intelligence, several wealthy Koreans are reported to be hastily taking steps for dividing their property among their relatives so that the average figure shall be below the fixed limit. The Japanese authorities are adopting vigorous measures to contradict this silly manoeuvre. For the rest, everything seems to be quiet in the Peninsula. In San Francisco, however, the Korean residents are vehemently agitating. They declare that if their Emperor and his Cabinet Ministers have surrendered their country to Japan, it only remains to create a new Korea. They do not indicate what course they intend to pursue towards that end, but as they are calling for volunteer soldiers, it is not difficult to infer the trend of their ideas.

POLICE MEASURES.

There are no serious signs of disturbance in Korea, but nevertheless due precautions are being taken. Thus the Ministers of State are denying themselves to all visitors, and the Chief of Police, Major-General Akashi, is said to have sent a message to all the elder statesmen and Cabinet Ministers intimating that the police had made full arrangements to respond at a moment's notice to any call for aid made by a Korean subject. Seeing that assassination has been a constant political weapon in Korea from time immemorial, and recalling the incidents of the time when her domestic affairs first began to interest the outer world, namely, the days of the Tai-won-kun, we must be prepared at any moment to hear of murder, attempted or consummated, in the sequel of such an exciting event as the loss of the country's independence. The Japanese police are very efficient, and it may be taken for granted that all their resources of intelligence and activity will be employed on this occasion, but still, if they succeed in preventing every act of violence, it will be something like a miracle.

That many Koreans have been deeply moved by the events of the past few days is proved by the news that a number of citizens of Seoul assembled at the Eastern Gate of the city on the day of annexation and bewailed the fate of their country with tears. A placard was also posted, denouncing the Korean Cabinet Minister as traitors who had sold their country, and calling upon patriotic men to risk everything for the purpose of punishing this offence. It is indeed a difficult question to determine whether wisdom dictates or forbids bestowal of rewards upon the Koreans who have been prominently connected with the act of annexation. It is rumoured that of these persons will be rewarded with titles of nobility, but such titles will certainly carry with them a large measure of opprobrium in the eyes of patriotic Koreans.

COAST-WISE TRADE AND THE TARIFF IN KOREA.

In addition to extending the life of the present Korean tariff for 10 years, the Japanese Government has announced that in consideration of the already acquired rights of foreign powers the coast-wise trade of Korea will be opened to foreign vessels during the same time. There can be no question as to the Japanese Government's desire to avert any inconvenient consequence which annexation might have had for foreign nationalities. It would seem, however, that the London Times has expressed a desire that Japan should pay a little more regard to the views of the allied Powers, and this wish, according to Reuter's version, appears in the context of comments on tariff arrangements. But we are inclined to think that the telegram does not accurately represent the views of the great London journal. The strong probability is that the Times does not refer to tariff arrangements, but that its comment has reference to the time when Japan made known to certain foreign Powers her intention of annexing the Peninsula. The Times is understood to hold, and its contentions have received endorsement in other quarters, that Japan would have been acting in better accord with her duties towards her Ally had she made known to London at an earlier date her programme with regard to annexation. It is also possible, and indeed from the more detailed version published by the Mainichi Dempo we gather confirmation of the hypothesis, that the remarks of the Times apply to the Japanese tariff not to the Korean. There is a strong feeling among Englishmen that it should have been possible, and would certainly have been friendly, on Japan's part to take the British Government into confidence at an earlier period of the legislation relating to tariff revision. The residents at the open ports appear to be conspicuously of that manner of thinking.

WHAT appears to be a very useful and practical invention is the recording buoy of E. H. W. Crossley, of Melbourne, which is designed to be released automatically from the bridge deck if a vessel sinks, and a wire holds it on the water's surface over the wreck. The buoy is intended to show the location and depth of wreck, date of disaster, and the course and the port sought at the time of disaster.

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE CONVENTION.

The advocates of the immediate opening of parliamentary institutions in China have compiled and put in large circulation a vehemently worded comment with reference to the Russo-Japanese Convention. The document consists of four counts. The first is why did China give her consent to the Russo-Japanese Convention. The second is why did not China urge upon foreign Powers the fact that the Convention is opposed to the principles of the Open Door and Equal Opportunity. The third is why did not China call upon Russia and Japan for an explanation of the Convention which distinctly violates the terms of the Portsmouth Treaty. And the fourth, what attitude does China intend to take with regard to the effects and the results of this Convention. The circular propounds these four questions for the consideration of the Chinese Government, and winds up by declaring that if China opposes the Convention, she will be ruined; but if she does not oppose it, she will be equally ruined; and that therefore it is more manly and more patriotic to oppose it and perish than to die with folded hands.

CHINA AND THE ANNEXATION.

The annexation of Korea by Japan is not unnaturally furnishing a weapon for the use of the Chinese politicians who advocate an immediate opening of the national assembly. They justly argue that the sooner China equips herself so as to be really capable of self protection, the longer her life of independence is likely to be. Chinese statesmen must by this time have made up their minds that between the integrity and partition of the Middle Kingdom nothing stands except the difficulty of arranging the terms of division. It is not to be supposed that any Western country has the slightest theoretical respect for China's integrity, or for China's independence. Both of these sentimental issues would be cast to the four winds of heaven, at a moment's notice if the Powers could see their way to partition without blood-shed among themselves. Possibly the day may be far distant when such a peaceful act of despoliation will be possible, and therefore the life of the Chinese Empire may have centuries still to run. It is bad, however, to depend wholly upon such a means of safety.

PRINCE ITO AND VISCOUNT TERAUCHI.

At noon on the 29th ult. Viscount Terauchi summoned to his presence the various officials of the Residency-General and spoke to them of the great share that Prince Ito had taken in bringing about the result which had been announced that day. His Excellency said that prior to the proclamation of annexation he had telegraphed to the family of the late Prince in Tokyo requesting that arrangements might be made for conveying intelligence of the fact to the spirit of the deceased statesman.

This suggestion was carried out on the 30th ult., when Prince Hirokuni Ito, as the representative of the family, conducted a solemn ceremonial at the tomb of the illustrious Genro in Tanidare.

On the evening of the same day the inhabitants of the Shinagawa suburb organized a lantern procession to the tomb and gave three "Banzais" in memory of the late Prince.

JAPANESE PRESS ON THE KOREAN SITUATION.

Friday, August 26.

The Fiji Shimpō discusses the annexation question in a manner worthy of the best Fukuzawa traditions. It expresses great sympathy with the Korean people, and declares that Japan fully appreciates the moral suffering imposed upon patriotic Koreans by the loss of their country's independence. The only consolation that can be offered, and it is offered in an evidently sincere spirit, is that the change of Governments will make for the happiness and prosperity of the Korean nation. As for the Japanese, they must not for a moment fall into the mistake of imagining that the Koreans are to be treated like a conquered people. If any such idea be entertained, and if it find expression in attempts to colonize the country, trouble will certainly ensue, and Japan will become, and will deserve to become, an object of general condemnation. Her attitude towards Korea and her treatment of the Koreans will furnish to the world a gauge for measuring the depth of her civilization. It will be her duty to consider that annexation is of the nature of the change effected in Japan itself 43 years ago when an Imperial Government was substituted for feudalism. In short, the Japanese must regard their Korean neighbours as inmates freshly added to their household, not in any sense as servants.

The Mainichi Dempo sets out by quoting the Chinese saying that, when a country has lost its independence, the eternity of its mountains and its streams augments the pain of its patriots. Every Japanese will sympathise with the Koreans on this occasion, and can only ask them to remember how ill things have fared with them under the Government they are now losing. It has been a Government under which useful products were a minimum, and such things as intrigues, political parties and assassinations were abundant. Japan hopes to change all this for the better, and hopes that the Koreans will assist her to do so. If, however, they continue to treat political cabals, riots and assassinations as legitimate weapons, Japan will be obliged to shape her course accordingly. If, on the other hand, they join her frankly in working out their own salvation, they will find her a sincere friend.

The Asahi Shimbun says that it is as difficult to save a tottering country from ruin as it is to pull down a strongly-built Empire. Korea belongs to the former category. Japan can not arrest her fall. On the other hand, one of the outcomes of government by force is inevitably discontent and sedition. Such government will not do in Korea. In part it may be necessary, but on the whole Japan must endeavour to administer the country by peaceful ability.

The Nippon amuses itself with an arithmetical calculation of the area and population added to the Japanese Empire, and the Nichi Nichi Shimbun most wisely deprecates anything in the nature of a jubilant demonstration.

Saturday, August 27.

The Nippon, which generally gets the credit of being a chauvinistic paper, writes in a sympathetic strain about the annexation question. It notes that the measure means an addition of 15 million people to the population of Japan and of 14,123 square ri to her territory. Japan's relations with Korea extend back to a period of some 2,000 years, and the union of the two peoples was in a certain sense inevitable. They are of the same lineage and they ought to join hands as brothers. At the same time, every intelligent Japanese must sympathise profoundly with a nation which sees itself deprived of its independence. The fine old principle which forms a prominent canon of the bushi's creed, the principle of fellow-feeling (aini tagai), finds on this occasion an essential opportunity for display. The Japanese must endeavour to show their Korean comrades that this measure is a joining of families, not a swallowing up of the weak by the strong.

The Fiji Shimpō makes a very natural comment on the proposed appointment of Viscount Terauchi to be Viceroy of Korea. We use the word "Viceroy" advisedly, because the Japanese expression employed is Sōtoku, whereas the expression applied in the case of the Leased Territory in Kwantung is Totoku (Governor-General), and we presume that the intention is to maintain this distinction. The Fiji's comment is that, so far as ability and reputation are concerned, no better choice could be made than that of General Terauchi, but that, if he accepts such an important post, he ought to resign the portfolio of war. The Viceroy of Korea, in the Fiji's opinion, should be a man prepared to devote his whole attention and, if need be, his whole life to that special work. He ought to emulate the example of Lord Cromer in Egypt, instead of treating his viceregal duties as secondary to those of his original appointment at the War Office. Another comment made by the Fiji Shimpō refers to the interesting fact that the Viceroy of Formosa, the Governor-General of Kwantung, and the Viceroy of Korea will all be military men. Our contemporary does not suggest for a moment that these distinguished officials are in any way incompetent, but it expresses a not unnatural wish that a wider range of choice should be made.

There is a considerable amount of discussion about the question of customs dues, but it seems to us that this problem is solved by the method indicated above, namely, that goods imported in Korea or exported thence shall pay duties at the existing rates under the name of transport dues, provided that this arrangement shall apply, in the case of imports, only to goods intended for consumption in Korea; and, in the case of exports, only to goods manufactured or produced in Korea. We refrain from reproducing in detail the comments of Japanese journals upon this subject. It will be sufficient to note that they are pervaded by a spirit of moderation, and that they recognize the necessity of special circumspection in view of the excitement caused in Europe by Japan's new tariff.

Monday, August 29.

The Nippon, which, being under the editorship of an ex-official of the Bank of Japan, enjoys high reputation in financial circles, devotes an article to discussing the large responsibilities that devolve upon this country in the sequel of Korean amalgamation. Thus while the Korean State expenditure aggregates 23 million yen annually, the income amounts to only 14 millions; the principal items of the latter being land tax 6 millions; customs dues 3 millions, and State industries $3\frac{1}{4}$ millions. Thus there remains a debt of some 9 million yen annually, and for some time past this has barely been covered by loans and grants from Japan. In fact, the life of the Korean nation has been one long story of extortions on the part of officials, and gradual extermination of the wealth-earning spirit among the people. A large part of the country is in a desolate condition and even the nominally prosperous portions present but a poor spectacle. How to discharge satisfactorily the duty she has now assumed towards 14 millions of Korean people is indeed a great problem for Japan.

The Asahi Shimbun writes in much the same strain. It sets out by noting the signal fact that during the past 13 years two large over-sea countries have been added to the Japanese dominions. That is sufficiently remarkable, but when we come to compare the two cases, we find some discouraging differences. Thus while Formosa measures only 13,000 square miles, the area of Korea is 82,000. In other words, the Korea Peninsula is more than six times as extensive as the island of Formosa, yet while the latter has 4 million inhabitants, the former has only 12 or 13 millions. In short, the areas are as six to one, and the population only as three to one. More striking still is the contrast between the over-sea trades of the two countries. In Korea's case the figures are 43 millions for the general over-sea trade and 5 millions for the precious metals, making, say, 50 millions in all; whereas the trade of Formosa, including her commerce with Japan, aggregates 30 millions annually, this being more than one half of the Korean figure. Most significant of all are the returns of State revenue. In Korea the people pay only 14 million yen annually to the exchequer, whereas in Formosa they pay 5 millions. Of course these contrasts were not by any means so striking when Japan added Formosa to her Empire, and if they now convey a pessimistic idea of Korean resources, they also suggest what may fairly be anticipated as the result of Japan's sway in the Peninsula.

After all, the number of foreign residents in Korea is very insignificant. They total only 777, and among them there are no less than 362 missionaries. Divided according to nationalities, they are:—Americans 464; English 153; French 87; German 33; Russian 14; Greeks 8; Italians 7; Norwegians 5; Belgians 3; Portuguese 2; and Spaniards 1. These figures show that, contrary to what is usually the case in the Orient, American interests in Korea are larger than British.

FORMOSA.

Saturday, August 27.

A telegram from the Governor-General's office in Formosa dated the 24th inst. says that the Gaogan aborigines have decided to surrender en bloc, and that on the 22nd inst. a large deputation of them set out for Gilan in order to tender their submission. In other districts also of the field, there appears to be a strong disposition to surrender.

OVER 2,000 cases of dysentery are so far reported from Kagawa prefecture since the first occurrence this year. In Kanagawa prefecture there have been 168 cases of typhoid fever reported up to the 22nd ult.

CHINA.

Saturday, August 27.

It is reported that although Tang Shao-yi has recovered from his sickness, he has not yet shown any signs of proceeding to Peking to take up his new appointment. Meanwhile his fellow-citizens in Canton are said to be getting up an agitation against him. Their apprehension is that if he takes office, he will certainly carry out the agreement with foreign Powers as to the financing of the Yeh-Han and Chuan-Han Railways.

The telegraph says that their Excellencies Hsu Shih-chang and Yu Lang have memorialized the Throne in the sense that pardon should be extended to Kang Yu-wei and Lieung Kwei-chu, and that men of their stamp should be appointed to office. The memorialists further urge that no time should be lost in enforcing a mandate against the wearing of queues.

Sunday, August 28.

Viceroy Shih Liang is now in Peking, whither he is said to have proceeded for the purpose of discussing some important problems. Among them are the raising of a loan to ease Manchurian finances; the colonization of Mongolia; the navigation of the Sungali River, and the question of Korean settlers in Manchuria. With regard to this last point, there said to be 500,000 of such Koreans, and apparently the policy of the Chinese Government is to send them all back to Korea.

One rumour has it that this visit of the Viceroy is to be interpreted as preliminary to his transfer to another post, in which event his successor is expected to be either Mr. Ting, formerly Governor of Amur, or Mr. Yuan, now Viceroy of Canton.

Very pitiful accounts reach Mukden of the floods at Hsinmintun. The number of deaths already ascertained is said to be 200, and the destruction of property is very great, with, of course, resulting distress and suffering.

The Peking Daily News attributes the recent changes in Chinese Government circles to the solicitude which the Prince Regent feels in consequence of three events. The first is the conclusion of the new Russo-Japanese Convention; the second is the attitude of Great Britain towards Tibet, and the third is the pressure exerted by France in Yunnan.

It is reported by telegraph from Peking that the advocates of speedily opening a national assembly have propounded three questions to the Government. The first is whether the Waiwupu has consented to the new Russo-Japanese Convention; the second, whether Japan and Russia have been asked to explain the discrepancy between the provisions of that Convention and those of the Portsmouth Treaty. And the third, what step China proposes to take with regard to this Convention.

The death is announced of his Excellency Lu Chuan-lin, a distinguished member of the Council of State, who has held various important posts, as the Viceroyalty of Liang-Kwang, the Presidency of the Censorate, of the Board of Ceremonies and of the Board of Revenue. Mr. Lu had been ailing for some time. He graduated in 1862, so that he must have been about 75 years of age.

Monday, August 29.

The Asahi's Peking telegrams show that the absorption of Korea into the Japanese Empire has created much excitement, or simulated excitement, in certain quarters of the Chinese capital. The Peking Daily News has a leading article which extends to the length of four columns, and which, judging from the telegram, is couched in strong terms of condemnation and ire. It speaks of the Japanese as deliberate treaty-breakers, since the independence of Korea was guaranteed by the China-Japan Treaty, and it denounces the Japanese Government for tyranny towards a weak neighbour and the Japanese people for bullying and masterful ways in dealing with the people of the Peninsula. The Peking paper called upon the nations to take some action similar to that taken by them formerly in the cause of Greece. This is the bare outline of the article, which is said to be couched in very abusive terms.

Another journal, the Ting-king Ji-pao draws the inference that if Korea, whose independence was so much talked of among the nations for several years back, has now been swallowed up incontinently by Japan, it may very well happen that the professions of the Powers in favour of Chinese independence will prove equally illusory. It therefore, behoves China to set her house in order and prepare to defend herself.

With regard to the Shanghai vernacular papers, the telegraph attributes to them an attitude very similar to that assumed by the Peking journal last quoted. They do not devote much space to bemoaning Korea's fate. Their view is rather that China should be warned as to the instability of international guarantees and should prepare herself against all contingencies.

THE TORCHLIGHT PROCESSION.

We observe that our Tokyo American contemporary exhibits its usual sensational tendency with regard to the dimensions of the lantern procession in Tokyo on the night of the 29th ult. It says that fully 30,000 lantern-bearers swelled the ranks. The Asahi Shimbun estimates the number at 20,000, and thus we have two journals, both speaking presumably from personal observation, and differing to the extent of 10,000. The Japan Times puts the figure at 6,000, which is probably very much nearer the mark. A moment's reflection shows the extreme improbability that anything like twenty or thirty thousand persons took part in the demonstration. Even if marshalled four abreast with all the precision of a military movement, 30,000 lantern-bearers would extend to a length of something like 7,500 yards, or about 4 miles. It is always easy in Tokyo to get together three or four thousands of youths where a picturesque jollification of any kind is on the tapis. We do not find the slightest fault with these young people. But we do say that the organizers of such a fête are entirely wanting in the fine feeling of chivalry which formed a prominent canon of bushido in its palmy days. The Hochi Shimbun is naturally indignant against us on account of the comments which we ventured to address to our contemporary's account in connexion with this affair. We were quite prepared to be attacked for what we wrote and we can only say that if the Hochi Shimbun appreciated the spirit of our comments it would never have lent itself to a demonstration of the kind. It is observable that the Yorodzu Choho advertises a similar torchlight procession for this evening, and that it makes things as easy as possible for the participators in the display. Par nobile fratrum.

FOREIGN TRAVELLERS BY RAIL IN JAPAN.

Baron Goto, Minister of State for Communications, has issued an Injunction to the railway staff. It sets out by observing that there is a constant increase in the number of foreign tourists visiting Japan, and that it behoves the Railway authorities to treat such tourists with all possible courtesy, and to make things as comfortable for them as can conveniently be done, remembering always that differences of custom and language create difficulties of intercourse. On the other hand if any traveller wilfully disregards the railway regulations, interferes with the comfort of his fellow travellers, or behaves in a defiant manner, there is to be no hesitation about subjecting him to proper control.

Following in the immediate wake of the European tourist who recently forgot himself so signally when travelling in Japan, this notification is evidently inspired, in part at any rate, by that event. Our own observation, extending over many years, is that it has been the invariable custom on Japanese railways to treat foreign travellers with exceptional deference. The fact is proverbial, and Baron Goto must be as familiar with it as is anybody else. If there were any room for improvement in this respect the correction has been supplied since the railways passed into the possession of the State, for it is now notorious that foreigners are treated with conspicuous civility. So far therefore as concerns the first part of Baron Goto's Injunction, it appears to us quite superfluous. But as a preface to the second part, it is undoubtedly useful. Ninety-nine foreigners out of every hundred appreciate the demeanour of the Japanese and refrain from trading upon it. But the hundredth may be an exception, and if he meets with his deserts, we need not have any pity for him.

FUNERAL OF MR. SUSUMU KONDO.

The funeral of Mr. Susumu Kondo, second son of Mr. Rempei Kondo, took place at Seishōji in Tokyo on the afternoon of the 26th ultimo, and was attended by nearly all the notables of Tokyo, to the number of about 600. The death of this young man was among the saddest events of the recent inundations. In company with three fellow-students he repaired to his father's beautiful villa in the neighbourhood of Karuizawa early in August, and the tempest on the 11th and 12th ult. produced a landslide which carried the house into the bed of the river, Yu-no-sawa, and brought sudden death to the four visitors. The body of Mr. S. Kondo was recovered several days later at a point some ten miles below the scene of the accident, but the bodies of his companions have not yet been discovered, in spite of unremitting search. Universal sympathy was felt and expressed with the bereaved parents and family of Mr. Kondo who was only twenty years of age, and whose scholastic successes presaged a distinguished career.

MATTERS RELATING TO AMALGAMATION.

We read in the Japanese papers that the total amount of debts by the Korean Government to the people in the form of bonds is 14,600,000 yen. This debt will be simply changed into Japanese bonds. Further, there is a sum of 17 million yen which has been lent in yearly installments by Japan to Korea. This debt will be wiped out, as Japan cannot owe money to herself.

With regard to the question of laws, it is said to have been determined that the simplest way of dealing with the change of legislative authority is to issue an Imperial Rescript cancelling all laws in operation, and at the same time to issue another Rescript giving validity to the same laws, but in the name of the Emperor of Japan. As for foreign conventional rights, everything will be preserved except consular jurisdiction.

The members of the Imperial family will be given rank as Princes and will be recognized as such on all public occasions, and the present Princes, of whom there are a great number, as well as noblemen like the Prime Minister, will receive patents of Japanese nobility from Count down to Baron.

The Fiji Shimpō publishes a special number in memory of the amalgamation. The leading article in this number recognizes that patriotic Koreans must be expected to feel some chagrin about the loss of their country's independence, but this is far outweighed by the material and moral benefits that will accrue to Korea from becoming a part of a highly progressive country like Japan.

THE ELEVATED RAILWAY IN TOKYO.

On the 30th ultimo the Tokyo City Assembly unanimously agreed to sanction the construction of an over-head electric tramway. We have several times alluded to this project, and explained that it may be briefly described as a programme for running two lines at right angles to each other, one from Shinagawa to Asakusa along the sea coast and the bank of the Sumida; the other from Shinjuku to Honjo. In deciding to grant the application the Assembly attached numerous conditions, some of them more or less incapable of fulfilment. Still the evident intention is to grant a charter for the proposed lines, and in view of this fact, quite an excitement has been caused among the citizens. They appear to be strongly opposed to a project which would greatly impair the beauty of the city, disturb the rest of its inhabitants, and create a dangerous method of transport. Steps are in progress to protest against the Assembly's action. For our own part we are entirely sceptical as to the materialization of the project.

Practically all the Ward Assemblies of Tokyo are raising their voices against the proposed elevated railway. They think that such an enterprise is not suited to the present condition of the city; that it would injure the view; obstruct the sunlight; create an unendurable din, and expose householders not only to an intolerable loss of privacy but also to great danger. In the face of this opposition it seems unlikely that the project will materialize. The Asahi Shimbun has a most sensible article on this subject. It set out by expressing grave doubts as to the financial prospects of such an undertaking. The cost of construction would be much greater than that of the existing street trams, and yet the latter do not yield an adequate return at their present rate of fare. Therefore the Asahi thinks that the proper course is to complete the trams. When these are extended to a distance of 220 miles, it will be time enough to think of some additional means of communication.

THE TOYO S.S. COMPANY.

The dissensions in the Tanko S.S. Company were finally adjusted on the 23rd ult. by the intervention of the Minister of the Imperial Household. The great question at issue was the election of Directors of the Seikosho, and the arrangement made is that on the present occasion the Directors nominated by Mr. Murota shall be recognized, but in future the power of election shall be vested in the Committee.

In a recent issue we stated that fuller investigations seemed to prove the liability of the Hoden Oil Company for the two tank steamers ordered by the Toyo S.S. Company. These claims total 3,400,000 yen, and the payment of such a sum into the coffers of the Toyo S.S. Company would have materially changed the latter's outlook. The S.S. Company's shares at once rose in the market. But ever since that announcement was made things seem to have been in a state of abeyance, and it is now openly charged that a settlement satisfactory to the Toyo Kisen Kaisha cannot possibly be hoped for so long as negotiations are conducted by Mr. Asano who is interested in both companies.

THE CHINESE ARMY.

Mr. Yin, the former representative of China at the German Court, who has just returned to China to take office at the Board of War, is said to have recommended that another division of troops shall be organized at Kilin and one also in Amur. Thus each of these provinces would have two divisions. If to these we add the three divisions of local guards already existing, we have a total of five military divisions altogether in Manchuria.

With regard to the measures recently inaugurated in Manchuria for sending away all Korean subjects engaged in agriculture within the limits of the Three Eastern Provinces, the Central Government is said to have consulted the local officials, and to have found them unfavourably disposed towards the project. This question assumes added interest now that the persons concerned have become Japanese subjects. The disapproval of the Chinese provincial officials may prove very opportune.

THE AFFAIR OF THE AUSTRIAN BARON.

A great deal of interest seems to centre among the citizens of Tokyo in the conduct of an Austrian Baron who is said to have behaved with extraordinary rudeness on the railway platform at Nagoya. The case has been brought before the Japanese courts of law, and we therefore refrain from publishing particulars, though we have every reason for believing that the matter will be settled in a less formal manner.

Tokyo papers say that the Austrian Baron who got into trouble with the railway authorities, has been induced to write a letter of apology, and it is thought probable that this will end the unpleasant incident. No foreigner, especially the eminently courteous Austrian people, will for a moment defend the action of this traveller. Europeans and Americans resent his conduct just as much as the Japanese can resent it. The sooner the matter is buried in oblivion, the better.

BUSINESS NOTES.

A new fishing company has been formed in Tokyo by a group of tolerably well known business-men. Its capital is put at 2 million yen and its scene of operations will be the coast of Korea.

There is talk of the Japan Warehouse Company being dissolved. We have had occasions several times to allude to the affairs of this Company. Its assets are now said to be 300,000 yen and its liabilities about 230,000, so that its affairs can be wound up without any inconvenience.

Again the Dai Nippon Marine Products Company's affairs are attracting public attention. The Directors have made a call upon the shareholders, but the latter have refused to respond, their contention being that there is no opportunity for employing money advantageously, and that the Directors have promised not to make any further call during the current year.

The number of shares taken delivery of on the 30th ult. on the Tokyo Stock Exchange was 92,540, being less than the July number by 4,400. The total sum paid was 8,422,200 yen, being 1,478,490 yen less than the amount for the preceding month; and the average price per share was 69.399, being 12.035 less than the July price.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Monday, August 29.

Contrary to expectation the market was dull yesterday. It had been supposed that amalgamation would exercise an inspiring effect, but that hope was not fulfilled.

Wednesday, August 31.

Things were notably dull on the Stock Exchange yesterday. The annexation of Korea is now being utilized by the Bears.

Thursday, September 1.

There was a slight improvement of tone yesterday owing to the fact that the balance of trade had been favourable for the last part of August. But scarcely any business was done. We append the quotations for October delivery:—

VICTIMS OF AVIATION.

The New York Press gives a list of the victims of aviation, of which it says the Hon. C.S. Rolls is the fourteenth. The list is as follows:—

September 17, 1908.—Lieut. Thomas E. Selfridge, U. S. A., killed in a fall with Orville Wright at Fort Myer.

May 6, 1909.—Lieutenant Caldera, of the Italian Army, fell with Wright machine in Rome and was killed.

September 7.—E. Lefebvre, killed in Wright machine in Jusivy-sur-Orge, France.

September 17.—Enea Rossi, Italian, killed in Rome in machine of his own invention.

September 22.—Capt. Louis F. Ferber, killed at Boulogne, France.

December 8.—Antonio Fernandez, Spanish, killed at Nice, falling 1,000 feet after motor exploded.

January 4, 1910.—Léon Delagrangé, killed in Bordeaux, France.

April 10.—Hubert Leblon, French, killed by falling on rocks in San Sebastian, Spain, with Blériot machine.

May 13.—Chauvette Michelin, killed at Lyons, France.

June 2.—M. Zogily, killed at Budapest.

June 17.—Eugene Speyer, killed at San Francisco.

June 18.—Herr Robl, killed at Stettin, Germany.

June 3.—Charles Wachter, killed at Reims, France, in Antoinette monoplane.

July 12.—Charles S. Rolls, killed at Bournemouth, England, by fall of Wright biplane.

THE FLOODS.

According to official estimates the losses caused by the recent floods are as follow:—

Area of Rice fields inundated	261,856 cho
" upland	200,720 "
Value of Rice destroyed	38,720,000 yen
Value of upland destroyed	14,180,000 "
Amount of silk cocoons destroyed...	182,343 koku
Value of cocoons at 35 yen per koku.	638,100 yen
Area of mulberry plantations devastated	25,131 cho

It has been roughly stated that the autumnal silk crop was totally destroyed. But that is an exaggeration. The destruction does not exceed 39 per-cent. of the cocoons and 17 per-cent. of the mulberry plantations.

Meanwhile, the high temperature which has prevailed since the 22nd inst. is thought likely to prove of the greatest possible benefit to all crops which are not actually destroyed.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

The death of Professor Ume, at the early age of 50, is a great blow to the world of jurisprudence in Japan. He expired on the 25th ult. at the Tai Han Hospital in Seoul, the fatal disease being typhoid fever. What made the event specially sad was that the distinguished patient had been understood to be out of danger. Professor Ume studied law not only in Japan, but also in France and Germany. He had a large share in drafting the new Japanese codes, and at one time he held the post of Vice-Minister of Education. His last appointment was that of legal adviser to the Korean Government, and in that capacity he accomplished a memorable work in drafting the new codes for the Korean nation.

Viscount Sone's condition is said to be now quite hopeless. He has lost consciousness, and the end cannot be deferred for many hours.

We regret to learn from Japanese newspapers that the distinguished Chinese scholar, Mr. Shigeno Aneki, is lying perilously ill at Yu-ga-wara. Mr. Shigeno is one of the most illustrious of Japanese historians. He is in his 84th year, and very little hope seems to be entertained of his recovery.

News comes from Shuzenji spa in Izu that Mr. Natsume Sōseki, the well-known literateur is lying dangerously ill. His disease seems to be of the nature of cancer in the stomach, and few hopes are entertained for his recovery. Mr. Natsume has written several successful romances in the foreign style.

The Vladivostock Russian Press is said to have been warned by the St. Petersburg Government not to indulge in any expression of extreme views. One journal published in that city inserted some strong writing when amalgamation was pending. It spoke of Japan having risen from the position of a third class insular State to that of a first-class continental Power, and it drew some disquieting inferences as to the outcome of such a change. But when amalgamation came within actual sight, all such utterances were suspended. Silence and circumspection were the words of command. That, doubtless may be construed as an evidence of Russia's estimate of the duties imposed on her by the new Convention.

The turbulent weather of the last two days is not to be unfavourably interpreted. There was a central depression near the east coast on the 28th ult., but it has passed out into the Pacific, and the expectation now is that a spell of fine and hot weather will be experienced.

An important point, which has nevertheless been little emphasized, is made by the Kokumin Shimbun. It is that Korea never was independent until Japan helped to make her so. She was a Chinese protectorate through all these centuries, and it was not until Japan, a few years ago, negotiated a treaty with her on terms of equality that she acquired a claim to be called independent. It did not take many years to prove that independence is impossible for her, and that her fate is to be under the wing of another country. Japan made her independence and now unmakes it that is all there is to be said.

The Imperial Household in China having contributed 100,000 taels for the relief of the sufferers by the recent inundations in Japan, the Japanese Imperial Household has expressed its gratitude by telegraph.

From a place called Karameki in Echigo comes news that on the 23rd ult. there occurred an outburst of kerosene oil amounting to 600 koku. After two ebullitions the outflow ceased, but on removing a quantity of oil sand which obstructed the issue, the fountain recommenced to play on the 29th ult. and produced 1,500 koku of excellent oil in the next 24 hours. This well belongs to the Nippon Oil Company, who acquired the land some time ago from the Meiji Company.

The Emperor of Austria-Hungary having donated a sum of 10,000 francs for the relief of the sufferers by the floods in Japan, His Majesty the Emperor of Japan has telegraphed an expression of thanks.

On Friday is the Nihyaku-toka, the period so critical to the rice crop. By the time these words are in print it will be known whether a centre of depression which made its appearance near the Ryukyu Islands on the 31st ult is destined to travel towards the Chinese continent or towards the islands of Japan. In neither event is it likely to do great damage.

Cholera having made its appearance on the steamer Manchuria, by which Prince Tsai-shun is travelling, she has gone into quarantine for 10 days, and his Highness will remain in Japan for that time. He is to visit Yokosuka on Friday, and the Minister of State for the Navy will go there to receive him.

THE BOOKSHELF.

Maradick at Forty, by HUGH WALPOLE.
London, Macmillan & Co.

THE effect of environment upon character is an interesting, if not an entirely novel, theme. Whether of course any place—even on the mystically charming Cornish Riviera—could work so weirdly upon Mr. Maradick and the other visitors to Treliss, is a question into which it would not be well to enter too closely; but the fact remains that Mr. Walpole has made of it an excellent peg on which to hang a generally excellent tale. The hero is a middle-aged man whose idea of married life for twenty years has been to wait hand and foot upon a spoilt, petulant and utterly unappreciative wife. Something in the air of Treliss causes him to rebel, with excellent effect to his matrimonial menage. Incidentally he becomes sponsor—and master of ceremonies—to a romantic attachment between a delightfully breezy youth and an entrancing if somewhat mysterious damsel—which ends, as all such attachments should, in an elopement. Indeed, we are inclined to think that the part played by Maradick as one of the conspirators in this momentous affair acted at least as tonically as the mystic atmosphere of Treliss. Nevertheless that charming resort is clearly a dangerous place for staid married couples, and especially for the exponents of petticoat government in the world of matrimony.

The Heart of Noel, by FRED WHISHAW.
London, George Bell & Sons.

It is rather unkind to leave a man at the bottom of a deserted mine-shaft in Rhodesia and then to step into his shoes in the old country as the devoted nephew of a doting but wealthy maiden-aunt. When it is added that the fond aunt in question is the possessor of a charming niece, whose heart the long-lost nephew is expected to win, the prospect is alluring enough, no doubt—to a certain type of mind—to make ill deeds done. However, when the real nephew's bones are not, after all, rotting at the bottom of the Rhodesian mine, and he arrives on the scene in the flesh, the position of the usurper necessarily develops a disagreeable aspect. Such, with sundry attempts of various suitors to entrap the heart of Noel, is the general outline of Mr. Whishaw's story. There is nothing great about it, but it will suffice to woo some passing hours, and (we must add) it is certainly a few degrees superior to the same author's Caxborough Scandal.

The Reins of Chance, by C. RANGER GULL.
London: T. Fisher Unwin.

THE central idea of Mr. Gull's latest sensational story is the regulation of that gambling instinct which, the author would have his readers believe, is ineradicably implanted in the human breast. With this end in view, some Rothschild among financiers elaborates a scheme—with, strange to say, the approval of the British Government—for the erection in the heart of London of a colossal gambling-hell—or perhaps we should say, palace—on the approved Monte Carlo plan. Naturally this arouses the strongest opposition from the proprietors of the famous Casino, and even the life of the great financier who is the moving spirit in the rival scheme becomes the object of persistent murderous attack. A ruined gambler whom he meets on the Riviera becomes his aide-de-camp, and a series of hairbreadth escapes ensue. A Japanese assassin plays a part in the blood-and-thunder game—we may remark that it is becoming the fashion among a certain school of writers, to select a Japanese as the instrument of murderous crime; and the erotic element is supplied by the financier's charming daughter, before whose feet the erstwhile gambler falls. Like its predecessor, The Terror by Night, this is a good tale of its kind, but it makes unusually heavy demands on the reader's credulity.

Kinsmen's Clay, by MARY CROSBIE. London: Methuen & Co.

BOTH in its style and in its trueness to life, Kinsmen's Clay forms a marked contrast to the Le-Queux Ranger-Gull type of fiction. Mrs. Crosbie writes with delicacy and charm—albeit she shares with so many writers of her sex the weakness of occasional obscurity; she has the gift of the raconteur and considerable ability in characterization. Lady "Dan" is a charming personage—even more convincingly portrayed than the real heroine, Veronica, whom a turn of fortune's wheel transfers from the rank of a dependent to that of a millionaire's daughter. The scene of the story is laid in Ireland, and the decayed condition of the old families in the "distressful isle" forms a suitable background for the various incidents involved. Mrs. Crosbie is more successful with her female than with her male characters; but the tale, if leaning overmuch to the pathetic side, will nevertheless amply repay perusal.

The Kingdom of Slender Swords, by HALLIE ERMINIE RIVES (Mrs. Post Wheeler); with a Foreword by His Excellency Baron Makino. Illustrations in color by A. B. Wenzell. Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis.

THE primary purpose of a novel is not, like that of poetry, to please. The successful novel is always, in a sense, didactic. It has a moral to inculcate. It is a historical or a social or a psychological study. But if the propaganda predominates too persistently over the pleasing elements the novel is a failure. From this point of view Mrs. Wheeler's latest book is not a failure. It is the author's interpretation of a most fascinating people and land, an account of what she saw during her sojourn in The Kingdom of Slender Swords; and few transient foreigners have used their eyes to better advantage. She is at once minute and faithful in her portrayal of the character and feelings of the Japanese. She has caught with marvellous insight the spirit and ethos of the people; and she has, withal, woven these, with excellent craftsmanship, into a most ingenious story.

Mrs. Wheeler is, in some respects, a skilful storyteller—of the Grimm-Brothers type. Her plots are well constructed; her episodes brilliantly introduced. She knows how to make literary capital of the latest newspaper gossip. The presence of the aeroplane, the mention of the death of the King and many similar touches lend an air of verisimilitude and up-to-dateness to the narrative. Even the somewhat fantastic atomic dissolution machine is ingeniously conceived and not inartistically handled.

The reader can not forget, however, that he is in the realm of fiction—a somewhat overwrought variety of fiction. One of the most characteristic features of Mrs. Wheeler's stories is the unerring opportuneness with which all things work together for good to them that are called according to the author's purpose. The hero always turns up just in the nick of time to rescue the heroine from unpleasant circumstances; and when the hero's aeroplane falls crashing to the earth it tosses him down right at the feet of his lady-love, who, by a most curious coincidence of circumstances, had come into possession of, and gotten aboard, a steam yacht anchored at precisely the right spot in Yokohama harbour. The whole book bristles with coincidences that fairly make the reader's head swim, and all the villains are neatly dispatched at the end.

The construction of the plot is rather better than the development of the individual characters, though some of the characters are not bad in a way. The villain, Dr. Bersonin, and the scapegrace, Phil Ware, are both, from the stand point of the Society for the study of Murder as a Fine Art, well executed. Aloysius Thorn, who of course is Lafcadio Hearn, is well conceived but feebly drawn; though perhaps this very faintness lends to the dramatic effect of his mysterious appearance.

By far the most artistic creation in the book is Haru—who would have been much more charming as "O Haru San"—however much we may disapprove of her morally. As a portrayal of Japanese ethical ideals as an embodiment of the Japanese patriotic spirit, even if somewhat idealized, she is dramatically a success, and affords to the book, aside from its value as a work of description and travel, the best excuse for its existence. In his "Foreword" Baron Makino says, "The sacrifice of the girl Haru may seem unreal, but such is the dominant idea of duty and sacrifice with the Japanese, that in certain emergencies it is not at all unlikely that we should behold her real prototype in life." The whole transaction is, of course, so absolutely repugnant to all our inborn and inbred feeling as to make it almost impossible for us to appreciate the beauty and heroism of it; but if the Japanese have exalted fidelity to country and lord out of all proportion to all other virtues, may it not be true that we have so highly and enthusiastically extolled chastity—feminine chastity—as to make some other virtues appear unduly small by comparison. Christianity forbids the doing of that which is inherently wrong, whatever the end in view may be; but we can bow to the heroism of the motive without condoning the act. It was the tragedy of a deluded soul—and it is the tragedy of hundreds of deluded souls. Who shall say that this woman who gave her life, her body, her most delicate sensibilities to what she considered the call of duty was less noble and less pure than the silly fool who driven by sentimental gush in a dark cave in the arms of a man—however innocently—whom she had known only a few days. The one sacrificed her finer feelings, the other was sadly deficient in them.

Barbara and Daunt, and their courtship, belong to the stock in trade of the cheapest romance-mongers who cater to the perverted tastes of depraved literary appetites. Being himself a Virginian, the reviewer feels it incumbent upon him to apologize for the prostitution by a Virginia authoress of Old Virginia family names, and to vindicate the Virginia girl in the eyes of those who might be led to suppose her in any sense typically depicted in Barbara. Most emphatically she is not. The Virginia girl is as refined, as modest, as reserved as she could be, without being finicky and prudish. She does not scrape acquaintance with strangers and fall into their arms a few hours after meeting them, nor would she dream of committing a number of other exceedingly silly follies of which Barbara was guilty.

It is usually supposed that, on the whole, the ideas and conduct of the hero and heroine of a novel are at least approved by the author, or even embody his ideals and conceptions. It is extremely probable that they mould, or help to mould, those of many of the immature minds that imbibe from them "the inspired gospel" of romance. No one then but a person of the highest standards of social propriety, of honor and purity, is fit to furnish mental pabulum for our youth. Such qualifications, I fear, are not always possessed by that ever increasing army of writers who attempt to supply the perennial demand for the "dime novel which sells for one dollar and a half." These novels are often, in their lowering of the ideal of social propriety and in their blunted sense of honor, more subtly and perniciously immoral than the book which candidly deals with questions of social irregularity.

GREAT LESSONS TO BE LEARNED FROM THE FLOODS.

The above is the title of a very thoughtful article which appeared in the Tokyo Nichi Nichi Shimbun on the 17th inst. It discusses the conditions which render such fearful inundations as those from which the country is now suffering possible, and the writer asks how long Japan is to be left exposed to such ravages as the raging waters have made this summer? Here is the gist of the Nichi Nichi's comments on the existing situation throughout the country:—Full reports have not yet reached us from every locality which has suffered, but according to statistics furnished by the Home Office, up to 9 a.m. on the 15th inst. over 1,100 persons had been drowned, about 4,000 houses had been wholly or partly submerged or had been carried away, over 400 bridges had been destroyed, and 15 serious landslides had taken place. In the Tōkyō Fū alone 200,000 people have suffered from the flood. These are only rough calculations, and the number of sufferers will certainly prove to be much greater than these figures indicate. While feeling the greatest sympathy for those who have lost their property or, worse still, near relations, we deplore the fact that our country is in such a backward condition as to render what has occurred possible. So few are the precautions taken against such disasters in our metropolis that, as the result of one week's rain only, the gas and the electric light were rendered almost useless, and in Yokohama the water-works proved incapable of resisting the pressure caused by the extra flow of water. It goes without saying that the damage to the railway in the flooded parts has been very great. The cause was small, but the effects were tremendous. For a country which boasts of ranking among the foremost nations to remain in this forty third year of Meiji still unprotected from floods says little for the material foundation of our civilisation. We have imitated foreign countries in various ways, but we lack thoroughness and solidity in what we do. Mentally we are wanting in decision and purpose. We are fond of espousing new causes, of introducing new systems, of applying new theories, so much so that foreigners speak of Japan as a land of "isms." If our material and immaterial civilization to-day can be described in a few words, then instability and artificiality are the terms we feel bound to apply to them. Were the country's finances, industry and entire administration in a thoroughly sound condition, efficient precautions against the possibility of such devastation as we have witnessed would certainly have been taken long ago. It is the more remote causes of the recent calamity that demand our attention. Till we deal with these in a satisfactory manner, repeated disasters of the kind we have recently encountered can not be avoided.

ANALYSIS OF A CRITICISM.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 27.)

ON the 23rd of February 1904, that is to say, just after the war with Russia had commenced, Japan concluded with Korea a treaty containing the following clause:—"The Imperial Government of Japan definitively guarantees the independence and territorial integrity of the Korean Empire." To-day, just six years and six months after the conclusion of that agreement, Japan annexes Korea. A striking contrast is thus offered between actual facts and written promises. Such, in a nut-shell, is the gist of an article published by the Japan Chronicle under the heading of "Treaties and Obligations." The Japanese Government are accused and condemned of bad faith by our Kobe contemporary. Slight is not lost of the fact that on November the 17th, 1905, another treaty was signed "in which the guarantee of the independence of the country was dropped"—we quote verbatim from the Japan Chronicle,—"its place being taken by an undertaking under which the Japanese Government guaranteed to maintain the security and respect the dignity of the Korean Imperial House." Yet, with that second treaty lying on the editorial desk, and with its own admissions looking it straight in the face, the Japan Chronicle does not hesitate to allege that "Japan is still morally bound by the terms of the document guaranteeing the independence and territorial integrity of Korea." In one breath the Japan Chronicle admits that the guarantee of national independence was "dropped" and "its place taken" by a guarantee relating to the security and dignity of the Korean Imperial House only; and in the next breath it claims that the old treaty, though dropped and radically altered by mutual consent, is still morally binding on Japan. If such a process of reasoning be tendered seriously, it must be addressed to readers of a special order of intelligence. Yet it seems to satisfy the Japan Chronicle. That journal, having advanced the strange proposition that the formal dropping of an inter-state compact and the substitution of another compact of incomparably smaller scope still leaves the validity of the old covenant unimpaired, and having made no attempt to prove so startling a proposition, proceeds, more suo, to assume that the demonstration has been completed, and to build on this imaginary foundation an edifice of criticism and condemnation. "Probably, it will be replied," writes the Chronicle, "that other Powers have found it necessary to disregard solemn undertakings and assurances when circumstances militated against their observance." Now if any publicist were to accuse the Japan Chronicle of alleging that Japan "disregards solemn undertakings and assurances when circumstances militate against their observance," that journal would doubtless repel the accusation with warmth and denounce it as a libellous misrepresentation. Nevertheless such is the position taken by our contemporary; and not content with this gross accusation against the Government of Japan, it then proceeds to condemn the Japanese nation because no body of publicists in this country have hitherto shown sufficient respect for national engagements to openly criticize failure to observe them. The charges are all definite and explicit, but the proof on which they rest is conspicuous by its absence. Consider the sequence of ideas:—

1. Japan signs a certain agreement with Korea.
2. Japan drops that agreement and replaces it by another, Korea being an assenting party.
3. Japan acts in accordance with the new agreement and ignores the old.
4. Japan stands convicted of disregarding solemn undertakings.
5. The Japanese nation, not having attacked their Government for breach of international faith, must be condemned for "doing nothing towards the building up of international morality."

We recognize that the Japan Chronicle's arrangement reads more like a romance than a sermon, but that is not our fault. We have merely stated its premises and conclusions in their bald and unadorned form. And we have to note that our contemporary appears to be sincere and actually appears to have some hope of obtaining its readers' credence.

MINISTERS AND THE EMPIRE'S NEEDS.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 27.)

(COMMUNICATED.)

IT cannot be claimed for the leaders of either of the principal political parties in the United Kingdom that they have done much in a practical way towards the consolidation of the Empire. There have been brilliant exceptions—Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, for example, on the one hand, and Lord ROSEBURY on the other; and the Unionist party has generally been credited with good intentions in the direction of real Imperialism. Unfortunately, however, of late years—since 1906, to be precise—the Imperial idea has been completely at the mercy of a Ministry swayed by anti-Imperial forces. It would perhaps be unreasonable to expect a Liberal Government, dependent for its political existence on Little-Englanders, Little-Navyites and other friends of every country but their own, to effect any advancement of the Imperial cause; but the charge may justly be brought against them that the promises which the pressure of over-sea opinion (for the most part) has wrung from the present exponents of Parochialism at Westminster have proved as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. The practical Imperialist, who comes to look for performance, for fair deeds to match the flow of fair words, is compelled to turn empty away. In short, the policy of Ministers (to use the words of one of their critics which conveys the sentiments of many) has consisted of "sonorous speeches on the duty of statesmen to safeguard the State, and on the penalties to be incurred for neglecting such duties, pledges to maintain the two-Power standard and—a conspicuous absence of all effective action." The establishment of the Dominions Department of the Colonial Office forms a case in point. The true worth of that institution, heralded from Downing Street with a flourish of trumpets, appears to be have been accurately measured by the self-Governing Colonies, where it has been received with no enthusiasm whatever. So much at least is evidenced by a Blue-book containing correspondence with the over-sea Dominions on the results and resolutions of the Imperial Conference of 1907. In this volume the inner history of the formation of the new Department is revealed, and is thus summarized in a London journal:—

The treatment of Mr. Deakin's proposals for establishing an Imperial Secretariat made in 1907 was the test case which enabled judgment to be given on the real importance which Ministers attach to the principle and policy of Imperial Union. Mr. Deakin proposed that a real Secretariat, outside the Colonial Office, and dependent on the Imperial Conference itself, should be established to watch over the interests of the Conference during its periods of abeyance, and so bestow on it some kind of permanent and independent existence. The ex-Australian Premier was, however, rash enough to use the term Imperial Council as applying to the Conference, and this excuse was seized upon by the Ministers and officials, who had no desire to part with a jot of their powers; to persuade General Botha and Sir Wilfrid Laurier into the mistaken belief that the new Secretariat would curtail their liberty of action instead of that of the Colonial Office. The effect of this intrigue was a disagreement which resulted in an emasculated resolution, under cover of which the Dominions Department was created as a subsidiary branch of the Colonial Office, dignified by a new and inspiring name. As Mr. Deakin remarks in a caustic despatch of November, 1907, "All that appears to have been accomplished is that a sub-department has been renamed." Such an alteration of Departmental practice, he continues, "appears too minute to call for attention."

This mingled triumph of Little Englandism and bureaucratic jealousy, says a writer in The Times, is clearly shown by the Blue-book, to have aroused the keenest resentment in the self-governing Dominions. The Cape Ministers declared that they were ready to co-operate with the new Department "in every way in making the concessions now granted a success, thus paving the way to the ultimate establishment of an Imperial Department." They point out, however, in a detailed minute, "that they can only regard the present as a temporary expedient." General BOTHA complains that the official representatives of the Colonies in London are no better off under the new scheme than they were before. Nor is Natal much more grateful for the change, while Canada is silent. Sir ROBERT BOND, on the other hand, replies with undeniable force to a despatch informing him of the creation of the new Department, "that the reorganisation of the Colonial Office is entirely a matter relating to the internal economy of that office." It might have seemed obvious from the start that nothing but a Secretariat paid for by the various members of the Imperial Conference could serve any useful purpose as a fresh bond between the Dominions and the Mother Country. We fear it must be confessed that the creation of the new office has been another of those hollow shams in which Liberalism delights, and has in consequence effected nothing of importance in the four years' interval between one Conference and another.

There are two great and crying needs confronting the statesmen, Radical or Unionist, who may be entrusted with the responsibilities of Imperial Government. Besides these two necessities, all else sinks into insignificance. Ministers may produce Old-Age Pensions, Home Rule for Ireland, Devolution for Scotland, Disestablishment for Wales, they may even make themselves the foster-fathers of Female Suffrage and the pioneers of Socialism, but if they fail to meet the grand necessities of the Empire, they must go down to posterity as the betrayers of an unprecedented trust. For these supreme needs of the present age will not for ever wait to be filled: their continued neglect will mean nothing more or less than the passing of the Empire. These needs are, in the first place, defence; and, in the second, consolidation on some sound and practical basis. For this last we fear it is useless to look to a Liberal Government wedded to the musty shibboleths of a dead and buried Past. The Tariff as an instrument for welding into unity the scattered parts of an Empire at present held together by sentiment alone, is not without honour save in Downing Street. Ministers are deaf to overtures from the more practical statesmen of the Dominions which, in their illiberal Liberal ears, smack of a political opponent's creed. But for the neglect of the Empire's defence—a matter of mere facts and figures and commonsense—there is no excuse. The Dominions, one and all, have taken such steps as their resources permit, but of common action there has been none. This is what Mr. L. J. MAXSE has to say of that "Imperial" Defence Committee from which so much was hoped:—

Our so-called "Defence Committee" was designedly a fraud, invented by cunning politicians to bamboozle a simple public. The Defence Committee is simply a further field in which Parliamentary debaters display their dialectical powers at the expense of military and naval experts who ultimately either weary of the impossible task of teaching talkers who won't learn, or else—and this unfortunately happens in a considerable number of cases—relapse into mere time-servers who say ditto to the politicians and in return receive the prizes of the profession. Something might have been made of the Defence Committee had there been any desire that it should become a serious factor in the State. It now serves as a useful decoy in peace-time, while possessing potentialities as a lightning-conductor in war. It may yet save the skins of statesmen who have betrayed their trust. We would respectfully advise all "experts" and future scapegoats to prepare betimes against the indictment that will be laid against them by politicians whose own careers should end at lamp-posts.

We do not say that the day of lamp-posts and of "the wild mob's million feet" has come, but, in so far as national weakness invites attack, it may come sooner than the responsible ones suppose, and like the proverbial thief in the night. At present the Liberal Government is particularly lavish in its surrender of hostages to fortune, and the sands in the hour-glass of Imperial Union are running out. And yet Ministers babble of the green fields of social reform and the final placation of all their enemies, from College Green across a peace-breathing Continent to the Deccan. So the sorry farce goes on: the men who tell the truth are set down as scaremongers, and the greatest Empire the world has ever seen continues to be governed by the Radical "rump." To sum up, in the lament of a service journal, "on all the broad roads which lead to Rome, no advance has been made—in the struggle for realising the Empire in the sphere of actuality nothing has been accomplished and nothing done. Here there have been advances in the sentiment of union, and here recessions of the tide due to the pressure of disintegrating material interests. But these advances have been due to no action of the Home Government, while the recessions have been due to a deliberate inaction in fiscal policy which opposes the blank wall of an economic theory to the clamant needs of a tariff age. The Imperialist coach has in fact for the last three years been stuck in a rut; the wheels indeed sometimes revolve, but they get no purchase and make no progress, nor will they do so until a real Imperialist Government returns once more to the seat of Empire."

THE SOLUTION OF THE KOREAN PROBLEM.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 30)

THE promulgation of the Treaty of Amalgamation simultaneously in Tokyo and Seoul on the 29th instant at noon solves the Korean problem finally. Naturally the attention of Occidentals will be directed primarily to examining the consequences from a treaty point of view. It is clearly indicated by international law that the first condition under which a treaty ceases to be binding is impossibility of execution by either of the contracting parties. That impossibility is at once created by the loss of sovereign power on the side of one of the signatories. Hence it follows that Korea's treaties with foreign States cease to be binding in the sequel of her incorporation into the Japanese Empire. But the Government of Japan has wisely decided not to exact its full rights in this matter. Consular jurisdiction will, of course, be abolished, the laws of Korea having been brought into accord with advanced models and the judiciary being Japanese. But the tariff will remain unchanged for ten years under an arrangement which ought to work satisfactorily. Next to these questions in point of interest comes the status of the Imperial Family. By the Seoul Convention of 1905

Japan is pledged to "maintain the security and respect the dignity of the Korean Imperial House." She satisfies that condition by providing for the Korean Court a handsome yearly income, and enacting that the some-time Emperor and ex Emperor shall have suitable titles and shall rank immediately after the Prince Imperial of Japan.

The Tokyo statesman have steered an astute course among the rocks that beset this problem. As a point of history it would be interesting to know the exact time when they arrived definitely at the conclusion that amalgamation was inevitable. Some doubtless will carry the date far back and will allege that the issue had long been foreseen and steadily contrived. We do not think so. Our conviction is that if any responsible Japanese statesman had been questioned nine months ago, he would have truthfully denied any purpose of the kind. Down to, probably, the close of 1909, the Japanese Cabinet entertained the idea that self-governing, self protecting and progressive statesmen could be manufactured in Korea by the process which Prince Ito inaugurated, the process of advice, assistance and example. But just as Prince Ito found that counsels which might be adopted or rejected at will, encountered the latter fate nine times out of every ten, and was compelled to impart an element of compulsion to his suggestions, so his successors discovered that the optional feature must be altogether eliminated if success was seriously hoped for. Nevertheless they might have hesitated to act upon their conviction had not influential Koreans taken the lead in urging amalgamation, with the result that an anti-Japanese agitation was provoked and a situation presented itself irremediable by any measure short of absolute control. It can scarcely be said, therefore, that the Tokyo statesmen moved in advance of the occasion or lagged behind it. The timeliness of their action is accountable partly for its success. It will have to be admitted, also, that the Japanese nation has displayed a praiseworthy mood on this important occasion. There has not been either bluster or exultation. The leading organs of public opinion have shown apparently sincere sympathy with the patriotic pain which all educated Koreans must feel at the loss of their country's independence, and have given prominence to the graceful thought that this amalgamation is rather a union of two branches of the same family than an annexation of a weak nation by a strong. One newspaper—a journal which justly ranks as almost the yellowest sheet in Japan—did indeed organise a torch-light procession, but the suggestion found only small support. The country seems to approach its new responsibilities with a sobering sense of their weight, and the Resident-General is saying whole-some things to the truculent units of his nationals whose high-handed and sometimes dishonest proceedings have brought reproach upon the name of Japan in the Peninsula. It seems, therefore, not extravagant to hope that things will move smoothly in their new groove. Certainly the hope would assume more solid dimensions did Viscount Terauchi consent to devote his entire attention to the duties of the Residency-General.

THE "HOCHI SHIMBUN'S" CELEBRATION.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 30.)

WE cannot congratulate the Hochi Shimbun on its persistence in organizing a public demonstration to celebrate the demise of the Korean Empire. The Hochi will probably object to the use of the word "demise" in such a context, but we are considering here the feelings of the Korean people only, and in their eyes what has just occurred in the Far East unquestionably assumes the shape of the death of Korean independence. This fate is meted out to Korea at Japan's hands, and it is not too much to say that the vast majority of the Japanese people sympathise sincerely with the moral suffering imposed on the Koreans by such a break in their history. In these circumstances it seems to us impossible to condemn too strongly the Hochi's idea of organizing a public celebration. The Authorities have done what they could to prevent everything of the kind. Thus the Minister of Home Affairs has issued instructions to the various local authorities that there must be no public demonstrations, and the Minister of Education has vetoed the attendance of school-children at any fête of the kind. Nevertheless, the Hochi persists with its scheme. Of course the whole thing is a huge advertisement. It is an advertisement of the Hochi itself, and, reading the details of the plan, we see plainly that the components of the procession are simply actuated by the idea of giving publicity to their various methods of earning money. Thus it may be truly said that the fine feeling which the great mass of the Japanese people are disposed to show towards Korea in her moment of sorrow, is perverted by the Hochi Shimbun into a vulgar display of self-congratulation and mercenary manoeuvring. It is quite inevitable that the on-looking nations will misconstrue the character and magnify the dimensions of this miserable affair. The people that make a noise are conspicuous, not those that keep silence. The world will inevitably say that the population of the Japanese metropolis turned out with banners and torches to celebrate the humiliation of a neighbouring people. To expose Japan to such a reproach is not patriotism. It is on the contrary the very reverse of patriotism, and to expect that people indulging in this unseemly display should show a capacity for appreciating the patriotism of another nation is perhaps extravagant. The Hochi must lay to its own charge the sin of having suggested and promoted a step which may indeed further the money-earning capacities of certain tradesmen or agencies, but which will certainly lower Japan in the estimation of all rightly-thinking people. We note with much satisfaction that the Police Authorities have warned all those taking part in the proposed procession to avoid raising any uproar, and to remember that the Koreans being now their fellow-subjects, ought to have their feelings consulted and respected by every Japanese. We should have thought that this lesson in obvious humanity did not need to be taught by the police to a newspaper which claims to represent a large section of the Japanese people.

AMERICAN INTERVENTION IN AFRICA.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 31.)

THE extension of what is virtually an American protectorate over the Black Republic of Liberia, or at least a régime similar to that occupied by England in Egypt, constitutes a step which may, or may not, possess any ulterior significance. But it certainly represents a departure—and yet, hardly an altogether new departure—from the generally accepted course of American policy. Moreover, there are potentialities about this latest move on the part of the State Department at Washington which it is impossible to ignore. Mr. SHACKLETON, M.P., sponsor to the Conciliation Bill, might conceivably describe it, in his now historic phrase, as the thin end of the wedge: while some may contend, on the other hand, that no wedge exists at all. The Liberian Republic, as most people are aware, was founded in 1847 by various European and American colonization societies for the benefit of freed slaves from the United States. For this reason Americans are naturally interested in its welfare and concerned at its distress—the latter being the present condition of affairs. The Republic which, with its 350 miles of coast, is sandwiched between the French Colonies of Guinea and the Ivory Coast, on the east, and the British Colony of Sierra Leone, on the west, embraces an area of some 40,000 square miles, with a population of about two million negroes, the vast majority of whom are indigenous to the country. Indeed, the number of Americo-Liberians does not exceed 12,000, while there is a British-negro contingent of 3,000. The revenue, which is derived mainly from the customs duties and a tax on rubber, amounts to no more than £80,000 annually, and has shown a tendency of late years to decrease by comparison with the expenditure. Consequently the loan of £100,000 raised forty years ago has not been reduced by a fifth of its amount, while other obligations of a similar character have been contracted. Hence the intervention of the United States in a protective-financial capacity, and the shouldering by the Great Republic of the pecuniary liabilities of the little one. A loan of half a million sterling is being offered in the United States, Germany, France and Great Britain, which is to be arranged on the principle of the Egyptian Caisse de la Dette, each subscribing country to be represented thereon. So much for the financial aspect of the question, and if the matter ended there, nothing would remain to be said. The restoration, on a sound basis, of the finances of the Black Republic—if, indeed, such a conversion be possible—and the deliverance of President BARCLAY and his brother negroes out of their distresses cannot but prove of benefit to the Liberians themselves; but wherein does benefit accrue to the United States? Is it that having secured a foothold on the east side of the Old World—in the Philippines—the American Republic is asserting its claims as a World-Power by acquiring a foothold on the west? For, as the original telegraphic announcement implies, it is not possible entirely to divest such a matter of its political signification. There are boundary questions which, with France in particular, have long proved a bone of contention—Liberia has recently lost, by a frontier arrangement with that Power, an area of 2000 square miles which she was unable to administer effectively; and there is always the contingency of trouble with the natives of the hinterland, which necessitates the military organization of the Republic—a task which Liberia's new protector has indicated her intention of taking in hand. Concurrently, therefore, with the establishment of a protectorate over Liberia, America becomes, willy nilly, an African Power and—leaving Great Britain out of the reckoning—cheek by jowl with a European Power. This is the aspect of the matter which, to the student of world-politics, possesses especial interest. As the Observer puts it, "The Liberian loan prompts all men to ask what has become of the Monroe Doctrine? . . . The matter as it stands is not worth making much fuss about, but it contains awkward possibilities. To combine a rigid maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine of diplomatic monopoly in the two Americas with active interference in every other Continent is a policy which Mr. KNOX and his successors will find increasingly difficult." Already the Liberian proposals are described as having aroused "considerable resentment" on the part of the French Press. "Although," says one Paris journal, discussing the question of frontier disputes, "the border between Liberia and French territory has been fairly well defined by the Treaty, the complaints raised by the misbehaviour of the Liberian police, organised by President BARCLAY, would have led to trouble had the Liberian Government seen

THE ANNEXATION OF KOREA.

OFFICIAL DECLARATION AND TEXT OF TREATY.

DECLARATION.

Notwithstanding the earnest and laborious work of reforms in the administration of Korea, in which the Governments of Japan and Korea have been engaged for more than four years since the conclusion of the Agreement of 1905, the existing system of government in that country has not proved entirely equal to the duty of preserving public order and tranquillity, and in addition a spirit of suspicion and misgiving dominates the whole Peninsula. In order to maintain peace and stability in Korea, to promote the prosperity and welfare of Koreans, and at the same time to ensure the safety and repose of foreign residents, it has been made abundantly clear that fundamental changes in the actual regime of government are absolutely essential.

The Governments of Japan and Korea, being convinced of the urgent necessity of introducing reforms responsive to the requirements of the situation, and of furnishing sufficient guarantees for the future, have, with the approval of His Majesty the Emperor of Korea, concluded, through their respective Plenipotentiaries, a Treaty providing for the complete annexation of Korea to the Empire of Japan.

By virtue of that important Act which shall take effect on its promulgation on the 29th August, the Imperial Government of Japan undertake the entire government and administration of Korea, and they hereby declare that the matters relating to foreigners and foreign trade in Korea shall be conducted in accordance with the following rules:—

(1) The Treaties hitherto concluded by Korea with foreign Powers ceasing to be operative, Japan's existing Treaties will, so far as practicable, be applied to Korea.

Foreigners resident in Korea will, so far as conditions permit, enjoy the same rights and immunities as in Japan proper, and the protection of their legally acquired rights, subject in all cases to the jurisdiction of Japan.

The Imperial Government of Japan is ready to consent that the jurisdiction in respect of cases actually pending in any foreign Consular Courts in Korea at the time the Treaty of Annexation takes effect shall remain in such Courts until final decision.

(2) Independently of any conventional engagements formerly existing on the subject, the Imperial Government of Japan will, for a period of ten years, levy upon goods imported into Korea from foreign countries or exported from Korea to foreign countries, and upon foreign vessels entering any of the open ports of Korea, the same import or export duties and the same tonnage dues as under the existing schedules.

The same import or export duties and tonnage dues as those to be levied upon the aforesaid goods and vessels will also, for a period of ten years, be applied in respect of goods imported into Korea from Japan or exported from Korea to Japan, and Japanese vessels entering any of the open ports of Korea.

(3) The Imperial Government of Japan will also permit for a period of ten years, vessels under the flags of Powers having Treaties with Japan, to engage in the coasting trade between the open ports of Korea, and between those ports and any open ports of Japan.

(4) The existing open ports of Korea, with the exception of Masampo, will be continued as open ports and, in addition, Shin-Wiju will be newly opened, so that vessels, foreign as well as Japanese, will there be admitted and goods may be imported into and exported from those ports.

THE TREATY.

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan and His Majesty the Emperor of Korea, having in view the special and close relations between Their respective countries, desiring to promote the common weal of the two nations and to assure permanent peace in the Extreme East, and being convinced that these objects can be best attained by the annexation of Korea to the Empire of Japan, have resolved to conclude a Treaty of such annexation, and have for that purpose appointed as Their Plenipotentiaries, that is to say:

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, Viscount Masakata Terauchi, His Resident-General;

And His Majesty the Emperor of Korea, Ye Wan Yong, His Minister President of State;

Who, upon mutual conference and deliberation, have agreed to the following Articles.

Article I.—His Majesty the Emperor of Korea makes complete and permanent cession to His Majesty the Emperor of Japan of all rights of sovereignty over the whole of Korea.

Article II.—His Majesty the Emperor of Japan accepts the cession mentioned in the preceding Article, and consents to the complete annexation of Korea to the Empire of Japan.

Article III.—His Majesty the Emperor of Japan will accord to Their Majesties the Emperor and ex-Emperor and His Imperial Highness the Crown Prince of Korea and Their Consorts and Heirs such titles, dignity and honour as are appropriate to Their respective ranks, and sufficient annual grants will be made for the maintenance of such titles, dignity and honour.

Article IV.—His Majesty the Emperor of Japan will also accord appropriate honour and treatment to the members of the Imperial House of Korea and their heirs, other than those mentioned in the preceding Article, and the funds necessary for the maintenance of such honour and treatment will be granted.

Article V.—His Majesty the Emperor of Japan will confer peerages and monetary grants upon those Koreans who, on account of meritorious services, are regarded as deserving such special recognition.

Article VI.—In consequence of the aforesaid annexation, the Government of Japan assume the entire government and administration of Korea and undertake to afford full protection for the persons and property of Koreans obeying the laws there in force, and to promote the welfare of all such Koreans.

Article VII.—The Government of Japan will, so far as circumstances permit, employ in the public service of Japan in Korea those Koreans who accept the new régime loyally and in good faith and who are duly qualified for such service.

Article VIII.—This Treaty, having been approved by His Majesty the Emperor of Japan and His Majesty the Emperor of Korea, shall take effect from the date of its promulgation.

In faith whereof, the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed this Treaty, and have affixed thereto their seals

Viscount MASAKATA TERAUCHI,
Resident-General.

YE WAN YONG,

Minister President of State

The 22nd day of the 8th month of the 4th year of Nung-hui.

IMPERIAL RESCRIPT.

We, in inaugurating the extension of Our Rule to Korea by virtue of Our Imperial Prerogative, are anxious to give expression to the sense of tender solicitude which we entertain for Our subjects. Accordingly we order that in compliance with conditions and rules to be separately provided for, those malefactors charged or sentenced for offences committed under the late regime in Korea who are regarded as deserving consideration be granted amnesty, and taxes in arrears as well as those for the present year be waived or reduced.

IMPERIAL RESCRIPT.

We, attaching the highest importance to the maintenance of permanent peace in the Orient and the consolidation of lasting security to Our Empire and finding in Korea constant and fruitful sources of complication, caused Our Government to conclude in 1905 an Agreement with the Korean Government by which Korea was placed under the protection of Japan in the hope that all disturbing elements might thereby be removed and peace assured for ever.

For the four years and over which have since elapsed, Our Government have exerted themselves with unwearied attention to promote reforms in the administration of Korea, and their efforts have, in a degree, been attended with success. But at the same time, the existing régime of government in that country has shown itself hardly effective to preserve peace and stability, and in addition, a spirit of suspicion and misgiving dominates the whole Peninsula. In order to maintain public order and security and to advance the happiness and well-being of the people, it has become manifest that fundamental changes in the present system of government are inevitable.

We, in concert with His Majesty the Emperor of Korea, having in view this condition of affairs, and being equally persuaded of the necessity of annexing the whole of Korea to the Empire of Japan in response to the actual requirements of the situation, have now arrived at an arrangement for such permanent annexation.

His Majesty the Emperor of Korea and the members of His Imperial House will, notwithstanding the annexation, be accorded due and appropriate treatment. All Koreans, being under Our direct sway, will enjoy growing prosperity and welfare, and with assured repose and security will come a marked expansion in industry and trade. We confidently believe that the new order of things now inaugurated will serve as a fresh guarantee of enduring peace in the Orient.

We order the establishment of the office of Governor-General of Korea. The Governor-General will, under Our direction, exercise the command of the army and navy, and a general control over all administrative functions in Korea. We call upon all of Our officials and authorities to fulfil their respective duties in in appreciation of Our will, and to conduct the various branches of administration in consonance with the requirements of the occasion, to the end that Our subjects may long enjoy the blessings of peace and tranquillity.

STATEMENT ISSUED FROM THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

The Japanese Government have always made it a guiding principle of their foreign policy to maintain enduring peace in this Empire. They have naturally viewed with grave concern the situation in Korea which proved to be a fruitful source of difficulty in the Extreme East, involving Japan in serious complications.

In their solicitude to put an end to those disturbing conditions, they made an arrangement in 1905 for establishing Japan's protectorate over Korea, and they have ever since been assiduously engaged in works of reform, looking forward to the consummation of the desired end. But they have failed to find in the régime of a protectorate sufficient hope for the realization of the object which they had in view, and a condition of unrest and disquietude still prevails throughout the whole Peninsula. In these circumstances, the necessity of introducing fundamental changes in the system of government in Korea has become entirely manifest, and an earnest and careful examination of the Korean problem has convinced the Japanese Government that the régime of a protectorate can not be made to adapt itself to the actual condition of affairs in Korea, and that the responsibilities devolving upon Japan for the due administration of that country can not be justly fulfilled, without the complete annexation of Korea to this Empire. Consequently, the Japanese Government formulated their policy in July of last year for the eventual annexation of Korea, and decided to take measures for carrying out that policy whenever a further development of the situation should be found to call for the execution of such measures.

The unsatisfactory state of things which has since then presented itself in Korea has assumed such gravity that any long postponement of the execution of fundamental reforms would not only threaten public order and tranquillity in the Peninsula, but would possibly lead to untoward consequences. The Japanese Government, therefore, felt constrained to lend themselves to a final solution of the problem in accordance with their established policy, and Resident-General Viscount Terauchi, in proceeding to his post was charged with necessary instructions and authorized to arrange for such solution.

Viscount Terauchi, upon his arrival at Seoul, was convinced that the situation in Korea did not permit any further delay in effecting the contemplated annexation, and, on the 16th of this month, he opened discussion on the subject with the Korean Government, by giving a detailed explanation of the views of the Japanese Government. Subsequently, several conferences were held for the exchange of views, and in the course of such conferences, the Korean Government expressed their concurrence as to the necessity of annexation. Viscount Terauchi, having found that the Governments of Japan and Korea were in complete accord regarding the proposed arrangement, telegraphed to the Japanese Government on the evening of the 20th the final draft of the Treaty of Annexation, and requested that it be submitted to His Majesty the Emperor of Japan for approval. His Majesty referred it to the Privy Council which specially met on the 22nd, and the Imperial sanction was then given with the advice of the Council. Accordingly, the Japanese Government at once telegraphed to the Resident-General on the same day, authorizing him to sign the Treaty. The Korean Government also submitted to His Majesty the Emperor of Korea for approval the Draft of the Treaty on the 22nd, and His Korean Majesty, in full appreciation of the general situation and recognizing that the annexation of Korea to Japan would contribute to the promotion of welfare and interests common to both nations, gave prompt approval of the Treaty in draft. Thereupon the Treaty of Annexation was signed on the afternoon of the 22nd between the Resident-General Viscount Terauchi and Mr. Ye Wan Yong, Minister-President of the State of Korea.

The Japanese Government then communicated the Treaty to all the Powers concerned, at the same time declaring the rules to be followed by Japan in dealing with the external affairs of Korea. The Treaty is thus promulgated to day, and takes effect from this date.

As pointed out in the Declaration, the Treaties concluded by Korea with foreign Powers cease to be binding, and Japan's existing treaties are extended to Korea. Consequently, foreigners are allowed to reside and trade in all parts of Korea and there to enjoy the same rights and privileges, as in Japan Proper. At the same time the right of extra-territoriality which foreigners have hitherto enjoyed in Korea comes definitively to an end from to-day.

The Japanese Government believe that they are entirely justified in regarding such right of extra-territoriality as ended upon the termination of Korea's treaties in consequence of the annexation, considering that the continuance of that system would inevitably prove a serious obstacle and interfere with the unification of the administration of Korea. Moreover, it seems only natural that foreigners, being allowed to enjoy in Korea the same rights and privileges as in Japan Proper, should be called upon to surrender the right of extra-territoriality which is not granted to them in Japan Proper.

Owing to the termination of the treaties concluded by Korea, the conventional tariff hitherto in force in Korea equally ceases to be operative. However, having in view the fact that the annexation is necessitated essentially by considerations of a political character, the Japanese Government are anxious to avert, as far as possible, prejudicial effects upon the economic interests of foreigners in Korea, and are moreover conscious of the advisability of abstaining from measures which may bring about radical changes in the economic relations between Japan and Korea. They have therefore decided of their own accord to maintain the customs tariff hitherto enforced in Korea, for a term of ten years, in respect of trade, foreign as well as national.

The foregoing is a brief exposition of the effects consequent upon annexation in domestic and foreign relations. The Japanese Government confidently believe that good order and security will hereafter be satisfactorily maintained in Korea; that in the new order of things now inaugurated, the steady growth of industrial activities and the advancement of material well-being of Koreans will be fully assured and that the two nations incorporated will for ever enjoy the blessings of general peace and stability.

DECREE OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF KOREA RELATING TO CUSTOMS DUTIES IN KOREA.

IMPERIAL ORDINANCE No. 336.

IMPERIAL URGENCY ORDINANCE RELATING TO THE PUTTING INTO FORCE IN KOREA OF THE LAWS OF PATENTS, DESIGNS AND UTILITY MODELS

Article I.—The effects of the right of a patent, design or utility model created prior to the coming into force of the present Ordinance under the Laws of Patents, Designs and Utility Models shall not extend to Korea, if in respect of an object identical with that for which the said right was created, there is in Korea any person having the right of a patent, design or utility model.

Article II.—The right of a patent, design or utility model, created under the Imperial Ordinances relating to Patents, Designs and Utility Models in Korea, shall be deemed to have been created under the Laws of Patents, Designs and Utility Models.

The effects of the right of a patent, design or utility model mentioned in the preceding Paragraph shall not extend beyond Korea, if in respect of an object identical with that for which the said right was created, there is any person having the right of a patent, design or utility model created, prior to the coming into force of the present Ordinance, under the Laws of Patents, Designs and Utility Models.

Article III.—In case patent rights, created respectively under the Laws of Patents and under the Imperial Ordinance relating to Patents in Korea, are held by one and the same person and refer to one and the same invention, the right having the remaining term of existence shorter in duration shall be merged in the other.

Article IV.—A patent right created under the Law of Patents shall not be available in Korea, and a patent right provided in Paragraph I of Article II of the present Ordinance shall not be available outside of Korea, as against acts or things coming under either of the following heads:

1. Acts of carrying patent inventions into practice by persons who, at the time of the coming into force of the present Ordinance, are actually engaged in or have equipments for carrying their inventions into practice, or by the successors of such persons.

2. Things actually existing at the time of the coming into force of the present Ordinance, and things which have been produced or manufactured under the preceding head.

Article V.—All measures, processes or other acts taken or performed in accordance with provisions of the Imperial Ordinance relating to Patents in Korea shall be deemed to have been taken or performed in accordance with provisions of the Law of Patents.

Article VI.—The provisions of the foregoing three Articles shall correspondingly apply to designs and utility models.

Article VII.—The Imperial Ordinances relating respectively to Patents, Designs and Utility Models are hereby abolished.

SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISION.

The present Ordinance takes effect from the date of its promulgation.

IMPERIAL ORDINANCE No. 337.

IMPERIAL URGENCY ORDINANCE RELATING TO THE PUTTING INTO FORCE IN KOREA OF THE LAW OF TRADE MARKS.

Article I.—In case rights of trade marks, created respectively under the Law of Trade Marks and Imperial Ordinance relating to Trade Marks in Korea, are held, at the time of the coming into force of the present Ordinance by one and the same person and refer to trade marks similar to each other to be used for one and the same kind of merchandise, such trade marks shall be taken to be associated trade marks.

Article II.—Within six months from the date of the coming into force of the present Ordinance, the right of trade mark created under the Law of Trade Marks and such right created under the Imperial Ordinance relating to Trade Marks in Korea can not be set up, respectively in Korea and outside of Korea, as against persons delivering or selling, or holding with a view to delivery or sale, merchandise which bears a trade mark identical with or similar to the one protected by the aforesaid Law or Ordinance.

Article III.—In case of a trade mark falling under Heading 4 or 5 of Article II of the Law of Trade Marks, the right of trade mark created under the Law of Trade Marks and such right created under the Imperial Ordinance relating to Trade Marks in Korea shall have no effect respectively in Korea and outside of Korea.

Article IV.—The provisions of Articles I-III. and Article V. of the Imperial Ordinance No. 356 of the Forty-third year of Meiji (1910) shall correspondingly apply to trade marks.

Article V.—The Imperial Ordinance relating to Trade Marks in Korea is hereby abolished.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

The British Ambassador, Sir Arthur Nicolson, took leave of their Majesties the Emperor and Empress of Russia in a private audience at the Palace of Peterhof yesterday. His Excellency had no letters of recall to present inasmuch as the letters of credence, which expired with the death of King Edward, had not been renewed in the name of the present King. Sir Arthur Nicolson having in the meantime been appointed permanent Head of the Foreign Office. This technicality was taken advantage of to vary, in a manner significant of the close and cordial relations between Russia and England, the rigid Court etiquette which governs these functions. Instead of the Ambassador being received in farewell audience alone, according to the prescribed custom on these occasions, the entire staff of the British Embassy was honoured with an invitation to a State luncheon at the Palace. This is, I believe, unprecedented in Russia. After the private audience, at which His Excellency took leave of the Empress, His Majesty the Emperor, with Sir Arthur Nicolson on his right hand and M. Izvolsky on his left, took luncheon in the White Hall of the Grand Palace. There were only twenty three covers in all, including the Court officials on duty. The Adjunct-Minister for Foreign Affairs, M. Sazonov, was the only other Minister present. Messrs. O'Beirne, Garnett, Kidston, and Wellesley and Colonel Wyndham, the Military Attaché, were present from the Embassy. His Majesty wore the Garter ribbon over his favourite dark green uniform of the Preobrajensky Regiment of the Guard.

Sir Arthur Nicolson will leave Russia on August 13th. On the evening previous to his departure the British Colony of St. Petersburg will entertain His Excellency at a farewell dinner. The newly appointed Ambassador to Russia, Sir George Buchanan, is not expected to take up the duties of his post before the beginning of December next.

An Imperial decree has been issued summoning the Finnish Diet to reassemble on September 1st to 13th in "extraordinary session" to last two months, for the purpose of settling the details of the election regulations to the Duma and the Upper House for Finland, and to draw up resolutions on two of the points raised by the recently passed law regulating the relations of Finland to the Empire. The two points selected for treatment at present are the granting of equal rights in Finland to all Russian subjects, and secondly the mode in which the Finnish treasury shall pay into the Imperial Treasury the sums required in lieu of personal service in the Army.

Another decree of the same date orders Lieut. General Sein, the Governor-General of Finland, to open in the name of the Emperor the session of the Diet.

The selection of the points to be dealt with, out of many contained in the new law, amply proves the intention of the Russian Imperial Government to deal cautiously and considerably with the susceptibilities of the Finns, who for a generation or more past have been educated in their common schools to hate everything Russian. The elaboration of the rules for elections in Finland is dictated by the date of the next session of the Duma, in which it would be desirable to see members for Finland. The other two points chosen are also indicative of the moderation of the demands of the Russian Imperial Government. The position of the Russian born in Finland, "an integral part of the Russian Empire" as even rabid separatists do not deny, has been practically that of the Outlanders in the Transvaal of unhappy memory, and common fairness requires that it should be done away with once for all. As to the payment of money in lieu of personal service in the Imperial Army it is hard to see what arguments can be honestly put forward against it. To judge however by the utterances of Finnish newspapers, which seem to be mostly the organs of interested separatist leaders, never before in history were such horrible instances of heartless oppression witnessed as those which Russia is contemplating in the case of "loyal" Finland,—whose loyalty for a generation past has not found expression in any form whatever outside the florid compositions customary in Russia in addresses to the Throne.

The Russian Foreign Minister, M. Izvolsky, goes, on leave, abroad to-night, somewhat earlier than anticipated, owing to a bereavement in his family. The Countess Toll, who died yesterday morning at Tegern-See near Munich, is the mother of Mme Izvolsky and of the wife of the Russian Minister at Copenhagen, M. Kudashov, who is likewise hastening to Munich.

M. Guchkov, ex-President of the Duma, was released from the fortress prison S.S. Peter & Paul by special order of His Majesty after undergoing seven days only of the month imprisonment to which he was sentenced for fighting a duel.

At a suburban railway station not ten miles from St. Petersburg the following "regrettable incident" occurred two days ago. An army officer, captain of the 147th Samara Infantry Regiment was on the platform when a man came up to him and began to abuse the Emperor. After warning the man, who turned out to be a peasant named Vorob'ev, Captain Boreysh, finding his warnings neglected and the abuse continuing, drew his revolver and fired three times point blank at the man, severely wounding him. He was taken to hospital unconscious. The officer only did his duty, as duty is understood in Russia, in using his weapons on a defenceless man, who was probably drunk, and may even have been demented. But what Capt. Boreysh's superiors will want to know is why three shots were necessary and the man was after all carried off alive—a circumstance calculated to bring discredit on the skill of army officers in the use of their weapons. Other aspects of this painful case will suggest themselves to every English reader.

There are 42 deaths from cholera recorded to-day and 1060 cases in hospital. The attacks of the press upon various institutions whose hazard or non-existent sanitary arrangements are accused of being responsible for the growing epidemic, are drawing forth some curious official replies. The other day the Novoe Vremja pointed out that a large military hospital was pouring its sewage into the Neva above the intake for the water-supply of the city, and if any attempt at sterilisation were made it was only in the case of sewage from the highly infectious wards. The official denial lays the main blame for this state of things on the municipality, and insists that the outflow from infectious wards, including the cholera barracks, is treated by boiling for a considerable period to sterilise it. No denial is attempted of the main claim of the original statement, namely, that this sterilised, or at any rate boiled, sewage, when poured into the river, forms an admirable medium for the propagation of the vibrios existing in the river water.

Sevastopol is taking precautionary measures in view of the presence of Asiatic plague at Odessa. The number of cases at Odessa has not been large, so far as is known, but they have been widely distributed, which makes isolation impossible. However, the Prefect of the city, General Tolmachev, the favourite target for Duma recriminations of old, has issued an order threatening imprisonment and fine for anyone "promulgating false rumours about the plague." This is the good old Russian way of stopping the spread of epidemics and it represents the first stage: the second was silence, and the third bold denial, and in the old days the painful facts of life, not only in relation to cholera and plague, became non-existent to the outer world. Nowadays tongues are free, and the action of the Prefect of Odessa is abnormal and exceptional. It is stated on the authority of a Russian medical man who has investigated the plague on the spot, that the infection is carried by the flies which abandon rats dying of plague, and that it is not the bite of these parasites which conveys the virus so much as the excreta they leave on clothes etc. The latter is a new discovery, I believe.

The Novoe Vremja gives utterance to what has long been expressed privately in influential quarters in Russia concerning Anglo-Russian joint activity in Asia, namely, that while the English and Russian Governments thoroughly understand one another and cordially coöperate, the Indian Government is a thing apart, governed by the old Russophobia ideals of a past age. All that England and Russia want of China, whether in relation to Tibet or elsewhere, is to be had by the friendly method of diplomatic representations. It is therefore unnecessary to prepare, "with dreams of the Indian conquistador Clive in their minds," armed expeditions. This undertaking, according to the Novoe Vremja, must be the work of the Indian, as distinguished from the British, Government.

An official paper points out that Russian industry is quieting down after the turmoil of 1905 and the proof is found in the rapidly decreasing number of strikes. Whereas in 1905, when matters were at their worst in Russia, there were 13,965 strikes affecting 2,863,173 "hands," the number had fallen to half in the following year, to little more than a quarter of those figures in 1907, and in 1908 there were only 892 strikes affecting 176,101 "hands," and last year no more than 340 strikes affecting 64,166 "hands." The figures would be more interesting if some indication were given of the duration of the strikes recorded.

A very profitable trade is being initiated in north Russia this year, in buying up at fifteen or sixteen shillings per pair the young horns of the reindeer, which are exported to China where they sell at ten to twenty times that price, being used for preparing a peculiarly stimulating form of medicament to renew the youth of the aged.

Commercially speaking Russia deals wholly in bank notes and in bills of exchange for regulation of accounts. Except in the very extensive dealing with public bodies bills of exchange may be considered practically the only medium of exchange. The laws affecting commercial usage in this and in many other particulars date from a prehistoric age when commerce was hardly known, and bills of exchange probably represented loan operations rather than commercial barter. Naturally the abuses that have sprung up in the course of time under these circumstances exceed in Russia anything that can be imagined by business communities in other parts of the world. Men known to be wealthy are regularly victimised by bills of exchange manipulated in various ways up to and including plain forgery, and the punishment, even in case of detection, is hardly deterrent. Especially is this the case when a rich man dies in Russia: the shower of his bills that descends upon his heirs is a tax more terrible than any death duties and payment can generally be enforced by threatening a further shower if any trouble is made. These anomalies have forced business men to look about for a way of safeguarding their bills and the best that suggests itself is to photograph every bill issued and stamp on its face the word "photographed." The photographic prints are to be retained as proof of forgery or genuineness. The device seems a fairly complicated one and not without its specific dangers in quite another direction, but it shows to what lengths business men in Russia are prepared to go to cope with one of the crying troubles of their daily life. Cheques are, of course, practically unknown in Russia for ordinary business purposes. Only a few days ago a well-known bank paid out a cheque, for once made out to a name, which is rarely done in Russia, to an unauthorised person whose exterior, it is said, precluded any common-sense man supposing him a rightful holder of any value above coppers, and the transaction is held normal!

TOURIST PARTY FROM LOS ANGELES.

The tourist party from Los Angeles consisting of 118 members arrived at Yokohama on the 29th ultimo on board the steamer Mongolia. No sooner had the vessel dropped anchor at the port, than Mr. Otani, President of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, accompanied by Secretary Okada and several other members of the Chamber, welcomed the visitors on board the Mongolia, when Mr. Otani expressed in Japanese his delight at receiving the tourist party and Secretary Okada read the following address of welcome:—

"On behalf of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, I beg to offer you a few words of welcome. Yokohama is a port by which Japan was first opened to the commerce of the world. Yokohama is a gate by which the western civilization was first introduced into Japan.

In welcoming you here in Yokohama, I deem it a pleasant duty to express our warmest gratitude to the great Republic of America. It was America that drew Japan out of her isolation half a century ago to win for her the position she occupies to-day among the nations of the world. Since then America has always maintained an attitude of genuine friendship toward Japan. The abiding friendship between the two nations has never been disturbed by any unpleasant feelings. For the two nations to live in friendship for ever, it is absolutely necessary that they should thoroughly understand each other, and this can be attained by the personal observation of each other's life and manners. The great bulwark of friendly international relations lies in trade. If we learn to know each other better and to speak of each other as friends and merchants, our international relations may be firmly bound with the ties of mutual regard and respect. We are convinced of the fact that in promoting the friendly international relations, nothing is more urgent than the acceleration of the prosperity of mutual trade. You may go back and tell your friends at home how the modern Japan was made and what were the actual conditions of her commerce and industry, and to induce them to come and see for themselves. I do not believe that you may carry back to your friends extravagant and erroneous opinions of things Japanese. You will carefully observe the mode of our life and manners. I tender now a cordial and heart felt welcome to you here in Yokohama and hope your visit will be an enjoyable one."

Replying to the above, Mr. W. M. Meilne of the party expressed his thanks on behalf of all the visitors, and subsequently Mr. I. T. Stoddard delivered a short address in appreciation of the kind reception accorded the party, speaking in high terms of the rapid progress of Japan. It is stated that seventy-three members of the party are ladies. A little after noon the whole party landed and immediately proceeded to Tokyo by train. The visitors returned to Yokohama the same evening. They are to leave for Manila this morning by the same steamer via Kobe, Nagasaki, Shanghai, and Hongkong, and again visit Yokohama about the end of next month.

CONFERENCE OF THE FOREIGN AUXILIARY OF THE W.C.T.U.

(DELAYED IN TRANSMISSION.)

The annual conference of the Foreign Auxiliary of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union was convened in the auditorium at Karuizawa August 1st and 2nd. The first session, opening at nine o'clock in the morning, was given over largely to the reading of the minutes of the past year's executive meetings and to five minute reports from superintendents which showed that faithful and effective work has been carried on in all departments of W.C.T.U. activity.

In the afternoon at three o'clock a medal contest participated in by seven foreign children, the Misses. MacCloy, Brokaw, Landis, Hauch, Chappell and two Misses. Pedley, and a children's chorus furnished an especially entertaining program. The medal was awarded to Miss Florence MacCloy, though the judges confessed to great difficulty in rendering a decision, since all spoke so well. The contest was very well attended and was followed by a reception at which time seventeen new names were added to the list of active members and three to the honorary list.

On the following day, after an hour devoted to business, a public session was held, with Dr. Julius Soper presiding. The address of the morning was given by the Rev. T. Roseberry Good, pastor of the Union Church of Yokohama. His subject was "The attitude of the Christian to the Liquor Traffic" and all who were privileged to listen agreed in calling it one of the most inspiring and helpful addresses ever delivered on a temperance theme. It was indeed a compliment to the Rev. Good that although the morning was fine, offering every inducement to out-door sport, a good-sized audience filled the church to listen to his address.

The reports of Miss Strout and Miss Davis, world's secretaries of the W. C. T. U. which were given at one of the business sessions showed that opportunities for work along temperance educational lines are practically unlimited, the schools from the lowest grade of primary up to those of middle and normal rank opening their doors to lectures on this subject.

An interesting feature of the treasurer's report was the Announcement of the fact that aside from the money expended by the Japanese National Union and the funds being sent to Japan from the World's treasury, over eighteen hundred yen has been contributed, this past year to the work by the members of the Foreign Auxiliary and their friends.

The closing session of the conference was a Memorial service for Mrs. Harris, Mrs. Greene and Mrs. Miller at which sketches of the beautiful lives and work of these three women were read by Mrs. Chappell and Mrs. Pedley and music was rendered by the Karuizawa male quartette.

any opportunity of becoming seriously threatening to French interests. In fact, France has engaged herself to respect the present delimitation only as long as the Liberian Republic remains free from any foreign influence. The previous friction would develop again and involve a very serious quarrel, once the French Government felt that Liberia was no longer a weak State but had behind her a first-class Power." What might be called the French view of the Liberian question is thus summed up by the Paris correspondent of a London journal:—

Not only, it appears, does Mr. Knox assert that the United States are the natural protectors of the black Republic, which is, of course, a vague proposition, but he seems to believe that it is the rôle of the United States to play the part of the trustees of Liberia and to be the mediators between Liberia and Europe. He has also apparently expressed the intention of establishing a coaling station on the Liberian coast. This means clearly enough that Mr. Knox wishes to take up in Liberia a political position which would be in many ways stronger than France's position in Morocco. In taking such a step the United States would be abandoning the true Monroe doctrine, and would extend their action beyond the sphere which they have allotted to themselves. The European Powers, which have always accepted the Monroe doctrine in America, have a perfect right to withhold their consent to such an interpretation of American rights. . . . However, it cannot be concealed that by his supposed attitude towards Liberia, as well as by his move in Manchuria last year, Mr. Knox has made his policy rather unpopular in France, and that many people in France are reflecting that Mr. Root's policy was much more in accordance with American tradition as well as with European interests.

We must say that we have not seen any mention of the coaling station scheme in any save French journals, and we should be inclined to regard it as improbable in the extreme; but we reproduce these opinions as showing that the general feeling of the outside world is not altogether favourable to the new move. Even the moderate Spectator thinks that it will compromise the Monroe doctrine, "which is winked at so long as America keeps at a distance, but which may be more carefully scrutinized when she rubs shoulders with European Powers." The policy of America for the Americans (like the new method of celebrating the Glorious Fourth) is safe and sane. In any departure from that course, as the London review observes, there are dangers.

KOREA'S TREATIES.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 2.)

THE Japan Gazette has repeatedly given expression to a theory which we would all gladly endorse if it had any basis of fact; the theory that, in the event of Japan annexing the neighbouring peninsula, an opportunity for negotiating a revision of the new Tariff might be found by the Powers declining to abrogate their treaties with Korea unless Japan agreed to modify her scale of import duties. Thus England would see herself rescued from the uncomfortable position of having nothing to negotiate with. Unfortunately the act of annexation is now a fait accompli yet none of the Occidental States have discovered in the incident a ground for reopening the Tariff question. They all appear to be convinced that no opportunity of the kind offers. The explanation is very simple. A country when deprived of its sovereignty ceases to be responsible for treaty obligations which can not be discharged without exercise of sovereignty. In a word, the engagements to which Korea pledged herself when she was independent disappear with the loss of her independence. We ventured to assert that proposition in a recent issue. "The first condition under which a treaty ceases to be binding is impossibility of execution by either of the contracting parties." This was what we wrote. But the Japan Gazette traverses our view—or rather our statement of an elementary principle of international law—and then proceeds to give its own version of that law. Here is what our contemporary says:—

There are various conditions recognised by authorities on International Law under which treaties may become void, such as by mutual consent, express renunciation by one party of advantages, denunciation when the right of such denunciation has been reserved, by execution having become impossible, when an express condition upon which the continuation of the treaty is made to depend ceases to exist, or by incompatibility with the general obligations of States, when a change has taken place in undisputed law or in views universally held in respect to morals. These are the only conditions stated under which a treaty becomes void, and it is evident that none of them applies in the case of Japan's annexation of Korea.

That, it must be confessed, is a most convenient method of reasoning; a most sublime use of the ipse dixit device. If our readers will kindly look at the italicized words in the extract—our italics—they will see that the very condition originally formulated by us is included in the Japan Gazette's list of conditions, but is briefly dismissed by our contemporary as inapplicable to Korea's case. Why inapplicable? Does any one pretend that with the loss of her independence, Korea has not also lost the power of giving effect to her treaties? Does any one allege that their execution has not become impossible to her? For our own part we should be inclined to prelude our reflections about Japan's rights and about her renderings of international law by observing what she actually has claimed; what have been her practical interpretations and how the nations are viewing her procedure. Japan is out of swaddling clothes. She has more than an infantile acquaintance with international law. There is a probability—just a probability—that she is not doing anything very outré on this occasion, especially when the gallery of onlooking Powers are watching keenly for any breach of public morality on her side. All the great journals of Europe and America have commented on her action, yet none of them has seen with the Japan Gazette's eyes. We fear that the Tariff Question is not advanced by such forlorn theories.

OPENING OF YOKOHAMA AUTOMOBILE GARAGE.

We understand that Mr. Louis Suzor, whose enterprise needs no recommendation in Yokohama, has opened at No. 21, Settlement, spacious and commodious premises for everything pertaining to Automobiles. Now that the mode of locomotion and transport is rapidly gaining ground in Japan, an institution like the above is almost a necessity, and those of our local sportsmen who want to go out for a few hours shooting in the neighbourhood, will find this means of conveyance the very thing for them; for picnic parties or other like outings arrangements may also be made and the machine selected from the assorted stock on the premises. There are all kinds, the "Gnome," "Brasier," "Fiat," system, with their luxuriously upholstered seating accommodation, up to the simple 3 wheeled, two seated kind of bicycle motor "Aster," of 5 H. P. only. This little machine stands alongside the most powerful in the Garage, the formidable looking Motor Omnibus which has carried a load of 2 tons up the steep slopes to the Bluff.

The Maharaja of Baroda left his "Fiat" Motor, which he had brought with him from India, with Mr. Suzor, and one can take a ride in this fine vehicle in which His Highness toured Japan. There is also to be seen here a Motor "Pengeot," guaranteed to drive a boat through the water at the rate of 20 miles an hour.

The walls of the Garage are covered with fine French Showcards, devoted mostly to proclaiming the praises of the "Michelin Tyre," of which a brave show has been made in the windows, and they seem to be all, if not more than that which is being claimed for them. For on consulting "La Page d'or" for 1909 of this justly famous material one notices that in every great race held in different parts of the globe last year, the winning cars were always provided with Michelin Tyres, whether in the race for the Vanderbilt Cup 30th October 1906; or the Long Island Stock Car Derby; the Circuit of Indianapolis in August 1909 or in fact in any of the 32 great races held during 1909, the Michelin Tyre has invariably issued triumphant, not merely being always first, but invariably second, third and fourth as well.

Mr. Suzor's establishment is under the immediate charge of Mons. Gerard, Mecanicien Ingenieur, from whom all necessary information may be obtained.

THE YATOZAKA EXCAVATIONS.

ACTING MAYOR SAITO'S REPLY TO THE FOREIGN BOARD OF TRADE.

With regard to the letter addressed by the Chairman of the Committee of the Yokohama Foreign Board of Trade to the Municipal Authorities concerning the obstruction of Yatozaka, the following reply has been received:—

D. H. BLAKE, Esq.,

Chairman of the Foreign Board of Trade.

DEAR SIR,—In reply to your communication dated the 22nd instant with regard to the Yatozaka roadway and the operations now going on there, I beg to say that I have referred the matter to the Police authorities concerned, intimating that they should take measures to restore the damaged roadway and that as to the stones and timbers left on the roadway they should cause the owner to remove these obstacles.

Yours respectfully,

M. SAITO,

Acting Mayor of Yokohama.

Yokohama, August 26th.

It is explained that the responsibility for the excavations does not rest with the Municipality but with the Kencho, permission for such work having to be obtained from H.E. Governor Baron Sufu. Similarly the police, who should keep the roadway clear and safe, are under the authority of the Kencho and not the direct authority of the Municipality. It is important that foreigners should understand the divided responsibility in such cases, in order that applications for relief may be properly addressed.

THE ANNEXATION.

[TRANSLATION.]

PROCLAMATION BY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

In assuming the duty of administration in Chosen under the command of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, my Most Gracious and August Sovereign, I hereby proclaim to all the people of Chosen a general outline of the administrative policy to be adopted in future.

It is a natural and inevitable course of things that two peoples, whose countries are in close proximity with each other, whose interests are identical and who are bound together with brotherly feelings, should amalgamate and form one body. Being desirous to secure the safety and welfare of Chosen as well as to maintain the permanent peace of the Extreme East, His Majesty the Emperor of Japan has, in compliance with the wish expressed by the Sovereign of Korea, accepted the cession of all the rights of sovereignty over the country. Hereafter the Emperor of Korea shall be known by the title of His Imperial Highness Yi Wang (Prince Yi), and the Crown Prince be called Prince Heir, so that the hereditary title shall endure forever, while the Ex-Emperor shall be given the title of His Imperial Highness Tai Wang (Prince Father). Their Highnesses shall receive the treatment of Princes of the Blood and Their annual grants shall be as munificent and the same in amount as heretofore. As for the people of Chosen in general, all of them shall become subjects of the Empire of Japan and under the benevolent rule of His Imperial Majesty shall receive the benefits of His enlightened and merciful reign. Especially wise and good men, who will faithfully and loyally respect and assist the new regime, shall be created peers and have conferred on them special monetary grants appropriate to their services and merits, or appointed officials of the Empire, some as members of the Privy Council, others as officials of the central or local offices in accordance with their talent and ability. Further, aged persons belonging to the yangban or literatus classes, whose good behaviour is esteemed as the model of good citizenship, shall be accorded special awards, while dutiful sons, virtuous wives and other persons whose behaviour is exemplary shall be duly rewarded and publicly honoured.

Those who were formerly in the service of local offices and while in duty misappropriated part of taxes collected shall be freed from their responsibility and be exempted from paying in the balance of the sum due. With respect of those who have contravened laws, but the nature of whose offences is deserving extenuation, a general amnesty shall be proclaimed.

As a result of maladministration of by-gone days, not a few people in the interior seem to be in great straits, some having lost their means of livelihood and some their fortunes, while others are even on the verge of starvation. Having in view such deplorable conditions, it has been considered urgent to pay special attention to the recuperation of popular strength. It has been therefore decided to exempt the people from paying the land tax, which was due until the second year of Yungheui (1908) but remained unpaid, as well as those who borrowed public grain until the third year of Yungheui (1909) from returning it, and also to reduce the land-tax due in autumn this year by one-fifth of the rate. Further, a sum of about seventeen million yen will be advanced from the Treasury to be donated to 328 districts of the thirteen Provinces for giving industrial work to the people, aiding in the promotion of education and providing against famine and other disasters. All these measures will be taken in connection with the inauguration of the new regime in order to show to the people in general the Imperial concern for their well being. The people, however, should not forget that it is an established rule throughout the world, in ancient and modern times as well as in the East and West, for any people receiving the benefit of administration to contribute their shares according to their ability towards administrative expenses. They should appreciate the significance of those measures for their relief and take care not to neglect their duty, but always to serve the public purposes.

The fundamental object of administration is to promote the security of life and property, whereon depends the general industrial development of a nation. In Chosen hitherto insurgents or bandits have appeared frequently at various places, killing peaceful people, plundering properties or causing disturbances. In view of this, troops of the Imperial Army have been stationed at important places of all Provinces in order to be on guard against emergencies, police and gendarmerie officers and men distributed throughout the country to look after the maintenance of peace and order, and courts of justice established at various places to give just and impartial judgment. All these measures have been taken in order to punish the wicked and do away with all evil-doers, but fundamentally they are aimed at keeping peace and order in the country, so that people may engage in their business and increase their well-being without any fear to their life and property.

A survey of the physical features of Chosen shows that land in the southern part of the country is fertile and admirably suited for carrying on agricultural industry, and the mountains in the north contain great mineral wealth, while the surrounding waters abound in marine products. There are not a few natural resources which can be developed in proper methods of exploitation so as to contribute greatly to the industrial growth of the country. But the industrial development of a country can be attained only after means of communication and transportation have been sufficiently established, for these are primary steps required for inaugurating new enterprises. For this reason, the authorities concerned have undertaken the opening of highroads connecting all important centres of business and also inaugurated the construction of a railway between Seoul and Wonsan and of another in the southern Provinces; and the railway system will be gradually extended throughout the peninsula. No doubt is entertained that even in the course of the works employment will be given to many thousands of people, helping them to alleviate the misery of poverty, not to mention the benefit the general public is to derive after the completion of the lines.

A long standing evil in Chosen has been the constant feud existing between certain groups of men, generally originating in the clash of personal interests. Under the circumstances when one party secured power it immediately set itself to undermining its rivals. In this way struggles have gone on between rival factions for many years, not a few persons taking part in them having lost their social standing and fortunes in consequence. It goes without saying that such factional conflicts are exceedingly harmful. People are therefore warned against organising themselves into parties and engaging in rivalry and intrigue. But instances are not few in history where the rulers' sincere concern about the welfare of the masses failed to reach them, while popular wishes did not come to the knowledge of persons in power, resulting in mutual misunderstanding and distrust. In order to prevent such undesirable state of things coming into existence, it has been decided to enlarge the scope of the Privy Council, and appoint all experienced and capable persons as members of the Council, so that their advice may be sought after on all important administrative affairs. Also able and wise persons shall be made provincial or district councillors and their opinions and ideas be duly considered in the hope that no administrative measure should be at variance with reasonable popular wishes.

Of all troubles men are heir to, nothing is more painful than disease. In Chosen the medical art has hitherto been in a primitive stage of progress and on this account many people are subject to untimely death. This is really regrettable and it was with the purpose of remedying it to a certain extent that a Central Hospital was opened in Seoul some years ago and Charity Hospitals lately established at Chonju, and Hamheung.

A large number of people have since received the blessing of advanced medical science from these institutions. Nevertheless the country as a whole has not enjoyed it. To enable all the people of the country to share it in future, order has been issued for the establishment of a Charity Hospital in every Province, which will be provided with an efficient staff and plenty of good medicines.

The education of the rising generation is the most important factor for insuring the steady progress of a country in the path of civilization. Their education must be aimed at promoting their intellect and enhancing their moral character, so that they may become good and useful citizens. But hitherto many young men of this country have been misled by erroneous methods of education pursued to disliking work and indulging in useless and empty talking. In future attention should be paid to the removal of this evil as well as to instilling into the minds of young men the detestation of idleness and the love of real work, thrift and diligence.

The freedom of religious belief is recognized in all civilized countries. There is indeed nothing to be said against anybody trying to gain spiritual peace by believing in whatever religious faith he or she considers to be true. But those who engage in strife on account of sectarian differences, or take part in politics or pursue political intrigues under the name of religious propaganda, will injure good customs and manners and disturb public peace and order, and as such shall be dealt with by law. There is no doubt, however, that a good religion, be it either Buddhism or Confucianism or Christianity, has as its aim the improvement, spiritual as well as material, of mankind at large, and in this not only does it not conflict with administration but really helps to in attaining the purpose it has in view. Consequently all religions shall be treated equally and further due protection and facilities shall be accorded to their legitimate propagation.

In coming to this country under the command of my Imperial Master, I have no other desire than that of increasing the welfare and happiness of the people placed under my administration. This desire on my part has induced me to point out to the people at length the general lines they should follow. No leniency will be expected by those who, entertaining malicious motives, try to obstruct the carrying out of any administrative measures. But all those who will behave themselves loyally and abide by law peacefully shall receive unto their posterity the benefit of a judicious and benevolent rule. You, people of Chosen, should therefore take due cognizance of the new regime and be careful not to go astray.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S DECREE.

INSTRUCTION TO RESIDENTS IN CHOSEN PROVINCE.

[TRANSLATION.]

By virtue of the Treaty of Annexation promulgated to day, Korea is annexed to the Empire of Japan and taking the name of Chosen becomes part of the Empire. All the people living in the new territory will come under the administration of the Imperial Government and enjoy the blessings of His Majesty's benevolent rule. The present state of things in Chosen, however, is not as yet on the same level as in the Empire proper. Consequently except those laws and regulations of the Empire which can be immediately adapted to Chosen, the Japanese and Korean laws and regulations actually in force in Korea, which should become void as a result of the annexation, will remain in force as orders of the Governor General, until they will gradually be amended in accordance with the progress of time. The Japanese municipalities, being organizations composed by Japanese subjects resident in Korea, while remaining as a foreign country, should by natural order of things be incorporated into local administrative organs of the new régime. But in view of the existing circumstances, under which their sudden abolition would cause no small inconvenience, their existence will be recognized for the time being and their adjustment will be effected when local administrative system into which they are to be amalgamated has been completed.

The treaties between Korea and foreign Powers shall be abrogated and those between Japan and foreign Powers shall be applied to Chosen as far as circumstances permit. In consequence the subjects and citizens of the foreign Powers living in Chosen will enjoy the same rights and privileges as in Japan proper and at the same time will come under the jurisdiction of the Empire. It follows that all law suits concerning foreigners resident in Chosen will be dealt with by our courts of justice exactly as those concerning other people in general.

With regard to customs tariff, however, the case is somewhat different in circumstances. Inasmuch as the immediate application to Chosen of the national or conventional tariff of the Empire will not only cause a sudden and momentous change in the foreign trade of the peninsula but will seriously affect the economic conditions of the interior, the Imperial Government has decided to allow the present rates of the customs tariff to remain in operation regardless of the treaty provisions. In consequence the same customs duties will be levied as those hitherto imposed on commodities exported from and imported to Chosen as well as on those passing between Chosen and Japan proper.

The aim and purpose of the annexation is to consolidate the bonds of the two countries, removing all causes for the territorial and national discriminations necessarily existing as separate powers, so as to perfectly promote the mutual welfare and happiness of the two peoples in general. Consequently should the Japanese people regard it as a result of the conquest of a weak country by a stronger one, and speak and act under such illusion in an overbearing and undignified manner, they would go contrary to the spirit in which the present step has been taken. Japanese settlers in Chosen seem to have hitherto considered to be living in a foreign land and have often fallen into the mistake of holding themselves as superiors at the expense of the people of the country. If, in connection with the inauguration of the new order of things, they were to enhance their self-conceit and subject the people just incorporated into the Empire to all sorts of insult they would arouse their ill-feeling, with the result that in everything they would come to offered collision and no opportunity would arrive for the establishment of an intimate relation between the two peoples, on the contrary it would lead an unfathomable calamity in future. It is opportune that things have now assumed a new aspect. Let them take this opportunity to change their ideas and attitude towards the people of Chosen. Let them always bear in mind that they are our brothers, and treat them with sympathy and friendship; and in pursuing individual avocations by mutual help and coöperation, both peoples should contribute their shares to the progress and growth of the whole Empire.

His Imperial Japanese Majesty's Residents are hereby enjoined to guide the people living under their jurisdiction in compliance with the present instruction and leave nothing undone to crown all administrative measures to be taken in future with success.

THE EX-EMPEROR'S FAREWELL.

CESSION OF SOVEREIGNTY.

[TRANSLATION.]

Notwithstanding Our unworthiness We succeeded to a great and arduous task and from Our accession to the Throne down to the present time We have used Our utmost efforts to follow the modern principles of administration. In view, however, of the long-standing weakness and deep-rooted evils, We are convinced that it would be beyond Our power to effect reforms within a measurable length of time. Day and night We have been deeply concerned about it and have been at a loss to find the means how to rectify the lamentable state of things. Should it be left as it goes on, allowing the situation to assume more serious phase, We fear that We will finally find it impossible to adjust it in any way. Under these circumstances, We feel constrained to believe it wise to entrust Our great task to abler hands than Ours, so that efficient measures may be carried out and satisfactory results obtained therefrom. Having taken the matter into Our serious consideration and firmly believing that this is opportune time for immediate decision, We have ceded all the rights of sovereignty over Korea to His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, in whom we have placed implicit confidence and with whom we have shared joy and sorrow from long time since, in order to consolidate the peace of the Extreme East and insure the welfare of our people.

You, all the people, are expected not to give yourselves up to commotion, appreciating the present national situation as well as the trend of the times, and enjoy the happiness and blessings by pursuing your occupations in peace and obeying the enlightened new administration of the Empire of Japan. We have decided to take this step, by no means disregarding your interests but in our eagerness to relieve you of this deplorable situation. We command you, therefore, to take due cognizance of our wishes.

KARUIZAWA NOTES.

Karuizawa, August 27.

We have just had a few bright days, an event of such rare occurrence as to be worth announcing. To-day, however, it has come on to rain again, and things have assumed their wonted sombre appearance. We do not, of course, complain of the extraordinary degree of cloudy weather so characteristic of this place. It is because Karuizawa is able to hide the sun a bit that it has its unchanging attraction for some of us. An unclouded sun, even among the mountains of Shinano, has as penetrating and as enervating effect as it has in Tokyo or Yokohama. A few days of this hot weather are well enough to give one a rest, but such sunny days make picnicking and other excursions rather uncomfortable undertakings. We therefore gladly welcome the cloudy weather, even though it is apt to be wet, as best adapted to the purposes for which most of us withdraw here, namely, recreation and fresh air.

Our picnics this year have not been without some measure of excitement. There appears to be a decided tendency to give these occasions a denominational, or a national, colour; hence we have Missouri Picnics, Canadian picnics, Methodist picnics, C. M. S. picnics, and so on. Well, the thing is not nearly so bad as it sounds; attendance on these occasions is much more pleasant than mention of them, because then one learns from the inside that the drawing card is not so much the name as the good spirit that prevails and the convenience of limiting the number attending. When one remembers that the population of Karuizawa increases by over 1,000 foreigners, and as many Japanese, annually during the summer season, it will be easily understood how picnics must be limited as to the number of those invited; and it can also be well understood how members of the same mission, separated as they are for twelve months, naturally like to have a chance of meeting and renewing auld langsyne. Some one will ask where the excitement comes in on such occasions. Those anxious or it, of course, are not always accommodated; but sometimes they are, and in very unexpected ways. Last week a picnic party had just arrived at a certain waterfall up the Usui toge; and one gentleman, charmed above measure with the ravishing scene, bent him over the great bowl whither the fall descended, to admire the action of the seething mass, when another gentleman, of another party, hurled from the brow of the fall above, a huge boulder, which, striking a rocky wall below, glanced off against the back of the man standing there, and the escape from death was very narrow indeed. For a time it was thought the blow might prove fatal, but the victim rapidly recovered, and the charge of manslaughter was averted. The rivalry between picnicking parties in Karuizawa is not always so extreme as this incident would naturally indicate, yet it would doubtless, even in this case, have been more in accordance with reason as well as religion, to have exercised greater circumspection. There are few of us so wise that we have no need to learn not to throw stones.

Our weekly concert still continues to furnish the most entertaining event of the moment. It is remarkable how entertaining and even amusing solemn looking members of a community of missionaries can be upon occasion. The experiences of the recent floods are said to have drawn us out and brought us nearer together, which is certainly true for those who lost houses and have had to go in with other families; but even most of those who did not suffer in the inundations, are regarded as evincing more liveliness than in the antediluvian days. It may be supposed that Noah, and the survivors of the ancient deluge, were more lively after the event, was over, though he must certainly have been busy previously in building accommodation for his extraordinary cargo. The postdiluvians of Karuizawa are emphatically more busy since the assuagement of the waters, and the weekly concert is a good illustration of it. The chairman announced at a concert sometime ago that most of the participants on the programme were of a Presbyterian turn of mind; but if that meant long-facedness and Calvinistic aspect generally, the ladies and gentlemen who took part in the concert did not in any way show it. In fact some members of other persuasions are decidedly more lawful in their attitude to life, for they have made it known that having consecrated their voices to Heaven, they can no longer favour the community with songs not definitely and verbally religious. Some of us think that God has had as much to do with the making and singing of a good song as He has with many so-called hymns, and in certain cases more so, for the teaching and art of some of the fine old songs are more conducive to pleasure and profit than some of the more sentimental religious effusions. It is indeed difficult to say that anything really good is not religious; that is, if by religion is meant an expression of the will of the Creator, drawing Him nearer to men.

Some of our religious endeavours come back to us with strange and not unmixed reflections. After the flood we joined in the subscription lists for those suffering from the ravages of the water. It is not known exactly how the money was divided among the needy, but probably it was given in as fair a manner as it could be. The various cooks and other domestics of the village likewise chipped in and contributed a certain sum to those losing property in the flood. Well, a few nights ago the community was kept awake to the small hours by having to listen to unearthly yells and howling through the village and out among the environs. What it meant no one could guess. Frightened housemaids and foreign ladies fled home to escape the parties whence the wierd sounds proceeded, lest there might be danger in encountering them. The secret was known the next morning when a certain donna san called in his cook and demanded of him an account of his extraordinary actions the previous night. "Oh," said the master of the cuisine department, "the citizens who had received donations on account of their losses in the recent floods, last night gave a sake-drinking bout to the contributors to the fund, and as most of us got drunk, we made a noise coming home." It was one of those very natural things, you see, that could not be very well helped; but it was an eye-opener to some of us as to the best and most agreeable way of impressing our spirit of gratitude on those who sacrifice themselves in pocket for our convenience. It is a question, though, whether those who have been begging in Karuizawa will be generous enough to take the hint. The collectors for orphanages and blind schools could by giving a similar spree to their patrons show that they had not taken the sums collected as mere matters of course. The various churches have been taking special collections for certain eleemosynary institutions. Why should not these show some appreciation to their benefactors by putting up the treats in some tangible and unforgettable manner? And when the reverend gentlemen who have received consolation prizes for having lost their houses in the flood and for being able themselves and their families to succeed in disembarking before the house got too far down the stream, are able to replace their dismantled villas, we shall expect them to give us a rousing house-warming, hot and to the point. Well, I have an idea about this. The Japanese spirit of hesitating to take even a charitable contribution for nothing is not such a bad spirit; perhaps it is one that more of us might profitably share. The mistakes made in giving vent to this feeling of manly independence do not at all invalidate the quality of the motive prompting it. Such a motive carried to its logical conclusion in an intelligent and Christian way contributes much to the finest kind of manhood. I therefore leave with the public a question for solution: Is the man made tipsy by gratitude, in a worse plight morally than the man who has not gratitude enough to balance a glass of sake?

SEMPER IDEM.

THE SUNGARI NAVIGATION QUESTION.

THE NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN RUSSIA AND CHINA.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

August 11, 13 and 16.

I am privileged to give from an authoritative source the following account of the results of the negotiations recently concluded between Russia and China concerning the navigation of the River Sungari. My informant said: "According to Art. 18 of the Treaty of St. Petersburg (done in 1881) the Chinese Government undertook to come to agreement with the Russian Government concerning the manner of carrying out the provisions of the Aigun (done in 1858) and St. Petersburg Treaties touching the right of Russian subjects to navigate their vessels on the Sungari. This undertaking did not prevent China issuing independently in 1909 regulations for Russian ships. Our Minister at Peking, however, protested against this violation of treaty and compelled the Chinese to recognise the right of Russia to take part in drawing up the regulations for this purpose. This protest was the beginning of prolonged negotiations, first at Kharbin and afterwards at Peking, which have now led to the issue of regulations that are in accordance with Russia's treaty rights.

From the date of the Portsmouth Treaty of Peace the Chinese Government has sought systematically to deny, in theory and in practice, the binding force of the relations established by treaty between our two countries. Taking its stand on Art. 8 of the Portsmouth Treaty, in which Russia declared that she "did not possess in Manchuria any preferential or exclusive concessions whatsoever, calculated to infringe the sovereign rights of China or incompatible with the principle of equal opportunity," the Government of China, now in one, now in another isolated question, has been violating its obligations and endeavouring to deprive us of our just rights. This may be accounted for, to some extent, by the fact that certain isolated points in our treaties with China are comparatively out of date and no longer accord with the present interests of China and the newly awakened sense of her importance. But this explanation cannot, of course, serve as any justification for the course of action adopted by the Government of China. It was open to the Government, if it desired to set aside as being, in its opinion, abnormal the above-mentioned state of things, to have recourse to friendly negotiations, all the more so that it has the right in 1911 to demand a reconsideration of our fundamental treaty, the St. Petersburg Treaty of 1881. Instead of taking this course the Government of China preferred to go on violating its treaty obligations, which naturally called forth protests on our part. The navigation of the Sungari, to which it apparently attached special significance, was one of the questions on which the Chinese Government violated treaty obligations. Beginning with the arbitrary introduction, without preliminary agreement with us, notwithstanding the provision therefor in the St. Petersburg Treaty, of regulations for the navigation of the Sungari, the Chinese, after receiving our protest, in the first phase of the negotiations obstinately maintained all points of the regulations, in flat contradiction to the provisions of the Aigun and St. Petersburg Treaties. They obviously counted upon being able to effect, for the first time, a breach in the system of privileges governing our trade by the land routes in order, against the date when the St. Petersburg Treaty came up for reconsideration, to be in a position to take their stand upon a whole series of concessions secured by them.

In view of this our diplomacy, in the negotiations for revision of the regulations issued by the Chinese, had to pursue a double aim; to draw up regulations of such a nature as would admit of the further development of our trade in the basin of the Sungari and to confirm the force of existing treaties with China. That the first of these aims was attained is satisfactorily guaranteed by the fact that our technical specialist delegates, who are fully competent in all questions of navigation and trade on this river, took part in the negotiations. As to the second aim it is necessary to dwell upon it somewhat more at length.

The diplomatic dispute between us turned in substance upon the question whether the system established by our treaties for our trade by the land route should be extended to our trade by the River Sungari, or should our trade by the Sungari be put on all fours with trade by sea routes, and be brought under the system existing in China on rivers navigable from the open sea. This question was decided in the first sense, that is, in accordance with the views we supported: trade by the Sungari is subject to the lesser dues of the tariff in force for our trade by the land routes: vessels on the Sungari are freed from the tonnage dues, and the navigation on this river is thus free.

In the less important question of the freedom of trade in the 50-verst zone from the frontier the Chinese also conceded our demands by acknowledging that the import of Chinese goods into this zone on our territory should be relieved of the export dues irrespective of whether the goods came from the Chinese 50 verst zone or from districts in the interior of China.

Thus in the question of the navigation of the Sungari our treaty rights have been fully confirmed, which puts in our hands a valuable card for negotiations on numerous other points in which the Chinese are endeavouring to ignore their treaty obligations.

Two factors in particular must be acknowledged as having conduced to our success: the firm tone taken by our diplomacy, which made it plain to the Chinese that we had decided to yield up nothing of our just rights, and the Russo-Japanese Agreement of July 21/3 August last. It is significant that the most important concessions of principle by the Chinese coincided with the time when the press was busy discussing the forthcoming Russo-Japanese Agreement. The final concession, however, followed upon our agreement with Japan and possibly not without some influence brought to bear by her, inasmuch as the Japanese Government was advised by us that in the question of the Sungari we had resolved to retain our freedom of action. Thus the Russo-Japanese Agreement has already brought in its firstfruits.

There is one point in our agreement with China about the navigation of the Sungari which deserves to be specially noted. While categorically maintaining our treaty rights we have nevertheless paid great attention at the same time to the interests of China in this matter: we did not insist upon any impossible demands, we made no endeavour in this way to secure for ourselves the continuance of the existing state of things by which our vessels on the Sungari were free from any form of dues or control by the Chinese: we have thus afforded the Chinese a regular source of income to cover the expenditure necessary to maintain the river in a navigable condition; we have acknowledged the part played by Chinese Customs on the Sungari, merely reducing them to such proportions as are in accordance with our legal rights. This just and moderate course of action on the part of Russia will undoubtedly be appreciated by China, if not at the present moment, when the feeling of chagrin caused by failure is still strong, at any rate later on, when she looks back more coolly upon the part. This course of action is precise y the one which our diplomacy must seek to maintain also in all further relations with the Government of China. It is the surest way of restoring our age-old feeling of friendship with China. It is without, at the same time, yielding up our interests and the rights secured to us by treaties in force. Our rapprochement with Japan can not make us forget our other neighbour in the Far East: the drawing of China into the orbit of our policy would, it may safely be said, be the best issue out of the position that has now been created in the Far East, and would best of all secure for us the interests we have there."

KOREA.

(FROM OUR SEOUL CORRESPONDENT.)

Some of us thought that when the throes of Boxerdom were over a new day was to dawn for China, in which her rapid ascent to the first place in the Far East would surprise the world.

Ten years have passed and China is just about as much as she was, as she ever can be. No new ideas of government, no better notion of political reform, no noticeable forward step, and yet the tourist, and missionary, and globe-trotter from China are eternally hopeful—"Greatest people in the East," "Wonderfully strong race the Chinese," "Trustworthy as the sun," "True as steel," etc., etc.

Looked at from a distance, one might think them a dirty, superstitious, ignorant, proud race, whose Minister of Foreign Affairs knows no more of his department than a spoiled child, whose sum total of countless individuals makes a most wretched showing before the world, hardly worthy of the name of nation.

Korea has drunk her deadly potion from China, till a sense of reality, comparative importance, true worth etc., is lost and all kinds of bubbles are caught at instead.

In Korea the individual man is kind and unselfish, and to a wonderful degree trustworthy. In fact the experience that one has with the individual makes the national failure a greater mystery than ever. Why with such an agreeable, bright, capable, honest lot of individuals, such a night-mare of a nation should materialize defies solution. On the other hand many foreigners in Korea have had unhappy experiences with individual Japanese, till they conclude that the "Cretans are all liars," and yet the national result and sum-total of Japan belie such conclusions.

Koreans are kind as a people, and yet such cruelty as her government has shown is hardly seen even in Turkey. Koreans are wonderfully honest individually, servants will serve faithful as shepherd dogs for years, and yet for "graft," and political and social corruption no nation ever was more deadly.

Koreans are capable not only in the matter of academic studies, but of industrial work as well. This they have proven at home and abroad, and yet the net result of industry in Korea is as shocking a sum-total as the world has ever seen.

They are wise and far-seeing when it comes to serving a master and telling what he needs to day to-morrow and for many evenings to come, but what the public might need or posterity might enjoy to-morrow and the next day and fifty years hence has no place whatever in the whole round of their mental circumference. Wood is all burned up, roads are left to go to the dogs, buildings may tumble down ad lib, what does it matter to him? What ails the Koreans as a people? Some who have read and studied the longest are the most baffled to say.

Koreans individually are a fairly clean people in their ways, dress in well washed linen, appreciate the bath, and have neat cosy rooms and courtyards, while the town in general is filthy beyond compare, and the old gutters and runnels of Seoul were a sight for the gods.

We conclude, as the ever hopeful admirer of China does, that the Korean has in him material for a capable strong man, if he be but given a chance under a sympathetic and wise teacher. Let us hope that the day will come when the latent worth within him, like the gold in his quartz hills, will be, by breaking up, washing, extracting, refining, brought to light, and he become one of the Far East's best men.

SPECTATOR.

DR. KIKUCHI ON AMERICAN EDUCATION.

During his visit to the States last year Dr. Kikuchi, after delivering lectures on Japanese education, went around to some twenty-five universities and made fifty speeches in various towns. In an address given in Ōsaka some weeks ago, reported fully in the August Taiyo, he gives an account of American education and the way it impressed him. He is of opinion that Japan has much to learn from America on educational subjects. I can do no more than furnish a bare outline of his speech. It will no doubt attract considerable attention in this country, especially among that large section of the educated public which disapproves of the school system now followed in Japan.

(1) The American System of Education.—Compulsory attendance at school extends over 8 years. Four of these are spent at a Primary School that ranks with our Jinjō Shōgakkō, and four in a Grammar School, which maintains a standard corresponding to our Kōtō Shōgakkō. If a student desires to continue learning he enters a High School. The American High School is the same grade as our Middle School. The course there extends over four years. In Japan a boy remains 6 years in a Primary School and 5 years in a Middle School, making eleven in all, one year less than the American youth. After this a great many students enter a university or a college of some sort. Dr. Kikuchi goes somewhat minutely into the sense in which the terms university and college are used in America and into the class of subjects studied at these institutions. As regards the years which a thorough education in America requires, Dr. Kikuchi finds that they exactly correspond to those spent at school and college by a Japanese youth of ordinary ability. They number 18. He enters the Primary School at the age of 6 and finishes his professional or special course at the age of 24.

(2) The Size of Classes.—In America the classes are small, often consisting of only 15 pupils, never exceeding 25. This yields better results than can be obtained in this country, where in Primary Schools there are as many as seventy scholars in one class.

(3) The Mingling of the Sexes.—In the States the rule is for boys and girls to be educated together in the Primary and Middle Schools and also in the universities. The exceptions to this rule are few in number. In San Francisco there is but one Primary school where boys only are taught and two schools where only girls are taught. In all the other schools there is a mixture of the sexes. There are more girls than boys in San Francisco. In the Eastern States there is much opposition to the mingling of the sexes, and so they are often instructed separately in that part of America. The universities in the central States and the Western States admit both girls and young men, but in the Eastern States there are separate universities for women. Girls are kept out of Harvard and Columbia during the college course, but they are associated with men subsequently when special investigations are in progress. The question of the advisability of mingling the sexes is not a purely educational question. Its settlement must depend largely on social conditions and prevailing sentiment among men and women. Even in America it has many disadvantages and it goes without saying that its introduction here, with society as it is now, would be quite impossible.

(4) The excess of women teachers in the States.—When I reached Seattle I was asked to deliver an address to the teachers of the various schools in the town and others. Among about a thousand people who assembled to hear me nine hundred were women. The term "school teacher" in America must be understood as feminine in gender, and if a personal pronoun is to be used then she is the safest to employ. Coming to the question as to whether the course now followed in America is the best one, from inquiries made it seemed to me that among those who have studied the subject opinion was against the employment of so many female teachers. It was contended that boys lose much by being brought up under feminine tutelage. It is said that the practice of employing so many women as teachers has an economic origin. They can be procured at cheaper rates than duly qualified male teachers. In Japan we are beginning to discuss the limits within which female teachers can be profitably employed. In recent years in educational magazines much has been published on this subject.

(5) The method of Teaching followed in the States.—In America far more importance is attached to fundamental principles and truths than to anything else. Teachers avoid filling their pupils' heads with numberless facts, holding that this is calculated to confuse the minds of learners. They do not adopt the practice, common elsewhere, of adding to what is given in the text-books in use a large amount of additional explanatory matter, nor do they cite examples from various sources. Their aim is to give the pupil a firm grasp of the essentials of the subject. Pupils are encouraged to carry on their own investigations all the time, that is, to think for themselves, and this they do. Attached to each school there is a good library, and the teachers encourage the pupils to read up each subject for themselves and see that they do it. Instead of making lengthy quotations from a variety of writers or introducing long discussions of subjects in their text books, the American way is to incite pupils to hunt out things for themselves. They say "In such and such a history or in such and such an encyclopædia or dictionary you will find this fully explained, go and look it up." The teacher's chief aim is to put the student on the right track in his search for knowledge and to trust to his energy, ambition and perseverance to follow it up. There is something very fine about this method of instruction. It is much to be regretted that a directly opposite plan is followed here (Konnichi no Nihon no yarikata wa, fukō ni shite, mattaku sore to hantai de, &c.), where the notion prevails that everything the pupil is to learn must be taught him directly by the teacher; so the tendency is to increase the school hours from 30 a week to 35, and the teachers incessantly pour crowds of facts and details into a boy's head, most of which he forgets as soon as the examination is over. The whole thing is a farce (Ikura atama ni tsume-konde mo, shiken ga sumeba, wasurete shimatte nochi ni nokoru mono wa nai. Tsumari wa dame de aru).*

The object of education is to teach young people how to acquire knowledge for themselves. In America long school hours are not considered necessary. In many schools there is a whole holiday on Saturday, and on other days there is often no school in the afternoons. Much home work and study in libraries is expected of pupils, and not expected in vain. In America the school-master aims at teaching pupils how to apply principles in real life. The knowledge given is mostly of a practical kind. Preparation for real life is one of the main objects of education in America. An American lad is expected to know how water is conveyed to his house and something about gas, electricity, and the like. Of course it may be said that since life is so simple in this country no such knowledge is necessary here, but as mental training it is important that Japanese pupils should learn how laws and theories can be put into practice.

*Dr. Kikuchi expressed no such opinion as this before his London audiences. Why does he and why does Mr. Sawayanagi adopt a different tone from that which characterizes the speeches made to their fellow countrymen when addressing foreigners? Dr. Kikuchi's book on Japanese education is far too laudatory throughout to please most Japanese educational experts and those foreigners who know the defects of the present school system. (W.D.)

(6) Libraries and their use.—It is perfectly astonishing how well supplied with books is every village school in the States. The persons in charge of these libraries are always ready to inform pupils where any information wanted is to be found. Children's libraries abound everywhere, like the one we have at the Hibiya Park in Tōkyō. Pupils are taught by the librarians at the various schools how to consult books and to get the knowledge they need rapidly.

(7) Business Schools.—In this country all our Middle Schools only teach general subjects and do not aim at preparing pupils for after-life in any special manner. When years ago there was a rage for establishing Middle Schools in every part of the country I pointed out to the Mombushō that it would be best to combine the teaching of general subjects with instruction in agriculture, industry or commerce, and in this way to give lads an early start in preparation for the occupations they intend to follow. But my advice has not been adopted. In America most of the Schools that correspond to our Middle Schools are commercial, industrial or agricultural schools. In teaching technical subjects the Americans are not content with filling a boy's head with theories or principles, he is taken to places where the work that he looks forward to doing is actually going on, be it a factory, a work-shop or a business-house. The lads make use of the summer vacation for earning money or in working for nothing in the employ of the managers of houses of business or factories. Three things always go together in American education—the teaching of principles, the application of principles to practice and the development of ingenuity, or a superior kind of common-sense in the minds of pupils which enables them to invent ways of putting principles into practice.

(8) The Distinction between the rich and the poor.—In America the children of the poor only go to the Primary Schools established by the State, all others are sent to private schools. In Japan this is getting to be the practice followed in our big cities, but in rural districts there is no distinction between rich and poor—all alike go to the Primary Schools. The reason for keeping their children away from the State schools is a moral one as far as the Americans are concerned. They fear the contaminating results of intercourse between their children and the children of low-class Italians, Portuguese and Poles in a city like New York. We have the same feeling in Tōkyō. In the States practice differs in respect of mingling the rich and the poor. In Boston all alike go to the State Schools, and in the town of Brookline (4m. S.W. of Boston), where education is wonderfully advanced, the principle of the equality of the rich and the poor is strictly observed. In Japan at present no schools exist for the children of the rich in country places. Consequently parents who wish their children kept separate from the sons and daughters of low-class people are obliged to move to large towns or to the metropolis itself. This is inconvenient for them and injurious to the interests of the nation as a whole. This subject is closely connected with some great social questions. The great revolutions of history have all originated in the setting up of a high social barrier between the rich and the poor. We know that in both England and Germany the children of the well-to-do are not taught in the same schools as the children of the poor, but I for one discern evils connected with the adoption of the policy of discrimination and do not desire to see it universally followed here.

(9) Boards of Education.—Every town has one of these and their efficiency and the public spirit displayed by the members of these Boards impressed me very much during my visit to the States. Some of the most influential men in each town are elected to serve on these Boards and they cheerfully devote time and labour for the public good. Beneath the Boards are school superintendents—a fine body of men, who are carefully selected and to whom great responsibility is entrusted.

Dr. Kikuchi in his closing remarks dwelt on the large amount of money spent on education in the States compared to what is laid out here, and he then proceeded to bear testimony to the existence throughout the States of high class business morality, despite the cases of corruption reported in the newspapers from time to time. Here are the words he used:—Jitsugyō no ue ni oite America-jin no tokugi no takai to iu koto wa jitsu ni erai mono da. (In business matters the superiority of the morality of Americans is something extraordinary). He says that hitherto America has been one of Japan's best customs, but that according to present indications the two countries will come into keen competition in Manchuria and that effects of the different systems of education followed here and in the States will be manifested. Success in business depends largely on education. In Japan the amount of money available for education is comparatively small, so there is all the more need for wisdom in spending it. It is only by parents and teachers doing their utmost that we can produce such educational results as are to be seen in the United States, says Baron Kikuchi. America undoubtedly has great material resources, but she could never have reached the position she now holds among nations had she not succeeded by means of education in keeping up a supply of energetic and efficient workers. CONCERT AT KARUIZAWA.

Visitors at Karuizawa are bravely enduring the changeable weather here. Many are still enjoying the gracious moods of the elements. A concert was given by Professors Griffith at the Karuizawa Hotel which was attended by practically all the music loving visitors. An excellent programme was submitted. Professor Griffith was in splendid form and received the plaudits of the audience who thoroughly delighted in listening to his many enjoyable items on the flute and piccolo.

Miss Mabel Jansen played the accompaniments for the professor with great distinction, exhibiting no ordinary powers as a musician of intelligence and natural talent.

Mrs. Gibson, of Yokohama, sang three songs which were much enjoyed, Mrs. Knabenshue being excellent support as accompanist. While the room was not full, the high merit of the concert has prompted a request that the professor should give another, which we believe, has been arranged.

Mr. Hong Kong, President of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, has sent the sum of 750 yen to the Yokohama City Office as a contribution towards the relief fund for the sufferers from the recent floods in Tokyo and other prefectures.

On the 31st ult. being the 32nd anniversary of the birth of the Prince Imperial, His Highness received his Grand-Chamberlain and other officials at the Tamosawa Detached Palace. Congratulatory letters were presented to the Prince at that Palace.

On Wednesday the Chinese Admiral Sah Chen-ping was entertained at luncheon on board the Charleston by Real-Admiral Hubbard. In the evening the Admiral attended a banquet given by the Chinese Minister at the Club of the Yokohama Specie Bank.

The Austrian Baron Doblhoff, who had been accused of an infringement of the Railway regulations, sent a letter of apology on the 25th ult. to Baron Goto, President of the Railway Board. Consequently the Minister withdrew the action against the Baron.

Mr. Saito, acting Mayor of Yokohama, started on Tuesday morning for Nagasaki to present the official announcement to Mr. Arakawa, Governor of Nagasaki prefecture, that he was selected by the Yokohama City Assembly as the first candidate for Mayor of the city.

The Police authorities of Kanagawa prefecture have been requested by the U.S. Police Office to search for a Frenchman who had committed an atrocious crime in Kentucky. The villain has been traced to Yokohama. A reward of $6,000 is being offered for his arrest.

Prince Kujo has been ordered by His Majesty the Emperor to proceed to the Ise Shrines, the Jimmu Mausoleum, and the Mausoleum of the late Emperor, to make announcement of the amalgamation of Japan and Korea. The Imperial messenger left Tokyo on Tuesday on his mission.

A meeting of officers of the Yokohama Keizai Kyokai was held on Monday evening at the Social Club to discuss the settlement of the place for the new Yokohama Station. Governor Sufu was also present. The members expressed diverse views, so that they were unable to come to any decision.

According to the report of the Meteorological Station of this prefecture, the wind on Sunday night about 11 o'clock became furious, when lightning flashed from the S. S. W. At 1 a.m. on Monday the wind blew at the rate of 16 metres per second, and after 2 a.m. by which time the atmospheric pressure reached the lowest point and began to rise by degrees, the force of the wind also commenced to fall and its direction changed to W. S. W. The wind still continued to blow fairly strong until 9 a.m. The precipitation experienced on Sunday morning measured 25.2 m.m. in 1½ hours.

Mr. Yoshida of the Yokohama City Council and Messrs. Saito, Toi, and Wakisaka of the Yokohama City Assembly, started for Nagasaki on the 29th ultimo on a mission to obtain the formal acceptance of Mr. Arakawa, Governor of that prefecture, for the nomination as Mayor of Yokohama.

Herr. Dernberg, German ex-minister for Colonies, accompanied by Mr. Sakano, representative of Count Komura, arrived at Tokyo on Tuesday afternoon from Tsuruga. He was welcomed at Shimbashi by members of the German Embassy and Japanese officials. The ex-minister stopped at the Imperial Hotel.

Lieut.-General Baron Tsuchiya, Commander of the Fourth Division, has been placed on the retired list on being promoted General. Lieut.-General Baron Asada, Commander of the Twelfth Division, has been appointed his successor, and several other changes of Divisional and Regimental Commanders have taken place.

The celebration of Japan's amalgamation with Korea took place in Yokohama on Monday night. A lantern procession consisting of over 3,000 citizens marched through the streets of the city, and many stores were adorned with fanciful decorations. The Godairiki arranged at the Chitose-ro, Sumiyoshi-cho, was the most attractive.

The Minister of Education has given private instructions to the prefectural governors and the directors of all schools under the direct control of the Department of Education, to the effect that a cautious attitude should be taken with regard to the celebration of amalgamation, and it is desirable, if possible, not to hold such reunion as a scholastic body, lest it should cause misunderstanding.

On Monday evening many sections of the Yokohama populace proceeded through the town in a lantern parade, being welcomed everywhere they passed. About ten o'clock in the evening the procession reached the Daijingu Shrine at Iseya, when the announcement of amalgamation was made in front of the sanctuary. A similar procession is reported to have taken place at Kanagawa and Fujisawa of this prefecture.

Prince Tsai Hsun who was expected at Yokohama on Wednesday, is still staying at Oiso owing to quarantining of the steamer Manchuria because of a suspected epidemic case on board the vessel. It is reported that in the event of the Manchuria being detained for several days more, High Highness will probably leave for America on board the steamer Chiyo Maru on the 7th instant, until which time he will stop at Miyanoshta or Kamakura.

The Floods Relief Association of Tokyo has received the following contributions from leading bankers and other business-men in the city:—

	Yen.
Bank of Japan.....	20,000

Mr. Muroo	30

Baron Sufu, Governor of Kanagawa prefecture, and Mr. Saito, acting Mayor of Yokohama, have each sent a congratulatory message on account of the annexation of Korea to the Minister of the Imperial Household, begging His Excellency to lay it before His Majesty the Emperor. Simultaneously a telegram was sent to Marquis Katsura, the Premier, Count Komura, Minister for Foreign Affairs, and Viscount Terauchi, the Resident General, congratulating them on the annexation and thanking them for having devoted themselves to that cause.

A proposal for increasing the area of the city of Yokohama has been submitted by Governor Sufu to the Yokohama City Assembly. The extension suggested in the proposal is to take in Hodogaya, a part of Koyasu, Byobugaura, Ookagama, and several other villages in Kuragi district, which will add about 5,000 acres to the city, thus increasing the population by some 20,000. The City Assembly will, after deliberate discussion, give an answer by the 20th instant.

According to a wireless message received on Friday, the N.Y.K. steamer Sado Maru returning from Seattle had a hard voyage for four days from the 20th ultimo owing to a stormy sea. The weather had just become fair, the steamer being at a distance of 1,050 nautical miles from Yokohama. She is expected to arrive here on Monday morning. There are on board 92 first-class, 3 second-class, and 53 steerage passengers, who had learned of the recent disastrous floods in Japan before they left Seattle

Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress have been pleased to make the following donations in relief of the sufferers from the recent floods in Tokyo and eleven other prefectures:—

	Yen.
Tokyo	15,000
Saitama	5,000
Ibaraki	5,000

CORRESPONDENCE.

INOUE'S JAPANESE-ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Will any reader of the Japan Mail more conversant with the Japanese language than I am myself confirm or otherwise my belief that there is a serious omission in Inouye's Japanese-English Dictionary, published with such a flourish of trumpets in the spring of last year? I fail to find in the dictionary in question a single word that Romanized should begin with Gw. Brinkley's Unabridged contains 136 such words, while three other Japanese-English dictionaries in my possession have from 60 to 75 words each. I have looked under K, Ku, Kw,

G, and Gu for the missing words but they are not to be found, and I can only come to the conclusion that the ships containing them were overlooked in the printing. As Inouye has much to recommend it, especially the clearness of its type and the large number of illustrations it gives of the proper use of words, I feel that public attention should be called to this apparently inexcusable omission.

Yours etc.,

EX YOKOHAMIAN.

RAILWAY SMASH ON THE GRAND TRUNK.

London, August 26.

A collision has taken place on the Grand Trunk railway at Durand, Michigan, in which 18 persons were killed and 10 injured. The wreckage was fired and many of the passengers were incinerated.

[There appears to be a town of this name in Illinois, but not in Michigan.—ED. J.M.]

SPECULATORS IN FOOD.

Paris.—The Minister of the Interior and of Commerce are investigating the rise in the price of food. It is said that they will prosecute speculators who illegally deal in price raising.

INVESTIGATION OF RUSSIAN NAVAL FACILITIES.

London, August 25.

It is reported from St. Petersburg that with a view to the speedy reconstruction of the fleet the Tsar has ordered the Imperial Councillors Roehberg, Roediger and Dmitrieff to inquire into the administration of the Naval Construction Department, the output of the Imperial Dockyards, and to frame regulations as speedily as possible.

GERMAN SOCIALISTS.

At the Reichstag by-election at Schopau a Socialist gain was recorded.

LOSS OF LIFE IN U.S. FOREST FIRES.

It is reported from Spokane, Washington, that the charred bodies of twenty foresters have been found at Setzer Creek in Idaho. A heavy snowfall over an area of a hundred square miles has checked the fires.

COPENHAGEN CONFERENCE OF SEAMEN'S UNION.

At the Copenhagen conference the German delegates declared that an international strike of seamen at the present time would be insane and disastrous.

The British delegates protested and urged a British strike.

THE ANNEXATION.

LONDON OPINION.

London, August 27.

In London the annexation of Korea is described as the turning point in Far Eastern history. The fascinating question is, How far will Japan go?

The Conservative papers consider the change more nominal than real, as the independence of Korea has been merely a polite fiction. The Radical Daily News says that annexation has been carried out with a ruthlessness which is a terrible foretaste of Oriental Imperialism.

The Times declares that it has been plain for some time that the incorporation of Korea with Japan was the only sound solution of the many difficulties which arise. Japan has finally abandoned her insular position, adds the great journal. "We are convinced that she will face her larger destinies with the lofty, unfaltering courage always distinguishing her in high politics."

The Daily Chronicle is convinced that Japan will show the world that she appreciates the duties connected with annexation; while the Standard says the Japanese have now the chance of winning the good opinion of the world as a people able to rule others as well as themselves.

WISE AND FAR-REACHING STEP.

The Daily Telegraph says the Japanese have taken a prudent and wise step in annexing Korea, which will result in the peace and progress of the world and cannot fail to be of far-reaching importance.

CHINA AND TIBET.

PROBABLE RESTORATION OF THE DALAI LAMA.

Reuter's Darjeeling correspondent reports that it is believed that the Dalai Lama will possibly accept China's overtures and return to Lhasa, provided he is restored to his full dignity.

The Dalai Lama has invited the Chinese Amban at Lhasa to come to Darjeeling to confirm the suggestion.

ROOSEVELT'S TRIUMPH.

WAR WITH THE BOSSES.

Roosevelt's triumph has brought a declaration of war from the bosses, who say they will fight Roosevelt to the end.

THE WRECKED "BEDFORD."

APPEAL FOR FUNDS.

The Mayor of Portsmouth appeals to the public to be generous in donations in order to provide for the dependents of the victims of the cruiser Bedford.

SPIONITIS IN GERMANY.

TWO ENGLISHMEN ARRESTED.

Considerable excitement has been caused in Germany by the arrest of two Englishmen who are alleged to have been photographing the fortifications at Borkum.

The case is described as of national importance and England is charged with carrying out systematic espionage.

[Borkum is an island off the mouth of the River Ems, and an important base for torpedo-craft.—Ed. J.M.]

THE KAISER'S SPEECH.

London, August 28.

The speech of the Kaiser at a banquet in Königsberg has provoked great discussion in Germany. The Kaiser concluded with the following words:—"Looking upon myself as the instrument of the Lord, regardless of the views and opinions of the hour, I shall go on my way, which is devoted solely to the well-being and peaceful development of the Fatherland. In this, however, I shall need coöperation on every hand."

The Radicals regret that the Kaiser's emergence will serve [here there is a hiatus in the message] . . . which won for the Kaiser the respect and gratitude of his people. Even the Conservatives consider the speech indiscreet. The Socialist organ, Worwaerts, declares that the Kaiser has blown to the winds his promise to Prince Bulow, and urges that the Reichstag should be summoned to define the constitutional limits of the Crown.

ADMIRAL GAMBLE.

Rear-Admiral Gamble, who reorganized the Turkish Navy, has been appointed to the command of the Sixth Cruiser Squadron.

ITALY AND AUSTRIA.

London, August 29.

Rome.—The Foreign Minister San Julianio has proceeded to Ischl, where he meets the Austrian Foreign Minister, von Aerenthal, and the Emperor Francis Joseph.

TO REPLACE THE "BEDFORD."

The cruiser Newcastle has been ordered to be commissioned to replace the Bedford.

[The Newcastle is one of the new "Town" cruisers, ranking as second-class, and unarmoured. She has a displacement of 4,800 tons—half that of the Bedford—and a speed of 25 knots.—Ed. J.M.]

THE TURKISH NAVY.

Constantinople.—It is reported that proposals have been made to the Ministry of Marine for the sale of two warships about to be withdrawn from the British Navy; but it has been resolved henceforward to buy only new vessels built to order.

THE ANNEXATION.

London, August 29

Washington.—The Korean annexation treaty has been published. The Korean Tariff will be continued for a decade. Masampo as an open port will be discontinued and Shinwiju opened. Treaties between Korea and Foreign Powers will cease operating and Japan's existing treaties will be applied to Korea.

RUSSIAN SUBJECTS IN FINLAND.

St. Petersburg.—The Cabinet has approved the Bill conferring on Russian subjects in Finland rights equal to those of the Finns. The Bill provides that anybody, including officials, seeking to prevent such equality shall be liable to prosecution.

Berlin.—The German Crown Prince temporarily relinquishes his military duties on the 1st October, and will attend regularly at the Foreign and Colonial Offices for the study of Eastern politics preparatory to his voyage.

His Highness sails on the cruiser Gneisenau probably returning by a German liner.

THE KAISER'S SPEECH.

London, August 30.

Berlin.—The semi-official Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung vigorously refutes newspaper attacks on the Kaiser's speech especially the passage "go my way" and says it would be a bad King who would take opinions of the day as a rule of conduct.

THE KAISER EXPLAINS.

London, August 30.

The Kaiser speaking at Marienburg before the Teutonic Knights taught the lesson that Teutonism and Christianity were inseparable and that himself like his grandfather was working under the high trust imposed by God or so he understood it. The Kaiser assumed that every honourable Christian similarly understood it to be what he meant at Königsburg.

A SCOTTISH HIGHLAND TRAGEDY.

The body of the popular and beautiful second daughter of the Earl of Buchan was found on the moor near Aviemore. There are no signs of violence and a considerable sum of money was found on the body.

Later.

A post mortem has been held on the Earl of Buchan's daughter. It was found that she had injured her ankle and died from exposure and privation.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE WHITE.

Field-Marshal Sir George White is ill at Belfast. His condition causes grave anxiety.

Later.

Field-Marshal White is now pronounced out of danger. He was suffering from a heart attack.

ANOTHER CORNER IN COTTON.

New York.—There has been a jump in the price of cotton to twenty cents, the highest since the Civil War. The rise has been manipulated by a "bull" clique headed by Engine Scales, who are expected to clear 3 million sterling. They appear to control practically all the August cotton in sight.

AUSTRIAN MILITARY ATTACHE TO TOKYO.

London, August 31.

Vienna.—Captain Franz Putz of the general staff has been appointed military attaché to Peking and Tokyo in succession to Maj. B. de Dani-Gyarmata who has been relieved from the post.

CONSTRUCTION OF CHINESE CRUISER.

Admiral Li has arrived at Elswich to superintend the construction of the Chinese cruiser.

BRITISH TRADE RETURNS.

London, September 1.

The Board of Trade report shows that the imports from the Colonies last year increased by over 17 millions, and the imports from foreign countries by 15 millions. The total exports produced in the United Kingdom amounted to 378 millions.

OBITUARY.

General Forestier-Walker, lately Governor of Gibraltar, at Tenby in South Wales, of heart-failure.

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE TOKYO "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

RUSSIAN ADMIRALTY AND THE DUMA.

London, August 26.

St. Petersburg.—A Special Commission has been appointed to investigate Admiralty abuses. This is regarded as a victory for the Duma, which will probably vote a special grant for shipbuilding.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

Japanese securities are dullish.

THE KAISER AND HIS ARMY.

Berlin.—The Emperor, speaking at Königsberg, said he was pleased to assist in the development of the town by ordering the removal of the ring of fortifications. He was confident that with the help of God and the excellence of the Army it would be possible to maintain peace. If it ever became necessary to fight, the Prussian regiments would suffice, without the aid of ramparts and trenches.

THE BAGDAD RAILWAY.

Paris.—Work has not been stopped on the Bagdad railway, but is proceeding slowly. The syndicate, reported to have failed, has found a market for new bonds.

THE KAISER'S SPEECH.

London, August 28.

The Kaiser's speech has aroused a storm of outspoken criticism from the press. The papers question whether the speech was made with the knowledge of the Chancellor, or whether the Chancellor agrees with the views of the Emperor, namely, that he must go his own way unheeding public views and opinions. The moderate journals regret that the Emperor accentuated the contrast between the Divine Right of Kings and the decisions of popular assemblies.

FRENCH ARMY MANŒUVRES.

Paris.—Grand Army manœuvres taken place in Picardy in September. The Commanding General has been allotted 4 dirigible balloons and 3 aeroplanes.

THE SEAMEN'S STRIKE.

The International shipbuilding strike, upon which the Congress at Copenhagen has decided, will affect 135,000 sailors and firemen, of whom 70,000 are British.

TALKING PICTURES.

EDISON'S NEW DEVICE.

London, August 29.

New York.—Edison has exhibited a device whereby moving pictures appear to talk. The two separate machines, phonograph and kinoscope, are exactly synchronized by electricity.

THE "LONDON TIMES" ON ANNEXATION.

London, August 30.

The Times approves of the Japanese settlement of the foreign trade of Korea. During the decade which is allowed, British enterprise must consolidate the existing trade. Referring to the new tariff the Times points out that British fears are not allayed by reiterated assurances from Tokyo. The Times would have welcomed more regard by Japan for the views of her ally. It hopes that the Tokyo Government will meet the British importers half way.

GERMAN FLEET MANŒUVRES.

The Emperor reviewed the high sea fleet of 21 battleships 8 cruisers and 55 destroyers. The battleships were afterwards manœuvred. The movements however were not intricate.

STOCK EXCHANGE.

London, August 31.

Japanese and Russian securities are dull; Chinese are wanted.

AMERICAN POLITICS.

Washington. — Undoubtedly Roosevelt dominates the west. He was publicly urged at Denver to contest the presidency in 1912.

TERMS OF ANNEXATION CRITICIZED.

London, September 1.

The Berlin correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung sharply criticizes the terms of the Japanese Rescript and the treaty with Korea. It objects to the omission in the treaty of any mention of the rights of foreigners. The indefinite character of a portion of the rescript referring to foreigners suggests that Japan might have offered to the Powers some equivalent for the loss of their treaty rights before annexing Korea. The manner of carrying out the annexation is something new in international law, and a political victory of Japanese diplomacy over other countries.

THE EXHIBITION.

CROWN PRINCE'S BIRTHDAY CELEBRATED.

The birthday of the Crown Prince of Japan was celebrated at the Exhibition with illuminations, a display of fireworks and a lantern procession in which several hundred Japanese took part. Mr. Wada entertained a distinguished company, including many Japanese. Lord Rosebery (?) paid a high tribute to the Crown Prince, whose keen realization of his responsible high position was the more important because the Japanese intended to play a larger part in the history of the world.

DEAR FOOD CAMPAIGN IN FRANCE.

Paris.—The Labour Confederation proposes a campaign against those responsible for the increased cost of living. Workmen are invited to deal with coöperative societies, to boycott sugar, and eschew wine and meat until the prices are lowered.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

FLOOD IN NORTH MANCHURIA.

Mukden, August 26.

The student interpreter Kasuya, who has returned from the scene of the inundated Hsinmin-pu, reports that although the flood has much subsided, the damage was greater than at first believed. The flood occurred so suddenly that residents in the foreign settlement barely escaped danger and most of them lost the greater portion of their property. As the Chinese Police authorities were busily engaged in the rescue of their own families, the whole town was in a state of confusion. Three more police officers have been despatched. Rice and other daily necessities are being supplied by this Consulate. The Consul-General, Mr. Koike, accompanied by the interpreter Kasuga, will proceed to Hsimmupu to personally inspect the conditions, and is expected to return here the same day.

INUNDATION OF THE SUNGALI.

Harbin, August 26.

The Sungali River running near this town has inundated a part of the Chinese quarter. The result was not so serious as that residents should take refuge in other places.

AMBASSADOR INOUE.

Lima, August 25.

Ambassador Inoue and the tourist party left yesterday morning for Chili. On the 20th instant the Ambassador had an informal interview with the President and Minister for Foreign Affairs. The tourist party was received by the President two days later.

THE ANNEXATION.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"The annexation of Korea by Japan means that the latter, emerging from her advantageous insular status, boldly advances to a part of the continent, and that she will have to face one of the two following contingencies. If the Russo Japanese relations be left in their present unsettled state, the annexation of Korea will produce an unavoidable conflict between Russia and Japan. Will Japan be satisfied with Korea? Will she not extend her sphere of rights and influence to South Manchuria? So long, however, as Russia is busy in another part of the world, nothing will occur. But how about Japan's attitude towards China? The fall of Korea will start a movement of unrest, and the effect will be felt by the world at large.

MONTENEGRO'S PRINCE A KING.

Vienna, August 29.

By a vote of the National Assembly on the 28th inst. the Prince of Montenegro was raised to the rank of King.

LONDON NEWSPAPERS ON THE ANNEXATION.

London, August 30.

Referring to the annexation of Korea, The Times and the Morning Post express entire satisfaction that the Tariff is to remain unchanged for 10 years. The Standard adds further remarks in a friendly strain. On the 29th the Pall Mall Gazette wrote in a satisfied tone within the limits of the effect that annexation may be expected to exercise in the realm of trade, but the Daily Graphic is discontented that equality of opportunities will exist for 10 years only.

Russian journals write in an almost unanimous tone. They say that Korea's fate was sealed at the time of the Russo-Japanese Treaty. Japan had already annexed Korea in fact. What she has now done is a mere formality. She has carried out amalgamations after having obtained the consent of the Powers whose interests are concerned, and Russia approves. This is especially true of journals published in the French language. Further, the influential Moscow organ of the Octobrists argues that it must not be forgotten that Russia and Japan are now allies. Only the organs of the Government's political opponents sympathise with the Koreans. The organs of the Government's supporters regard annexation as a fact long ago accomplished. The Conservative editor, Mr. Menshikov, is about the only opponent.

("DEUTSCHE JAPAN-POST" SERVICE TO THE "JAPAN HERALD.")

GERMANY.

Berlin, August 25.

The Japanese Embassy at Berlin has communicated to the German Government the new Annexation Convention with Korea.

The Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung publishes the thanks of the Japanese Government for German sympathy in connection with the recent inundations.

The Kaiser has sent a personal letter of congratulation to Prince Nikita of Montenegro on the occasion of his accession to monarchical honours.

The Tsar and Tsaritsa are expected at Friedberg on August 29th.

The preparatory Zeppelin expedition has returned to Kiel from Spitzbergen.

GREECE.

The Crown Prince of Greece has returned to Athens.

GERMANY.

Berlin, August 26.

The Kaiser will pay a visit to the Tsar and Tsaritsa, when staying at Friedberg, in October.

The German Crown Prince will probably carry out the outward journey to the Far East on board the armoured cruiser Gneisenau, which will join the German East Asiatic Squadron afterwards.

The Kaiser, in a speech on the occasion of the celebrations at Königsberg, referred to the model life of Queen Luise of Prussen, in memory of whose death, one hundred years ago, celebrations have lately been held everywhere in Germany.

Two Englishmen have been arrested on the island of Borkum (in the North Sea) on suspicion of espionage.

SPITZBERGEN.

An agreement has been arrived at between Russia, Sweden and Norway as to the incorporation of Spitzbergen.

GERMANY.

Berlin, August 27.

The Kaiser, speaking at Königsberg, said that it is man's duty to cultivate the virtues of a soldier and that woman's principal place is in her family circle and not in public life. He further confessed that he would go on his own way in compliance with his vocation as a instrument of the Lord, and bent only on the wellbeing and peaceful development of the Vaterland. The speech of the Kaiser is much commented upon, the liberal and socialist press attacking it very strongly, the press of the other parties expressing itself in a more favourable manner.

Dr. Emil Reich, the well-known historian and lecturer at the University of Oxford, writing in the Morning Post, states that the last purpose of the German Crown Prince's journey to Japan and the Far East is the preparation of the annexation of the Dutch Colonies. These insinuations are very strongly contradicted by the German Press.

The judicial procedure against Fuerst Eulenburg has been postponed for two years owing to his state of health.

DENMARK.

The international shipping workmen's congress at Copenhagen has decided to eventually announce an international seamen's strike.

PORTUGAL.

The Republican movement in Portugal is steadily increasing.

RUSSIA.

St. Petersburg papers report that Count Stolypin will carry out a journey to the Far East to inspect Siberian colonisation work and the construction work on the Anjur railway.

Russia intends to augment her Black Sea Squadron.

CHILE.

The Government of Chile is sending a warship to Germany to carry home the body of the late Chilean President.

MONTENEGRO.

Berlin, August 28.

Montenegro has been proclaimed a royal monarchy.

PERSIA.

The situation at Teheran, Persia, is still remaining quiet.

SIBERIAN MAILS.

Siberian mails, ex Kobe up to August 13th, arrived at Berlin on August 28th.

GERMANY.

Berlin, August 29.

The German Liberal and Socialist Press, in its strong criticism of the speech of the Kaiser, as reported yesterday, is fully isolated, the Press of the other parties, even Austrian, British and French papers defending the Kaiser against the charge of pleading, when speaking at Koenigsberg, for an absolutist Government.

The Tsar and Tsaritsa have left for Germany.

Herr Loewe, chief of the well known Berlin small arms factories of the same name, is dead.

Cholera cases are increasing reported in Germany.

ITALY.

Prof. Paul Mantegazza, the well known Italian psychologist, of Florence, born in 1831, is dead.

PORTUGAL.

The elections in Portugal are passing quietly, but the results denote a steady increase of Republican votes.

RUSSIA.

King Nikita of Montenegro has been nominated Russian Field-Marshal.

TURKEY.

Berlin, August 30.

The Sublime Porte has presented to the Protective Powers a note, protesting against the participation of Cretans in the elections for the Greek National Assembly, demanding at the same time that the danger of war be averted.

MEETING OF FOREIGN MINISTERS.

Count Aehrenthal and Marquis Giuliano, the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Austria and Italy, have met at Salzburg for the purpose of holding a conference.

GERMANY.

The Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, in a leader, emphasizes that the speech of the Kaiser at Koenigsberg was not an act of the Government at all, but only an expression of his Majesty's personal conviction. He never had the intention to preach an absolutist Government and to disregard the representation of the people. The Chancellor would also lead the affairs of government in future as until now with full preservation of the Constitutional rights of the people, but he would defend the Kaiser against all arbitrary interpretations of his words. As a further interpretation of his words the Kaiser made a speech at Marienburg, emphasizing the necessity of the united efforts of all classes for preservation of peace and of a co-working of all religious parties in this direction. The Kaiser and Kaiserin have returned to Berlin.

The two persons, who have been arrested on the island of Borkun on suspicion of espionage, are believed to be British officers.

GERMANY.

Berlin, August 31.

Dr. Seitz, until now Governor of the Cameroons, has been nominated Governor of South-West Africa. Dr. Gleim, until now in the Colonial Office, succeeds to the Governorship of the Cameroons.

The Tsar and Tsaritsa have safely arrived at Friedberg and have been welcomed in a very cordial manner.

The Chancellor has had a conference, lasting two hours, with the Kaiser at Berlin.

Dr. Fonseca, the President of Brazil has expressed himself as very satisfied with his visit to Germany.

AUSTRIA.

Count Aehrenthal and Marquis Giuliano, in a conference at Salzburg, have discussed Austrian and Italian affairs and frontier incidents.

M. VENEZELOS.

Turkey is apprehensive regarding the eventual election of M. Venezelos, the leader in the Cretan question, as Greek Premier.

COUNT STOLYPIN.

Count Stolypin has left for Vladivostok on his visit of inspection to the Far East.

SCENE IN A NEW YORK CLUB.

LADY GAMBLERS AND A MIDNIGHT RAID.

London, August 10.

After an agony of suspense and terror, some thirty of the leading hostesses of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia are to-day laughing heartily at their escape from the clutches of a special force of policemen who in the early hours of Sunday morning raided the Narragansett Club, near Newport, one of the most exclusive institutions in the country.

It is difficult for a foreign observer to understand the confused legal apparatus by which a body of special constables could arrest on charges of gambling some of the most prominent members of American society, seizing their roulette wheels and money, only to find themselves a few hours later arraigned before a magistrate on charges of "carrying dangerous weapons for robbery and assault."

While the raid lasted it was serious enough, to judge by the descriptions printed in the New York newspapers, which devote columns to an artistic portrayal of the terror-stricken actions of the brilliantly dressed gamblers. It seems that a reform movement has recently been sweeping Rhode Island, where wealthy Americans have their summer palaces. Many raids had passed unnoticed when, in the early hours of Sunday morning, a young lawyer named Cross, who is also a special constable, determined to invade the hitherto sacrosanct Narragansett Club. Secretly enlisting the services of a number of the special constables, the raiding party, armed with axes and pistols rushed into the club.

There a brilliant spectacle greeted them. Thirty men and women, whose names are household words in American society, were drinking, smoking, and gambling. Piles of money were spread before the fair gamblers, who, when the constables proclaimed them under arrest, hid their faces in their hats and crept under the tables, seeking to conceal their identity. Finally all the gamblers were huddled in a corner of the glittering room, cowering before the revolvers of the raiders.

CAPTORS ARRESTED.

"Your name?" Mr. Cross asked of one lady. "Mary Jones," she answered, adding, with a scream, "you can't arrest me, I defy you to do it. Such a thing is impossible!"

Some of the prisoners fell on their knees, entreating to be released. Mr. Cross wrote down the absurdly fictitious names furnished him with a solemn face, inserting the real names opposite them. He informed the gamblers that they might go but that their presence would be required in court next Monday.

He was gathering the roulette wheels, counters, and money together when the local chief of police, Mr. Caswell, and half a dozen officers entered and sternly informed Mr. Cross that he had no authority to carry out the raid. A fight ensued, ending in the arrest of Mr. Cross and the force of special constables, who were released to day on bail in £500 each.

Though Mr. Cross declares that he has sufficient evidence to convict more than a score of men and women prominent in society, the latter are confident that they have succeeded in turning the tables on the raiders. "Yes," one lady replied to the inquiries of a reporter, "we did go to the club about midnight after a dance at the Casino just to have supper. It is true that after supper we went to the playing rooms, just as we do at Palm Beach, you know."

"We were playing in a dignified, orderly way, when Mr. Cross dramatically entered the rooms and proclaimed that we were gambling, and that he declared us under arrest. Well, you see what happened to this zealous young constable-lawyer. His conduct really was outrageous."

The Attorney-General of Rhode Island this afternoon declared his inability to understand why the chief of police who was sent to assist Mr. Cross, should have arrested him. He intimates that he intends to solve the mystery.

NICARAGUAN PRESIDENTS.

Apropos of the telegram which appears in another column it may be noted that Nicaragua ended last year with President Zelaya in office. He was deposed by General Estrada. General Estrada is therefore the third President to assume control within ten months. As each deposed President considers himself still head of the Republic the Nicaraguans might well adapt, with the necessary antimonalarchical amendments, the toast

"God bless the King, he is our land's defender
God bless—no harm in blessing—the Pretender:
But which Pretender is, and which is King,
God bless us all, that's quite another thing."

Managua is the capital of Nicaragua and has a population of 36 000.—N.-C. Daily News.

BIG FOREST FIRES IN U.S.

Placerville, August 13.

Two for st fires are raging and although large numbers of men are fighting the flames they do not hope to get them under control unless rain should come to their aid soon.

They are simply fighting to keep the flames away from habitations.

The largest of the fires is four or five miles northeast of Georgetown, Idaho. The other is on the American river slope two or three miles from Shoot camp.

MINING CAMPS DESTROYED.

Spokane, Wash., August 13.

The plant, including compressors, cabins and blacksmith shop, owned by the Liscon mining company, on Big creek, near Wallace, Idaho, has been wiped out by fire, entailing a loss of about $20,000.

The buildings of the Blue Bell mining company, near the same place, have also been burned. The miners succeeded in carrying the portable equipment in'to the tunnel where it was saved.

Reports from Bird Creek on the St. Joe river, say the mining camps there have been burned. The same is true on Pine creek, where the fire has swept over valuable timber and is still raging unabated.

Wallace, Idaho, August 13.

With 1,000 men fighting fires in the Coeur d'Alene national forest, with the weather calm and a prospect of rain, the forest fire condition here is much improved to-day.

Tales of perilous adventure are being brought here by the fire fighters who escaped from the Slate creek fire Thursday. A number made their way to Averytown on the Chicago, Milwaukee and Puget Sound railway, others came to Wallace, arriving here last night, while a number are still missing.

Those who arrived here say that they were forced to take refuge in Slate creek for hours while the country all around was a roaring furnace.

The greatest difficulty now is getting supplies to the fire fighters. The bake shops at Wallace are running night and day to supply the fighters with bread.

Missoula, Mont., August 13.

In the forests about Missoula the situation is worse to-day. Fire is spreading along Belmont creek and 50 men have been asked for. The Lolo Hot Springs fire is also unchecked.

Companies I. L. and M. of the third battalion of the Fourteenth infantry, stationed at Fort Missoula, arrived home from American lake in a special train this morning and later in the day were dispatched to the scene of the forest fires in this district.

Company I left with Forester Greely for the Clearwater forest, via the Lol pass, and Companies I and M followed Indian Agent Mo gan back to the reservation. Two more companies of soldiers have been ordered here from the encampment.

Washington, August 13.

Two companies of infantry from Fort Wright, Washington, have been ordered to Wallace, Idaho, and one to Kalispell, Mont., to aid in fighting local forest fires.

The two companies now en route to Glacier park will be divided and one will be dispatched to Kalispell, giving that section two companies.

Major General Leonard Wood, chief of staff of the army, to-day asked the interior department and the forest service to agree on a joint plan for the use of United States troops for fighting the forest fires in the west.

THE POSSIBILITIES OF THE HYDROPLANE.

For a great many years the possibilities of the hydroplane have been a matter of discussion among those interested in high-speed boats, but it has only been since the advent of the petrol motor that there has been any practical development. The essential difference between the ordinary boat and the hydroplane is, says Engineering that while the former has a displacement which is at all times approximately equal to its weight, the latter rises in the water at full speed to such an extent that its displacement is practically nil. The principle on which the hydroplane depends for the maintenance of its position is, in fact, exactly the same as that controlling the motion of a flat stone skimming along the water when it is thrown in playing "ducks and drakes." In order that the stone should stay at the top of the water when thrown, it is necessary that it should move at a certain speed, and similarly, in the case of the hydroplane, it is necessary that a certain speed should be maintained, or the boat will not rise out of the water as desired. It is, of course, essential that the hydroplane should float when at rest, and also when running slowly, and it therefore must have sides giving it a reasonable freeboard. The original hydroplanes were built very much like a punt, with a flat bottom of special shape. There are, however, many practical objections to this form, for although some very high speeds have been recorded in proportion to the size of the boat, such vessels are absolutely useless except in quite smooth water, and, further, below a certain critical speed, are very inferior to the ordinary boat. It is for these reasons that the hydroplane was not of any practical use till the advent of an engine which was very light in proportion to its power. At low speeds the hydroplane has a very much greater resistance than the ordinary boat, for the reason that it has to plough through the water and is of very inferior form to do it. At a certain critical speed, however, the whole boat lifts till there is really no bulk of it in the water at all, and then it skims along the surface of the water with very little resistance. It is obvious, therefore, that the hydroplane will have no advantage over the ordinary boat unless the engine is powerful enough to maintain the speed at which it lifts, and this involves an engine weighing some 10lb. per horsepower or less. Such engines were not commercially available till the advent of high speed petrol-motors, and hence it is only recently that the hydroplane has made any notable performances.

SCOTTISH HOME RULE.

Apropos of the movement in favour of Home Rule for Scotland, The Duke of Argyll writes as follows to The Times:—

The manifesto of some M.P.'s in favour of a repeal of the Union, separate "National" Parliaments, &c., is probably caused by impatience at delays in passing measures advocated by different parties. Let us suppose that all the impatient men desire, is desirable. But before they reduce their country from the position of partner to that of a poor relation, would it not be well to inquire if their encouragement of "the pride of meaner place" be not an extravagant indulgence in haste? Is it not the fact that new Parliaments cost money, and that some of the cost must be laid on the Imperial Exchequer? Is not delay in granting demands a sign that Government finds it difficult to meet the expenses involved? Would these demands be more easily met, when estrangement has taken place between London and Edinburgh, if Edinburgh is to be the seat of the Scottish Parliament in preference to Glasgow? What additional power of raising money is Scotland to have if we are to go back to the footing on which the two countries were at the time of the Darien enterprise?

Will the 21 M.P.'s become guarantors to Scotland for the new costs of separate "National" legislation?

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

On Tuesday morning a furious hailstorm occurred at Sendai and vicinity. Much damage to crops is reported.

On the 27th ultimo a fire occurred at Nagaoka, Echigo province, resulting in the destruction of over 70 houses, covering in all 2,170 tsubo. The loss is estimated at 36,000 yen. Four firemen, two policemen and several others were more or less seriously injured.

BRADSTREET's weekly reports under date of Aug. 6th, 1910, as follows:—

Advices from Buenos Aires indicate that complete harmony prevails in the Pan-American conference in session there, and that the general disposition of the Latin-American delegates is one of especial friendliness to the United States.

SIR WILFRID LAURIER told the United States settlers in Saskatchewan that they ought to interest themselves in the affairs of the country and "unite with one or the other of the great political parties." The Victoria Colonist suggests that it would accept a small wager it could name the party Sir Wilfrid would prefer to have them join!

AN American newspaper suggests that If Walter Wellman the Chicago newspaper man gets as far on his balloon trip across the Atlantic as he did on his trip toward the Pole—about thirty miles—it will be easy for a passing coaster to rescue him. It might be well to add however that if Walter Wellman makes as much money out of this trip as he did out of the former, he won't need to do any more exploring (?).

THE health returns for Kobe week ending the 27th ultimo show that there were five cases of dysentery, and two of typhoid fever. Three cases of dysentery, and three of typhoid fever proved fatal during the period. Twenty-two cases of dysentery, one of scarlet fever and eighteen of typhoid fever were under treatment. The total number of births registered during the week was 157. There were 119 deaths.

ACCORDING to a Nagasaki despatch, H.B.M.S. Atucity, which reached that port on the 24th ultimo from the scene of the Bedford's disaster, reports that the vessel has been submerged up to the upper deck, only leaving the funnels out of water. The crew were all taken to the Minotaur and Monmouth. It is considered a very difficult task to save the cruiser. The Kent, which has been lying in port, again proceeded to the scene on Wednesday afternoon.

It is reported from Saselso that the Ryojun Maru returned there on the 27th ult. from the scene of the Bedford's disaster, carrying on board four 6-inch guns salvaged from that vessel, and the Chefoo Maru and Saseho Maru with the whole Japanese reserve party the next day. The Izumi Maru and Saruhashi Maru again left Saselso for the scene on the 29th. Although the bodies of those who died in the engine room are still lying there, they could not have been taken out on account of high waves.

THE steamer Ryoto Maru (2,222 tons) which left Yokohama on the 24th ultimo for Otaru, ran aground on a shoal off Funiyama, Chiba prefecture at daylight the next day. Without any loss of time the police authorities helped by some villagers went to the rescue, and the cargo, chiefly consisting of sugar and cement, was partly discharged in order to facilitate the refloating of the vessel. In the meantime the passengers on board the steamer were all taken to land and a message was sent to the Naval Office asking for the despatch of a man-of-war.

THE last night train from Hiroshima arriving at Kure at 11.10 p.m. on the 25th ult., the engine was detached from the rest of the train, and went down the line to get switched on to another track, so as to be ready to start as the first train the next morning. Through some accident or mismanagement the engine ran at great speed for a distance over three cho, destroying a stone-wall, and rushed into the river Sakai. Fortunately there were no casualties, but a person who happened to be fishing on the river bank was slightly injured. A large number of workmen were despatched from Hiroshima to the scene.

ACCORDING to the report of the Central Meteorological Observatory, the atmospheric pressure on Tuesday morning was high in the vicinity of the Bonin Islands and low off the southern part of Formosa. The weather was generally fair in Kyushu and the coast districts of the inland sea, while in some parts of the eastern section of the main Island showers and thunderstorms were experienced. The centre of the low-pressure area measured over 748 m.m., while the depression has not commenced its progress. On Wednesday southerly winds prevailed in the Main Island and easterly winds in Kyushu fine and rainy weather were shared throughout the whole country.

REGARDING the murder of the Kendall family, the following paragraph shows that the Japanese residents display an admirable spirit, which cannot fail to react for good, as it serves to distinguish them so definitely from the Chinese societies, which have apparently always striven to their utmost to protect one of their number from arrest, even though a known criminal. The Japanese residents of this city held a large meeting to-night, which was attended by prominent Japanese from other places, to discuss the Kendall murder and means of assisting the police in arresting Yamaguchi. It was decided to call on all the other Japanese associations in the State to lend their aid to the authorities, and to offer a reward for Yamaguchi if he is not apprehended in a few days. Assistant District Attorney Hoyle said last night that he had received word from District Attorney Lea that he expected the arrest of Yamaguchi in San José to-night or to-morrow morning.

ITCHED SO HE COULD NOT SLEEP

Suffered Badly from Eczema on Face and Body for Over Two Years—
Very Inflamed and Disfiguring—Doctor's Prescription did No Good —Gave It Up as a Bad Job.

CALLS HIS CURE BY CUTICURA WONDERFUL

"I suffered from eczema on my face and body very badly for two and a half years. The first signs of my complaint was an itching about the neck and face which gradually became very inflamed and started to come out in disfiguring red blotches. These itched so that I could get no sleep at night. I was advised by friends to use different kinds of remedies, but all to no avail. I had a doctor's advice and took two bottles of his medicine, but they did no good. Then I gave it up as a bad job until I saw an advertisement of the Cuticura Remedies. "I sent for a box of Cuticura Ointment. Upon the first application I was greatly surprised at the results, for I got great ease from it. I immediately sent for a set of the Cuticura Remedies and followed the treatment carefully. In three weeks, after using two sets of Cuticura, I was perfectly cured. I have used Cuticura Soap ever since, especially for shaving, and as long as I am able to buy it I intend to use no other. My wonderful cure by Cuticura was such a blessing that I shall be glad to have you publish my simple testimonial so as to bring the Cuticura Remedies to the notice of other skin sufferers. Wm. V. Baker, 23, North Bridge St., Monkwearmouth, Sunderland, Eng., Dec. 24, '09."

For preserving, purifying and beautifying the skin, scalp, hair and hands, for clearing the complexion, for itching, scaly scalps with dry, thin and falling hair, for torturing, disfiguring eczemas, rashes, itchings and irritations and for sanative, antiseptic cleansing, Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment are unrivaled in purity, efficacy and economy.

A single tablet of Cuticura Soap and box of Cuticura Ointment are often sufficient to cure. Depots: London, 27, Charterhouse Sq.; Paris, 10, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin; Australia, R. Consumption Can be Cured

AT LAST A REMEDY HAS BEEN FOUND THAT CURES CONSUMPTION

Derk P. Yonkerman, Discoverer of The New Cure for Consumption.

Marvellous as it may seem after centuries of failure, a remedy has been discovered that has cured the Deadly Consumption even in the advanced stages of the disease. No one will longer doubt that Consumption can be cured after reading the proof of hundreds of cases cured by this wonderful discovery—some after change of climate and all other remedies tried had failed, and the cases had been pronounced hopeless of cure. This new remedy has also proved itself effective and speedy in curing Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, and many serious throat and lung troubles. In order that all in need of this wonderful product of Science may know of its efficacy for themselves, a Company has been formed to give this knowledge to the world, and a book on the treatment can be obtained by writing to the Derk P. Yonkerman, Co., Ltd. (Dept., 237), 6, Bouverie Street, London, E.C. Send no money. Simply mention this paper and ask for the free book. It will be sent to you by return of post, carriage paid,

ABSOLUTELY FREE.

Don't wait if you have any of the symptoms of Consumption, if you have Chronic Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, pains in your chest, a cold on your lungs, or any throat or lung trouble. Write to-day for the free book of instructions, and cure yourself before it is too late.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, SEPT. 10TH, 1910.

DEATHS.

GILLON.—On September 2nd, at Frankfort-on-Main. JOHN EDMUND GILLON, aged 60 years. (By cable.)

WALTER.—On 2nd of Sept., of Meningitis MAURICE WINN, eldest and beloved son of the late JAMES WALTER and Mrs. WALTER, aged 22.

BAGGE.—On the 5th inst., at the General Hospital, Yokohama, RICHARD BAGGE, Swedish Consul-General at Shanghai, aged 50 years.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

MR. LIUNG TUNG YEN, ex-Minister of the Wai-wu-pu, will start for Europe via the Siberia railway, on the 5th inst.

THIRTY Korean students were arrested on the discovery of their having circulated a manifesto opposing the annexation.

KING ALFONSO and the Queen of Spain witnessed the launch by Lady Winchester at Portsmouth of the new Dreadnought battleship Orion.

It is reported from Dairen that over 80 mounted bandits who attacked Newchang on the 28th ult., fled to Senzan, but being reinforced by 100 fellow-bandits, have fortified themselves up in the mountains at Seiwunkwan. Seven hundred Chinese troops have laid siege to the place.

A SHANGHAI telegram to the Fiji says that a certain German bank is rumoured to have received from the Peking Government an order for four gun-boats.

It was published on Wednesday's Official Gazette that Shin Wiju has been made an open port while Masampo will be closed on and after the 1st of January next.

AS THE result of the by-election of a member of the House of Representatives for Osaka, Mr. Hino Kuniaki of the Nationalists has been elected, obtaining a total 6,477 votes which exceeded that of the next candidate by 1,864.

THE Imperial Messenger Viscount Inaba who arrived at Seoul on the 31st ult., repaired to the Shotoku Palace the next morning and delivered an Imperial Rescript installing the formerly Emperor of Korea as Prince Yi.

A PEKING telegram says that the U.S. Minister there reminded the Wai-wu-pu on the 1st inst. of the recurrence of an anti-American boycott movement in South China and urged that an order to the local authorities be issued to suppress it.

A PEKING despatch says that Prince Tsai Taku and Mr. Seng Hsuan-Huai have resolved to carry out the reform of the coinage system in accordance with the silver standard. Mr. Sheng proposes that the gold standard be adopted after two years.

ON Monday afternoon fire broke out in the compound of the Seiso Electric Company at Juhan, Chiba prefecture. Owing to the strong wind prevailing, over 100 houses were destroyed, including the Sogo Shrine and several public buildings.

A SEOUL telegram states that the Russian authorities have detected Korean hot heads at Vladivostok in the act of purchasing some 500 military rifles. These Koreans were all arrested, the said firearms being seized and destroyed. Their premises are surrounded by a battalion of Russian troops.

THE International Parliamentary Congress, which was opened on the 28th ult. in London, held a session for five days and closed on Friday. More than twenty Powers were represented in the Congress. The neutrality sea-route and other important questions were submitted for discussion. It is the first time that Japanese representatives have attended this conference.

THE regulations of the Imperial Donation Bonds for the people of Chosen were published in Monday's Official Gazette. According to the regulations, the bonds which are to be five per cent. public bonds, shall be left unredeemed for five years and be redeemed within fifty years thenceforward. Any registration concerning negotiation and mortgaging of the bonds cannot be made without approval of the Governor-general of Chosen.

As a result of the annexation of Korea, the patent office in the Residency-General being abolished all patents in Korea are to be registered in the Japanese Patent Bureau. But applications require much examination as to the status in Korea, hence it may become necessary for some years to maintain an agent of the Bureau in Korea. Before the annexation, the number of patents registered in Korea were about 500, that of trade marks about 1,000, while no figures are given as to the number of utility models registered. These numbers will probably increase when the Koreans come to understand the value of patent rights, trade marks, etc. There are several patent lawyers in Korea at present.

THE newly issued five-yen note was put in circulation on the 2nd inst. The note is of the same size as the one-yen note and on the right side of the face half-length portrait of Fujiwara Michizane is shown and on the left a picture of Daikoku (the god of wealth) can be seen by holding the note to the light.

A STATEMENT has been published in the Official Gazette to the effect that with reference to tenders and contracts, the government officials concerned may impose securities, if necessary, on tenders or contracts, even in case of non-existence of any fixed relations. These securities may be tendered either in cash or in negotiable bonds approved by the Minister of State concerned. In the event of a successful bidder not entering into a contract, the security shall be confiscated.

It is interesting to note to what an extent the shores of the ocean are still unknown. As many as 368 rocks and shoals dangerous to navigation were discovered in 1908 charting of seas and coasts of the globe, as reported by the hydrographer of the British Admiralty. Of these 10 were made known by vessels striking on them, 29 were found by British surveying ships, and 280 were reported by Colonial and Foreign Governments. Previously reported dangers were investigated, and 26 were dropped from the charts.

THE draft for the extension of Nagoya Harbour being made out a few days ago, an extraordinary prefectural assembly will be convened in the middle of this month to discuss the matter. According to the plans, the present harbour which can admit only ships not exceeding 2,500 tons, will be widened and deepened so as to enable ships of 5,000 tons to enter and leave without any hindrance. The cost is estimated at 3,143,100 yen, which will be raised by a prefectural public loan, to be redeemed in fifteen years.

THE Island of Saghalien, or Karafuto as it is now called by the Japanese, is described by Mr. Hiraoka, Chief of the Karafuto administration, as covering a total of 8,800 sq. miles of which about one-half is forest. It has been discovered that turpentine oil can be produced in considerable quantities in these forests. Machinery has been ordered from Germany and is now due to arrive at any time. At the present time the industry is only started but produces about 300,000 yen worth of turpentine yearly. It is estimated to be capable of an intense development, promising eventually perhaps 50 times the present output.

HERR DERNBURG, German ex-Minister for Colonies, was presented to His Majesty the Emperor on Tuesday morning through Count Montgelas, German Charge d'Affaires in Tokyo. Afterwards the ex-Minister was entertained at luncheon in the Homei Hall, when T.H. Princes Kanin and Higashi-Fushimi, Marquis Tokudaiji, the Grand Chamberlain, Marquis Katsura, the Premier, Count Komura, Minister for Foreign Affairs and a few other dignitaries were present. Herr Dernburg was decorated the same day with the Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun through the Foreign Office. His Excellency will leave Tokyo on the 10th instant.

KOREA.

Friday, September 2.

There are at present 42 Koreans receiving instruction at the Preparatory School of the Military Academy. These men came to Tokyo and Seoul last year. They had been specially selected, and they travelled under the guidance of Captain Ogura, the object being to educate them for commissions in the Korean army. The expenses of their education were defrayed out of the budget of the War Office in Seoul. But that War Office has now disappeared, and a question arises as to the provenance of funds to carry on these cadets' education. It has been decided, we read in Tokyo newspapers, that the onus of finding the money shall be transferred to the War Office in Tokyo. This may perhaps be regarded as one of the many minor problems which would not have arisen had Japan's purpose of annexing Korea been definitely formed at an earlier period.

We yesterday published an item of news from a comparatively remote part of Korea to the effect that the people in that district were vying with each other to dock their top knots. It now appears that this fashion has extended to the capital. The barbers are said to be very busy, and what seems particularly strange is that men who had hitherto been leaders of conservatism and conspicuously anti-Japanese are taking the lead in adopting the new coiffure. It is not altogether difficult to appreciate this mood. As a rule human beings do not care to carry their heart upon their sleeve. Men might be willing enough to revolt against a new order of things, and yet might be correspondingly unwilling to proclaim their revolt by a particular kind of head gear.

The people of Fusan are said to be congratulating themselves on the announcement that Masampho is to be closed to trade from next year. The idea is that the ancient settlement will derive corresponding advantage from the closure of the new port. As to the inhabitants of the latter, they are said to be divided in opinion, some thinking that Masampho will be more prosperous as a great naval station than it could ever hope to be as a commercial settlement. With regard to the just announced sale of landed property at Masampho, it will of course be understood that the sites offered are intended merely to fix the locality of the town which will necessarily grow up as a part of the naval station.

Saturday, September 3.

There are at present only three charity hospitals in Chosen, namely one in Seoul, and one each in Hamheung and Chongfu. Moreover, these hospitals are still poorly equipped. It is stated that one of the first acts of the Governor-General will be to increase the number of such hospitals so that each province shall have one, and, further, to greatly improve their equipment.

Another thoughtful act said to be contemplated by the Governor-General of Chosen is to make the Emperor's birthday (31st of November) the occasion for presenting gifts to children who have distinguished themselves by filial piety; to wives remarkable for conjugal fidelity; to widows and orphans in reduced circumstances, and to men and women over the age of 70. Another project may be mentioned in this context, namely, that road-building is to be undertaken from next year on an extensive scale, with the object not only of providing means of communication, but also of supplying employment for poor people.

It appears after all that the all-powerful factor, money, will not be without its influence in Korean affairs. Talk now begins to be heard that the mood of the people depends largely upon the nature of the list to be published presently with regard to pensions and rewards. The Pyongyang inhabitants are said to be incensed at the idea that any special provision should be made for the Yangpan, whereas among the Yangpan themselves there are evidences that any whose names are omitted from the list will be found fomenting commotion. The publication of the list is therefore regarded with anxiety, and we shall not be surprised to find that the measure is deferred so as to enable a distinction to be drawn between men who for patriotic reasons oppose annexation and men who oppose from mercenary motives only; at any rate, it is a reasonable supposition that a considerable time will be needed to determine the strictly just distribution of the 30 million yen allotted for this purpose.

The Korean residents of San Francisco continue their vehement agitation against annexation. They call themselves the representatives of the Korean nation, and they declare that they will never consent to the loss of their country's independence. The trouble with these men is that they have imbibed too copious draughts of the American air of freedom. We say too copious because, after all, there must be some proportion preserved between every human being's aims and his capacities. The San Francisco agitators might as well try to check the procession of the equinoxes as to preserve their country's independence. While therefore we honour their motives and sympathise with them, we apprehend that in the end their impotence will drive them to the most vulgar of all devices, assassination. Meanwhile if they continue their present public commotion, it will become a question for the San Francisco police whether the cause of law and order is not endangered.

It appears that the precise manner of disposing of the 30 million yen worth of State Bonds which are to be issued in connexion with the annexation of Korea will be published on the 5th inst. Meanwhile the Kokumin Shimbun gives a rough statement which, if correct, conveys all the information required. Our contemporary says that out of the 30 millions, 13 will form a capital fund for the payment of yearly allowances to those entitled to such consideration; and 17 millions will be devoted to purposes of education and production. These 17 millions will be divided into 1 million for Seoul, and the remaining 16 millions for all the provincial districts. This will mean a capital sum of 50,000 yen for each district. It will be optional with the people of the district either to apply the interest alone of this sum, namely, 2,500 yen, to annual purposes of education and production; or to raise a loan, using the 2,500 yen as interest and sinking fund.

With regard to the expulsion from Manchuria of Koreans engaged in agricultural industry outside treaty limits, it is stated that the Japanese Consul-General at Mukden has demanded compensation to the extent of 16,800 yen, together with 3,200 yen on account of this year's crops. The Chinese Authorities, however, have refused to recognize any Korean rights in the matter, but have intimated their willingness to grant a solatium of 5,000 yen. The Consul-General, however, has declined their method of settlement and is awaiting the return of the Viceroy from Peking.

Baron Hirata, Minister of State for Home Affairs, has addressed to all the local authorities for circulation among the people an Instruction which ought to produce a useful effect. It refers to the coalition now effected between the two nations, Japanese and Korean. The people are reminded that during the past 2,000 years there has been neighbourly intercourse between Japan and Korea. Interruptions of friendship have necessarily taken place during that long interval, but the fact of general friendship and kindly intercourse cannot be obliterated. Now finally the two nations have become one. It behooves the Japanese people to offer the hand of sincere amity to their new fellow-countrymen; to avoid everything savouring of masterfulness or superiority; to show no sign of contempt for Korean conservatism or of pride in Japanese liberalism, but to be guided solely by the principles of true friendship and sincere equality. This should be the policy not of public bodies alone, but also of every individual of the Japanese Empire.

We read in Japanese papers that the process of leasing land for building purposes on the coast of Chinghai Bay is proceeding rapidly. A few days ago the Asahi Shimbun stated that an area of 5,000 tsubo of land was to be let at Masampho in lots of 50 tsubo each for a similar purpose. But the project at Chinghai is much more extensive. The area involved is 210,000 tsubo, and the price charged is from 2½ to 1½ sen per tsubo annually. These cheap terms are proving very attractive. There are said to be as many as 50 applicants daily.

Japanese papers agree that it is intended to reduce the staff of the Central Government in Chosen by about 60 per cent., but this does not mean a corresponding diminution of the net number of officials, inasmuch as the intention is to largely increase the provincial staffs.

Sunday, September 4.

In the columns of the Yorozu Choho we find an interesting article setting forth alleged details of the financial position in Korea in the sequel of annexation. The following table is given, showing the sums for which the Japanese Treasury will become liable:—

	Yen.
5-per-cent. Pension Bonds	30,000,000
7-per-cent. Loan already issued	1,000,000
6-per-cent. " "	3,000,000
Loan not carrying interest	1,800,000
Circulation Bonds, 6½-per-cent.	17,960,000
6-per-cent. Industrial Bonds	1,000,000
Money lent by Japan without interest ...	11,680,000
6-per-cent. Loans to Banks	8,500,000
5-per-cent. Loans for Road making	120,000

If all these be added, and if other small items be included, a total of some 90 millions is obtained. But evidently the Yorozu has some inclination to exaggerate the situation. For it is evident that neither the money hitherto lent by the Japanese Treasury, without interest, nor the temporary accommodation given to Korean banks, can fairly be regarded as liabilities devolving upon the Japanese Treasury.

Monday, September 5.

It is stated that before Viscount Terauchi set out for Seoul the new administrative system in Korea had been sketched in tolerably accurate outline. But since that time certain modifications have been judged advisable, and a changed project will very shortly be submitted for the consideration of the Cabinet in Tokyo. There will be only three offices; one of finance; another of home affairs, and the third of agriculture and commerce. Of course it will be understood that these are not to be Departments of State. They will be merely Bureaux of the corresponding Departments in Tokyo. It was supposed at first that a more elaborate administrative system would be organized, but evidently the intention of the Japanese is to work on an essentially economical basis. Another measure which is predicted as pending, is the re transfer of police authority from the gendarmes to the regular constabulary. If that step be taken, it may be regarded as an indication that the Government does not apprehend serious trouble.

Tuesday, September 6.

Mr. Sung Pyong-chun, originally leader of the Il Ching-hoi, who returned to Seoul some time ago, adopted the policy of closing his doors from the time of his arrival in that city, and did not reopen them until the 3rd instant. Among his visitors on that day was a representative of the Yomiuri Shim-bun, to whom he seems to have spoken with considerable frankness. He said that although the successful conclusion of the annexation drama had been due in great part to the adroitness and ability of Viscount Terauchi, much must also be ascribed to the fact that His Excellency's vis-à-vis was was not the ex-Emperor, but the latter's son. This pithy utterance evidently connotes a somewhat disparaging view of the mental powers of the Sovereign who has just been deposed. Mr. Sung went on to say that he placed no faith in rumours about the resignation of the Premier, Yi Wan-yong. If Mr. Yi had contemplated resignation, he would have laid down his portfolio long ago. But he had remained in office for the purpose of arranging the best possible terms with reference to annexation, and he knew that nothing more was now to be achieved in that matter. As for the Il Ching hoi, their metier no longer existed, and the question was how to provide for them. He intended to devote his energies to that question, and would visit Tokyo in a few months for the purpose.

It is a well known psychological fact that suicide is infectious. We have had many examples of this in Japan, notably in the case of the Kegon waterfall, which claimed many scores of victims before the mania abated. Something of the same sort, though happily on a smaller scale, seems to be occurring in Korea. It commenced with the suicide of the local head man of Kunsan, and it went on subsequently till now the number of provincial officials who have made away with themselves totals seven. One cannot help sympathising profoundly with these men. Powerless to assert the independence of their country, they give their lives in defence of the principle. More they cannot do. It does not occur to them, in all probability, that their act may bring sorrow and suffering to their own country by evoking a spirit of discontent which, if obeyed, cannot fail to lead to disaster and is incapable of accomplishing anything practical.

Wednesday, September 6.

At an extraordinary meeting of the councillors of the Residency General held in Seoul on the 5th inst. it was decided that the office of the Governor-General should be constituted as follows:—

1. The Governor-General.
- 2.—The Civil Governor (Gyōsei Chōkan), an official of shin-mun rank. (We presume that this office corresponds to that of Minsei Chōkan in Formosa).
- 3.—Six Bureaux, namely, that of Justice; that of Law; that of Foreign Affairs; that of Agriculture; that of Finance; and that of Home Affairs.

General Viscount Terauchi is to hold the office of Governor-General in conjunction with the portfolio of War in Tokyo. Mr. Yamagata, Vice-Resident General, is to be the Civil Governor, Mr. Ariyashi becomes Chief of the Secretariat (Kambōchō), and the six Japanese who have hitherto been serving as Vice-Ministers of State are to become Chiefs of the above six Bureaux.

THE STATE OF PUBLIC FEELING IN KOREA.

Saturday, September 3.

From all districts in Korea with the exception of Pyongyang news comes that the people are taking things quite calmly. They are going about their usual business just as though nothing unwonted had occurred. Two more attempted suicides are, however, reported. One took place at Andong in Seoul. A man called Yi, who had spent some years in Japan and had graduated at the Meiji College in Tokyo, essayed to kill himself with a sword in order to express his grief for the fate which had overtaken his country. He wounded himself severely, but not fatally. The other case is that of a man of 50 years of age called Sung, a native of Chung Chyong-do. He killed himself with a sword on the 1st instant, as soon as he was assured of the fact of annexation. He is described as having been an ardent Confucianist, and thus we have two men with entirely different outlooks upon life killing themselves rather than survive what they considered their country's disgrace. It is inexpressibly pitiful that such men should be betrayed into such a course, but we cannot for a moment deny to them the crown of patriotism.

Sunday, September 4.

Things continue to be remarkably quiet in Korea. The amnesty and the remission of taxes are said to have produced an excellent effect. There are, however, some slight symptoms of unrest in the south of the Peninsula, where the Yangpan exist in exceptionally large numbers, and where it had been supposed that amalgamation, not annexation, would take place, in other words, that Korea's Sovereignty would have been preserved in part, at any rate.

Nevertheless there have been some more suicides. The district headman at Shong-chhon, Mr. Sun, has made away with himself, and rumour has it that three of the students in the Chong-jun School have done the same.

Monday, September 5.

It is always difficult to arrive at anything like a clear analysis of the feelings of a community, much more so those of a nation. One trouble is that the men who undertake the analysis are generally prone to jump to conclusions founded on small bases. Evidently the difficulty has not yet been overcome in the case of Korea. During the first few days after annexation the accounts all conspired to create an impression that resignation and calm reigned among the people, but it is now becoming apparent that this impression was derived largely from the conjectures of observers. Gradually; as more detailed news comes in, it begins to be perceived that the patriots of Chosen are more numerous than was at first supposed, and that there is much sorrow and much indignation. In part, the latter sentiment seems to be directed against the Sovereign and his Ministers, who surrendered the independence of their country so lightly. All the tact that the Japanese possess will be needed to reconcile the Koreans to the fate which has overtaken their fatherland. On the other hand, every day that passes without an actual tumult is so much gained. Speaking broadly, the country seems to be divided into two camps. The south, which is historically disposed to acts of violence, is showing a truculent spirit, whereas in the north the general feeling appears to be contented and quiet. It is perhaps fortunate that Korea possesses no conspicuous popular leader at this juncture. A great personality might easily find numerous followers and might create an exceedingly difficult situation. For our own part we have great confidence in Japanese adroitness, and we are disposed to think that the crisis will be tided over without catastrophe. Of course when we say without catastrophe, we refer to an event on a large scale. It is already catastrophic that six men should have committed suicide to accompany their country's independence to the grave.

Tuesday, September 6.

If, on the one hand, men are committing suicide in Korea rather than survive the loss of their country's independence, on the other, news comes that an excellent effect has been produced by the remission of unpaid taxes and the reduction of those to be presently collected. The people found themselves unexpectedly richer than they thought, and an impulse has been given to commerce.

In South Chholla do, which has hitherto been the principal seat of insurrection, there was naturally much uneasiness as to the probable results of annexation. But these anticipations have not been realized. On the contrary, everything has been remarkably quiet, and the local officials, who looked for the loss of their appointments, are said to be full of gratitude and content since they find themselves undisturbed.

We must confess that these reports seem to have absorbed much colour from the medium of their transmission. It is natural that Japanese newspaper reporters should be optimistic with regard to an event which adds so greatly to the territory and population of their country. But the other side of the account has yet to be scrutinized, and it may well be that a less agreeable record will result. At all events it is reassuring to know that Japanese high officials are not indulging in any illusions, and will leave nothing undone that can contribute to the moral peace of the Korean nation.

It is officially stated that there are in Korea at the present time 104,000 acres of land prepared for the production of Cotton. A peculiar feature of the industry however, is the fact that seeds deteriorate and a fair quality of cotton can only be produced by importing seed from America every fourth year.

THE VLADIVOSTOK KOREANS.

Friday, September 2.

It would seem that the Koreans at Vladivostok and Harbin are acting in collusion. There have been goings and comings between the two places, and finally, on the 1st inst.—or on the preceding day—a deputation waited on the Japanese Consul-General and asked him to forward to Marquis Katsura a memorial protesting against annexation. The document carried 200 signatures. It was explained by the Consul-General that as annexation was an accomplished fact, the forwarding of such a memorial would be quite superfluous. The deputation accepted this response with very bad grace and carried away the document, evidently determined to find some other channel of communication.

Saturday, September 3

Owing to the strict measures adopted by the Russian Authorities in Vladivostok and Harbin, the discontented Koreans in those two towns are now said to be assembling in Chengtao. They are accompanied by the bandit-leader Yi Pong-yung; and the latter's brother, Yi Pong-chin, is said to be engaged in compiling inflammatory circulars for distribution throughout the Peninsula. The telegram adds that these agitators have recognized their inability to wield any weapon except the pistol or the bomb, and are taking their measures accordingly.

We do not know whether our readers have taken notice of a somewhat curious fact, namely, that nothing whatever is now heard about the insurgents in Korea. It would almost seem as though they had ceased from troubling. There is just a possibility that intelligence of their doings is ignored in consideration of the larger issues now at stake. But that theory is scarcely tenable. We are unable to account for the apparent quiet which has descended upon this part of the stage.

Sunday, September 4.

The police in Seoul have put their hands upon one of the circulars sent out by the Korean agitators at Vladivostok who are now gravitating to Chengtao. It is said to be a very violently worded document, calling upon all who claim Korean lineage to stand up and fight to the death for the independence of their country.

Two or three days ago it was announced that three would-be assassins had left Vladivostok for Chosen. It is now stated that these men have been traced through a part of their journey. They made their way to the coast of Yamaguchi and there took ship, presumably for Fusan.

Wednesday, September 7.

It seems that the anti-Japanese Koreans in Vladivostok have not confined themselves to issuing inflammatory circulars and to holding denunciatory meetings. They have actually put their fortunes to the test by purchasing 500 stand of rifles and proceeding up the Tumen river, with the idea of invading Seoul from some convenient point along that stream. They are said to have got as far as a place called Kaini, which we do not find in any published map. There, however, they were so beset by Russian troops that they were compelled to burn their rifles and to abandon all idea of pushing the campaign. They are said to be now unable to move in any direction, and to be spending their time drinking saké and looking for something to turn up. The story is vague, but we give it as telegraphed. Meanwhile it would seem that at Petao and Musan a considerable number of Korean malcontents are gradually assembling. They are said to consist, for the most part, of needy adventurers, and as the district is not efficiently policed from either the Chinese or the Korean side, these agitators are not interrupted. Altogether it is apparent that the annexation will not pass off as quietly as was at first rumoured.

In Seoul itself, on the evening of the 4th inst., 30 students of the Normal School were arrested, and search is being made for others. It is charged against these students that they have struck from work at school, and that they have been attempting to form an association pledged to fight to the death for their country's independence. They are said to be acting in collusion with members of the Young Men's Christian Association and of the Confucian Society. It is not pretended that either Christianity or Confucianism is responsible. The simple explanation is that an organized society, whatever be its original object, furnishes mechanism for consultation and co-operation.

Not all the Korean students by any means are in the camp of discontent. Many of them have frankly bowed to the need of the time, and are determined to lend their aid for the development of their country under Japanese auspices. It is said that several students hitherto pursuing their scholastic courses in Seoul have come to the conclusion that that city, being no longer the metropolis of Korea, offers no special facilities for educational purposes, and they have consequently returned to the provinces. We do not profess to understand the logic of this course. The natural interpretation of such a movement would seem to be different from that assigned to it here.

Another exceedingly vague and perplexing rumour is that a number of Korean merchants, foreseeing the impossibility of competing with the Japanese now that annexation has taken place, are approaching the Residency-General with petitions for protection; and, failing success in that matter, they have determined to leave their country. That is certainly a sufficiently inexplicable tale, unless we are to credit the Koreans with an extraordinary degree of silliness.

THE NEW PENSION BONDS.

There is nothing specially notable about the conditions under which the new Korean Pension Bonds are to be issued. They will carry 5-per-cent interest, payable in arrears twice annually, namely in March and in September; they will lie unredeemed for 5 years, to be redeemed thereafter in 50 years, and they will be registered bonds which may not be hypothecated. As to the important question how many new peers are to be created, and in what proportions the money will be divided among them, nothing definite is yet announced. The interest will be payable at the Bank of Japan and its branches, or at post offices indicated by the Governor-General. It may be added that although, as a general rule, hypothecation is forbidden, exceptions may be made in the case of bonds specially sanctioned by the Governor-General.

There are some signs that, by a section of Japanese financiers, the issue of these 5 per-cent bonds is condemned as betraying a want of uniformity in the Government programme. The Hochi Shimbun heads this school of critics. It is contended that all the cleverly manipulated operations of the current year for the purpose of placing public securities on a 4-per-cent. basis had for their principal object to divert capital from this kind of investment into the channels of industrial enterprise. But now, by the sudden issue of 30 million yen of 5-per-cents, the Government undoes with its left hand what it has hitherto been seeking to contrive with its right.

We must confess that for our own part we find this criticism somewhat superficial. The new bonds belong to a special category. They are pension bonds, such as were allotted to the Japanese Kazoku at the time of the Restoration, and they do not belong to the ordinary category of treasury stocks. But the main point is, that the market will absorb them at a price adapted to the basis actually existing. If the country has really reached the 4-per-cent. basis, these 5-per-cent. securities will command a corresponding price in the market. If that basis has not been reached, then the rate of interest carried by this small block of bonds is scarcely worth considering.

We may mention in this connection that, according to the Asahi Shimbun, the coins, copper and silver, circulating in Korea amount to about 20 million yen, or two yen per head of the population, approximately.

AN UNSETTLED POINT.

It will have been observed that in the various documents officially promulgated with regard to annexation, there is nothing which bears upon the question of the liability of the Koreans to conscription or their eligibility for the franchise. An idea seems to prevail that things will remain in status quo for the next ten years, or at all events for a considerable period, in the matter of these two points. But in the case of Koreans residing in foreign countries, the Japanese Government will insist that they should be treated in every respect as Japanese subjects. Certainly the problems of the franchise and of conscription present some difficulties. Nobody who has watched the results of conscription can deny, we think, that a better method could scarcely be devised for setting a nation up physically and morally. It is a hard school, however, and to enter its portals as a matter of compulsion would impart a very disagreeable character to the results of annexation. As for the franchise, Japan will soon have to consider seriously whether she will exclude her newly acquired 10 or 12 million subjects from the privilege of representation in the Diet. One can scarcely accustom oneself to the idea of Koreans occupying seats in the Japanese Diet and delivering speeches there. Yet there is nothing at all incongruous in such a proceeding when seriously considered. The Koreans are not inferior to the men of any other nationality in intelligence, and so far as education goes many of their number are at least as competent to discharge legislative duties as were some of the original members of the Japanese Diet. At all events the Koreans will soon become discontented if they are denied this important privilege.

MISSIONARIES IN KOREA.

We have long observed that the Seoul correspondent of the Mainichi Dempo is inclined to take a harsh view of the action of the Christian missionaries in Korea. From time to time he has addressed to the journal he represents reports which represent missionaries as more or less inclined to foment anti-Japanese agitation and to attract converts under the pretence that special exemption from legal penalties attach to all adherents of Christianity. This same correspondent now forwards to our Tokyo contemporary an item of news which, if it means anything at all, indicates that the removal of consular jurisdiction has produced among the missionaries a wholesome spirit of circumspection and restraint. The correspondent does not actually say in so many words that the missionaries have hitherto taken consular jurisdiction as an aegis for covering anti-Japanese agitation. But he plainly implies that such has been the case, and we cannot too strongly protest against all insinuations of the kind. There may have been one or two missionaries in Korea who deemed it their duty to season the doctrines they preached with political aspirations and to sweeten them with promises of special foreign protection. But these men have been wholly exceptional. There are over 300 Christian missionaries in Korea, and it is doubtful whether charges of this nature can truthfully be laid at the doors of more than two or three out of the whole number. The rest have been genuine friends of moral and religious progress and faithful disciples of the command "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and to God the things that are God's."

Our readers will remember that a telegram received a few days ago in Tokyo spoke of a general meeting of missionaries to be organized in Korea on the 7th inst. for the purpose of adopting a new attitude in view of the abolition of consular jurisdiction. Even supposing this telegram to be accurately worded, which we question, it lends itself to the obvious interpretation that the missionaries have deemed it wise to seize this opportunity of removing any false impressions under which some of their converts may still be labouring, and of exhorting them to accept the situation as inevitable. The Hochi Shimbun, however does not read the telegram in that sense. It alleges, on the contrary, that by organizing this meeting the missionaries have virtually confessed their guilt of the offence frequently laid to their charge, namely, that they have used the simulated protection of consular jurisdiction as an ægis for propagandism. Now that extraterritoriality has come to an end, they have to find some substitute, and it is with that object that they are now operating. Such is the Hochi Shimbun's view. It cannot be said to be uncharacteristic.

GENERAL TERAUCHI.

It has certainly fallen to General Terauchi's lot to pass suddenly from a position of comparative obscurity to one which may be described as the cynosure of the world's attention. We say "comparative obscurity" because, although General Viscount Terauchi has long been recognized as one of the most prominent statesmen in modern Japan, he has not hitherto had any opportunity either to hold high command in war or to conduct any signal international negotiation. But now all the world is looking at him. He has certainly justified the highest expectations that were entertained as to his prudence, tact and firmness. Already there are signs that his Sovereign intends to fully recognize his services. The Imperial Envoy, Viscount Inaba, on reaching Seoul during the evening of the 31st ult. at once proceeded to the Residency-General and handed to Viscount Terauchi an autograph letter from the Emperor expressing a high opinion of his services and bidding him to be careful of his health. The Viscount asked to have a telegraphic reply sent to His Majesty, acknowledging with due reverence the gracious language of the despatch. Doubtless the bestowal of rewards in connection with this important event will not be long delayed. Already there is talk of Marquis Katsura becoming a Prince and General Terauchi a Count if not a Marquis. Certainly Marquis Katsura's career has been well nigh meteoric. Only a little over 8 years have elapsed since he accepted the portfolio of Minister President for the first time in a Cabinet which was not expected to live more than a few months. Ever since that time, with one short interval, he has directed his country's affairs, and his name has been intimately associated with several of the most important events of the Meiji Era—the conclusion of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance; the war with Russia; the international arrangements subsequent to the war; the restoration of the Empire's finance to a sound condition; the negotiation of ententes with Russia, France and America; and now the annexation of Korea. He will deservedly go down to posterity as of the Goketsu of the Meiji era.

AN APPRECIATION.

Mr. Otsu Jun-ichiro has just returned from Korea and has been interviewed at Moji by a representative of the Mainichi Dempo. He seems to regard things as comfortably settled in the Peninsula, but he describes the Governor-General as overwhelmed with work, and he quotes Count Kodama as saying that Viscount Terauchi's return will not be possible before the end of October. Concerning the future policy to be pursued in Korea, Mr. Otsu relates that there was some hesitation at first as to whether a rapid or a leisurely programme should be adopted. Finally a decision in latter sense was arrived at. But we confess that the description given by Mr. Otsu of the contemplated programme does not savour very much of deliberation. He mentions a sum of 120 million yen as being needed for completing the machinery of communications, but he sets that aside as being too radical, though what he considers reasonable is not stated. He speaks, however, of despatching a million of people from Japan to colonize the waste lands of Korea during the next ten years. That he describes as a moderate rate of progress, his conception of rapidity being indicated by 5 times the number. To most people it will appear, however, that a million colonists in 10 years, that is to say 100,000 per annum, constitutes anything but a leisurely rate of procedure. What temptations can be offered to the Japanese people to induce them to leave their own country at the rate of 100,000 annually for the next 10 years? If large and costly facilities were afforded by the Government the case might be different, but Japan has to cut her coat according to her cloth.

THE METHOD OF ANNEXATION.

The Seoul Press, being very close to the event which it describes, may be taken as speaking correctly when it contributes the following item to our knowledge of the manner in which annexation was carried out:—

Since the arrival of Viscount Terauchi in town, His Excellency abstained himself from making any attempt at inducing the Korean statesmen in power to open negotiations with him concerning the future of the country. It is not to be doubted that he had some plan of his own, but he never divulged it even to those closest to him. The Korean Cabinet was expectant for many days of overtures to be made from the Resident-General but it waited in vain. His Excellency continued to maintain his quiet and dignified attitude. This, coupled with his great prestige, seems to have inspired something akin to awe in the minds of the Korean statesmen. At all events, the first overture was made to him on August 16 by Premier Yi Wanyong, when he offered the unconditional cession of the sovereign power of Korea. Premier Yi wisely placed full confidence in the magnanimity of the Emperor of Japan and the good faith of His Majesty's Government and proposed to accept whatever terms Viscount Terauchi thought fit to suggest. The latter accepted the offer and drew up the terms, which have since become the basis of the Treaty of Annexation. Subsequently these terms were discussed in a State Council in the presence of the Emperor of Korea, at which besides the Cabinet Ministers, Princes of the Blood and the elder statesmen were present. The Council unanimously decided to accept the terms and the Emperor approved the decision arrived at, the same being done later by the Retired Emperor. In consequence the Treaty of Annexation was signed on August 22. In this way everything went on and was settled without the slightest hitch.

From the above it appears that Viscount Terauchi is a master of the art of silence. But we are inclined to think that indirect methods must have been employed to convince the Koreans that overtures would come from their side with the pleasantest results.

"SAKU-HO-SHIKI."

This old Chinese term, signifying the ceremony of investiture, is applied to the procedure which took place at the Shōtoku Palace in Seoul on the 1st inst. Viscount Inaba, Special Envoy of the Emperor of Japan, proceeded to the Palace in the forenoon, and with due solemnity handed to the deposed Sovereign his patent of nobility as an "Imperial Prince" together with the presents sent from Tokyo to mark the occasion. It is not recorded that the retiring Sovereign made anything like a speech, and the Envoy also seems to have performed his mission with a minimum of talk. The deposed Emperor stood facing the east, and in spite of the silence with which it was conducted, the ceremony is said to have been very impressive. Subsequently H. I. H. Prince Yi repaired to the Residency-General to offer his first greeting to the Representative of his new Sovereign. This ceremony also appears to have been of the briefest character. It will be further observed that no mention has yet been made of the ex-Emperor of Korea, who now becomes Yi Tai-O. The Imperial Envoy of Japan did not proceed to the Tokuju Palace, but the Resident-General went thither after these ceremonies were concluded and paid his respects duly.

CHINA.

Friday, September 2.

It will not perhaps be inaccurate to say that the opinion generally created among the Chinese by the annexation of Korea is that it behoves China to take warning by the fate of her eastern neighbour. Annexation qua annexation does not provoke much comment. Such an event is historically too familiar to elicit great surprise. But the lesson that it teaches as to Japan's expansive potentialities is not lost upon the Chinese. They have now acquired for their direct neighbour a Power which represents the pioneer of progress in the East, and there is nothing in the history of the world to suggest that a State like Japan is destined to be debarred from further extension.

The Viceroy of Mukden, who is now in Peking, appears to be pleading very hard for relief from his onerous duties in Manchuria. He is reported as having declared that both the foreign relations and the financial affairs of the Three Eastern Provinces are too much for him.

According to a doubly leaded paragraph in the Hochi Shimbun, the Japanese Consul-General at Mukden has intimated to the Viceroy that if the Chinese persist in expelling the Japanese agriculturists from rural districts in Manchuria, Japan will be obliged to retaliate by expelling from Korea many thousands of the Chinese subjects who are similarly engaged there. We give this for what may be worth.

Saturday, September 3.

The Hochi Shimbun has a special telegram to the effect that another great conflagration has taken place at Hankow, more than 1,000 houses and a vast quantity of property having been destroyed.

There is a rumour that Yuan Shih-kai has already entered Peking, and that his appointment to high office will follow very speedily.

Sunday, September 4.

Chinese newspapers in Mukden have begun to discuss the annexation. The telegraph says that they take their tone largely from Shanghai journals. They say that where the locomotive leads the carriages must follow; that Korea's fate was sealed when she became a protectorate, and that the situation has become more dangerous than ever for Manchuria. The semi-official organ of the city observes, with fine sarcasm, that to secure peace by swallowing up countries is a new scheme of international morality.

On the whole, it would seem that the Chinese press has been moderate up to the present. Japan's development during the past fifteen years is very suggestive and must be correspondingly disquieting to her weak neighbours. The question is, do the Chinese include themselves in the latter category? Is it really the case that they have been living all these years in placid reliance on the world's forbearance—a quality which is not to be found operative anywhere in the long history of nations?

Chinese students educated in Japan achieved a very signal success at the recent examinations in Peking. There were 561 graduates, and their places of education had been as follow:—

England and America.....	34
France	7
Germany	3
Russia	1
Japan	516

This is certainly a remarkable record, and it will probably have the effect of attracting many students to Japan.

Monday, September 5.

It is stated that the Chamber of Commerce at Antung has adopted what must be considered a very extraordinary course, by deciding to boycott Japanese goods in consequence of the annexation of Korea. This Chamber consists of Chinese members and is an essentially Chinese body. One does not perceive, therefore, the grounds on which its opposition is founded, or the pretext it can advance for assuming such an attitude.

Another step said to be contemplated by China is the expulsion of some 60,000 Korean subjects from the right bank of the upper reaches of the Yalu, where these men are engaged in forestry and agriculture. The whole of this story, whether as regards the boycott or the expulsion, sounds very apocryphal, and we therefore refrain from commenting on it.

China's reason for refusing to grant any compensation to the Korean agriculturists whom she is expelling from Hsinmintun and Tamintun, is that these immigrants have hitherto enjoyed every year the benefit of the crops grown by them. In other words, the Chinese Authorities hold that reminiscence is sufficient compensation, and that the future need not be an object of concern.

The Chinese local authorities at Hsinmintun having shown no sign of repairing the embankment of the Liao river, whose rupture caused so much disaster recently, the Japanese Consul-General at Mukden is said to be urging that funds should be provided for the purpose either by the Treasury in Peking or by the local authorities. We presume that the interest taken by Japan in this affair is attributable to her solicitude on account of her railway.

Tuesday, September 6.

The telegraph says that 19 Chinese journalists met on the 4th inst. in the precincts of the Nanking Exhibition and formed an association under the name of the Huchin-fui, which signifies the progressive society. The avowed object of these journalists is to unite their strength for the purpose of directing public opinion into useful channels. The members of the Association come from all parts of the Empire, and among the representatives of Peking journalists we observe a member of the council for arranging the preliminaries of the national assembly. It will be interesting to observe whether this Association in China encounters at the hands of the foreign local journals the same abuse and depreciation levelled at the head of the cognate society in Japan.

Wednesday, September 7.

Telegrams from China say that the Peking Government has formulated an interesting device for overcoming the difficulties hitherto encountered in obtaining foreign capital for purposes of railway construction in the Yangtze Valley. The plan now proposed is that the Board of Finance should borrow direct from foreign countries and should subsequently lend out the money to the localities concerned. It is further proposed that as embarrassment results from having a number of foreign creditors, the best plan will be to borrow from one country solely, and the idea is that Germany should be that country, as she has the largest share at present in the development of China's material resources. Mr. Tang Shao Yi is said to have given a general assent to this proposition. But Mr. Li Cha-ku proposes that America should be substituted for Germany. It is a curious turn of events that either the United States or Germany should be preferred to England as a place for obtaining capital to invest abroad, and the reason given in Germany's case enhances the quaintness of the proposition.

The Asahi has a Peking telegram which says that the Chinchow-Aigun Railway has been again brought upon the tapis. Its projectors are alleged to have been encouraged by the Russo-Japanese Convention and by the annexation of Korea. What encouragement is found in these events it is difficult to see, unless the projectors plead that their last chance of success must now be taken. They are said to have the support of all the anti-Japanese section among foreigners. But as Japan assented from the first to the building of this Railway, it is wholly inexplicable that she should be thus perpetually dragged head and shoulders into the complication, and the idea becomes above all strange when it is put forward as a corollary to the annexation of Korea. We presume that what is meant in the latter case is to take advantage of any unpopularity that may accrue to Japan in the sequel of annexation.

It is predicted that extensive changes of personnel will take place among the Viceroys and Governors in China after the arrival in Peking of Mr. Chang, Governor of Kwangsi. But there is no prediction as to the exact nature of these changes.

THE INUNDATIONS.

Saturday, September 3.

Tokyo newspapers state that according to official reports, received by the Home Department from various localities, the following sums will be required for restoring embankments and sluices to their condition before the recent inundations:—

	Yen.
Tokyo	1,500,000
Kanagawa.....	800,000
Saitama	3,500,000
Gunma	3,000,000
Chiba	1,500,000
Ibaraki	1,200,000
Tochigi	800,000
Shizuoka	540,000
Yamanashi	2,000,000
Nagano	1,000,000
Fukushima	700,000
Miyagi	1,000,000
Iwate	230,000
	17,770,000

These figures relate only to temporary restorations and will probably be exceeded in practice.

We may mention here, that, according to Baron Goto, who has just returned from a tour of inspection, the Railway Authorities will have all their work cut out for them to complete the repair of the lines by the end of next March. The most serious piece of work is the tunnel between Hinazaka and Akaiwa, which has collapsed totally.

Sunday, September 4.

From Sendai, Morioka and Akita come reports that these places have had the great misfortune to be visited a second time by inundations. The people had barely repaired the embankments when fresh floods came and swept them away.

FORMOSA.

The keen interest excited by the records of the campaign in Formosa has been momentarily eclipsed by Korean incidents. But in the meanwhile the two columns operating in the island have been steadily approaching each other, until their vans were only 5 miles distant on the 29th ult. We read in the telegrams that on the 28th of August the Japanese occupied an elevation called Piya, and placed two field guns in position commanding the encampment of the Pusha aborigines. This was the work of the column advancing westward from Gilan. The other column, namely that advancing eastward from Shinchiku, captured the Sito mountain on the 29th ult., and opened on the aborigines in that quarter a cannonade which does not appear to have been very effective. A brief interval should now suffice for connecting the wire-entanglements of the two columns, and after that a peremptory summons to surrender will be addressed to the aborigines. The two columns are now under the command of Major-General Seki

An interesting account is furnished to the Japanese press of the recent doings in Formosa, the informant being Colonel Kaai. After describing the organization of an office whence a 5-years' campaign was to be directed against the aborigines, he says that the Gilan column captured Bonbon hill at the end of May in the current year. There, however, the Japanese troops were attacked from the rear by the Nanwo and the Keito aborigines, so that, for a time, communications were severed and a situation of much difficulty had to be dealt with. By the 21st of June, however, the Japanese had established themselves firmly in this position, after an engagement which for the first time taught the aborigines the real character of the foe with whom they had to contend. Nevertheless Bonbon-yama, though very useful for the purpose of reconnoitring, did not offer many strategical advantages. These could only be obtained by capturing Shinarek mountain, which rises to a height of 7,000 feet above the level of the sea. The Japanese at once proceeded to the enterprise, but it proved to be a task of very great difficulty owing to the steepness of the mountain and to the facilities which it offers for rolling down rocks by its defenders on the heads of its assailants. In view of these facts, it was decided to turn the flank of the mountain, and to emerge into the highlands of the district occupied by the Kurusha. This decision was come to in the early part of August after a month's effort against Shinarek. On putting the new strategy into operation, however, the occupation of another difficult mountain was found necessary, and unfortunately when this had been effected and when long-range guns had been mounted on the newly acquired heights, it proved futile to attempt any decisive movement from that direction. Another change of method was then adopted. Mr. Nakama, Inspector of Police, was sent out at the head of a party of aborigines who had capitulated, with the object of pointing out the ultimate uselessness of resistance and the advantages of immediate capitulation. The aborigines, however, proved themselves to be skilled diplomatists. They contended that the lands occupied by them had been in their possession for centuries; that they held sovereign rights, and that if negotiations were to be conducted, the contracting parties must stand on equal bases. During the course of these negotiations it transpired that the aborigines had 50 or 60 wounded men, and were short of provisions for campaigning purposes. What they aimed at was a delay of sufficient duration to enable them to cure their wounded and to reap their crop of millet. Still, matters were not much advanced by the acquisition of this knowledge. Presently, however, it was perceived that by the fall of the Gaogan Chief the aborigines had been deprived of any generally recognized leader, and thus their conferences required the presence of an inconveniently large number of representatives. Whether owing to this cause, or to overweening confidence, or to some other reason, the aborigines left their positions on Shinarik entirely unguarded and the fact having been quickly discovered by the Japanese scouts, the redoubtable mountain was occupied without loss or difficulty, on the 26th of August.

It was then found that to render the situation entirely satisfactory another operation and capture was necessary, namely, the seizure of the position occupied by the Pusha. This was effected, and the Japanese having now for the first time acquired a thoroughly sound strategical position, the next news may be expected to be of a gratifying character.

Colonel Kaai concludes by explaining that it may be doubted whether the aborigines, however, put into the fighting line more than 300 men. The fact that they are able to offer such splendid resistance in spite of this paucity of numbers, and the fact that they inflict upon their assailants losses three times as heavy as they themselves suffer, are accounted for by the nature of the ground, by their splendid knowledge of every part of it, and by their extraordinary skill in concealing themselves. Not one in every hundred Japanese skirmishers ever catches sight of an aborigine. Colonel Kaai also resents the allegation that the aborigines are sullen and conservative. He describes them on the contrary, as docile and liberal. The men have "high-collar" propensities and the women—some of whom already wear geta and sport parasols—prefer marrying a Japanese to mating with one of their own nation.

Lieut. Gen. Nakamura, aide-de-camp to the Emperor, who was sent some time ago to Formosa for the purpose of conveying presents to the troops, has just returned to Tokyo. He describes the situation in the island as having at length become favourable to the Japanese, though a junction has not yet been actually effected between the Gilan and the Shinchiku columns. He anticipates, however, that the present phase of the struggle will soon terminate successfully, but that the next campaign, namely that against the Taruko, will present much greater difficulty.

Tokyo newspapers publish lists of the sick and wounded during the present campaign in Formosa, namely from May to the end of August. From these lists we learn that the number of wounded totalled 300, of whom 169 received external injuries and 131 received bullet wounds. Among diseases the most prevalent attacked the digestive organs. The entries under this heading are 650; and next in order comes malaria, which prostrated 321 men. Altogether the sick and wounded totalled 1,674, to which aggregate have to be added 6,221 cases not sufficiently grave to necessitate admission to hospital. Among the latter total the number of gastric troubles was 1,760, and the number of malaria cases 1,041. Nothing is said as to deaths in battle or from wounds, nor are we told anything about the casualties on the side of the aborigines.

BARON OURA.

Baron Oura has been saying some very wholesome things as the outcome of his experiences in Europe and America. He admits that the people of the West have ceased to confound Japan with China. Even at a village in Poland the children were able point to the map of Japan, and could speak of Tokyo, Yokohama, Kyoto and Osaka. But on the other side of the account has to be placed the fact that Japan is thoroughly distrusted in Occidental commercial circles. In Lyons nine silk-merchants out of every ten had to tell of dishonest practices on the part of Japanese habutae manufacturers, and in London the same story was told. Moreover, a merchant of the latter city stated to the Baron that he had proposed to order a quantity of porcelain on the strength of samples shown at the Exhibition; but when it became known that he contemplated such a transaction, he was approached by a third party who offered to do the same work for less than half the price. Astonished by such a proposal, he instituted inquiries, and found that both parties were untrustworthy. Another illustration is furnished by the case of embroidered screens. Numbers of these could be sold a few years ago at high prices in London, but defects of manufacture have driven them almost completely out of the market. As for the Exhibition, one principal reason why things have not sold well is that people feel apprehensive lest, when the Exhibition closes, the unsold articles will be offered at a tithe of the prices now marked on them. In short, the Baron brings back a most discouraging account of foreign want of confidence in Japanese commercial morality. He justly says that until trust can be re-established there will be no sensible development of Japan's over-sea trade.

Another lesson learned by Baron Oura on his trip abroad was that some steps must be taken to prevent the growth of urban population at the expense of rural. He said that this growth is very palpable in the Occident and is causing much concern to economists. It is palpable in Japan's case also. Thus, whereas in 1898, out of 9,900,000 households in Japan, those devoted to agriculture totalled 5,400,000, in 1908 the rural households were found to have diminished by 6,400, and there was a large growth of the urban population. The only immediately apparent method of correcting this state of affairs was to provide machinery for purposes of agricultural operations, and Baron Oura said that he had taken steps to have that subject investigated. He looked for the speedy return of commissioners despatched by him to Europe and America, and he hoped that the result of their enquiries would prove of benefit to Japan.

A PEKING despatch says that Mr. Roosevelt is reported to have promised Prince Tsai Tao, when in London, to visit China this year.

THE TOKYO ELEVATED RAILWAY.

Mr. Amenomiya Kenjiro's plan for the building of an overhead electric railway in Tokyo is exciting more and more opposition. The inhabitants of the streets through which the two proposed lines would pass, complain vehemently that whereas these streets are the principal thoroughfares of Tokyo, the erection of iron pillars for the support of an overhead line would fatally obstruct the traffic, while the passage of the trains would compel the householders to keep their windows perpetually closed, and would, in fact, render residence impossible. It must always be remembered that these streets are already traversed by the lines of the Tokyo Railway, and if the space between these lines and the pavement on either side were encroached upon by iron pillars for an overhead railway, ordinary traffic would become practically impossible. Everywhere the citizens are agitating against the project, and their example is being followed now by the Directors of the Tokyo Railway. Originally these Directors favoured the overhead scheme on the ground that it would carry a majority of the long-distance travellers. But other considerations have now obtruded themselves. Mr. Amenomiya proposes that the Elevated Railway should pay to the Municipality 1,500 yen per mile as well as one-third of all its earnings above 6-per cent. This royalty would not be very onerous for the Elevated Railway, since its lines would extend to a distance of only 16 miles. But in the case of the Tokyo Railway with its 130 miles of road already operating and to be presently increased to over 200, the royalty would be simply ruinous. Therefore the directors are working hand and glove with the citizens, and by way of a collateral issue, the question of municipalization of the trams has again come upon the tapis.

It was a mistake to say that the project for an elevated railway in Tokyo had received the approval of the City Assembly. The programme has not yet been submitted for the Assembly's consideration. What has happened is that an application made by Mr. Amenomiya and sixty other projectors obtained the sanction of a special municipal committee, but never got any further. The idea now is that the application will be withdrawn, since it has no chance whatever of obtaining the Assembly's approval.

With regard to the other scheme, fathered by Mr. Fukuzawa Momosuke, for building an underground railway, it is universally condemned for engineering imperfections. In Occidental cities the cost of building such lines has varied from 250 yen to 1,800 yen per foot, whereas the Tokyo projectors have estimated the cost at 200 yen only. It is therefore obvious that no reliance can be placed upon the soundness of this speculation, for in Tokyo the subsoil is notoriously unstable, and to think of building an underground railway in that city at an outlay less than the minimum for any foreign city is ridiculous. It must be confessed that the public has been educated to regard with considerable doubt any project bearing the name of Mr. Amenomiya or Mr. Fukuzawa Momosuke. These gentlemen are somewhat too optimistic for practical purposes.

There is a third project, one namely for building a suspended line along the sea-shore from Shinagawa, and up the Sumida river to Senju. We gather that this enterprise is not more favourably regarded than either of the two above.

THE EASTERN DEVELOPMENT COMPANY.

The Fiji Shimpō has a strong article denouncing the Eastern Development Company as an obstacle rather than an aid to economic progress. Our contemporary's argument is not of a novel character. Its gist is that this Company represents a Government incursion into the field of Korean development, and thus constitutes a fatal deterrent to private enterprise. There is no line of business into which the Company does not thrust its hand, and while, on the one hand, it is regarded by the Koreans as an instrument for buying up land cheaply from the natives and selling it at an enhanced price to Japanese, by its own nationals it is counted a competitor too formidable to permit any private incursion into the same field. It is thus an obstacle rather than an incentive to progress.

This is an argument with which the public is very familiar, and it is an unanswerable argument from a theoretical point of view. But the trouble in the Far East is that private enterprise lags far behind its opportunities. In the early Meiji days, when the Government was thrusting its fingers busily into every industrial and even commercial pie, there were any number of critics among the foreign residents, and the general trend of their criticism was precisely that of the Fiji Shimpō's present article, namely, that private enterprise dared not raise its head in the face of official competition. Had the Japanese Government been convinced by that line of reasoning, Japan's position among the nations to day would be very different from what it is now. It is to be fervently hoped that the time is not far distant when the Japanese Government will be able to follow the example of the most advanced among its Occidental confreres by abstaining altogether from domains which can be exploited by private enterprise. But for the moment anybody familiar with the history of the present era must hesitate long before applying to the situation in Korea any hard-and-fast economic theories.

INFLUX OF JAPANESE IN KOREA.

Since the announcement of annexation there have been signs of a greatly increased influx of Japanese subjects into Chosen. Exact figures are not obtainable with regard to any place except Seoul, where the telegraph says that the number of Japanese residences has received an addition of 130, representing 561 persons. This means that houses inhabited by Japanese in the capital of Chosen now aggregate 8,676 with 39,280 inmates. It is sincerely to be hoped that this sudden influx does not include adventurers like those who followed in the wake of Japan's victorious armies. To the misconduct of these men the bad name acquired by Japan at the outset is to be attributed.

The sentiments of educated Japanese are accurately expressed, we believe, in the following extract which we take from a letter addressed to the Seoul Press by Mr. Hoshino:—

The long expected moment has come at last. A nation of three thousand years' standing has come to an end. Who could forbear shedding a few tears for this unfortunate land of the Orient? This sentiment, I believe, is shared by every sympathetic Japanese as well as by many a foreigner having relations with this country, although I trust at the same time, that every sensible man with no prejudice against Japan will readily admit that, in perpetrating this apparently cruel act, Japan has only done what a good surgeon would have done to a patient in order to save his life. It is but natural then that the sons of the soil should be sorry to see their country pass away like this. Sound reasoning and good judgment not only may help them to diminish their sorrow but will inspire them with new hope and fresh aspirations. But reasoning is one thing, feeling another.

BOOKS AND MANUSCRIPTS.

If great men looked more to the main chance they would take better care of their manuscripts. Such things may prove a veritable mine of wealth when the hand that indited them is cold in death. In obscure corners of The Times we find, for example, such paragraphs as the following:—

Messrs. Sotheby's sale yesterday of books and manuscripts was made up of properties from various sources, and included the original autograph manuscript of Byron's "Siege of Corinth," already described in The Times; it consists of 50 pages, and is the earliest only original MS. of the poem that survives or has yet been discovered; it was started at £100 by Mr. Sabin, who obtained it for £760.

A very fine letter of four pages quarto from Byron at Constantinople to R. C. Dallas, dated June 23, 1810, was also purchased by Mr. Sabin at £45. An autograph letter from Burns to Mr. Dunlop, dated January 5, 1792 (should be 1793), and the autograph MS. of "The Lament of Mary Queen of Scots," a poem in seven stanzas of eight lines each, written in 1790 and first published in 1793, realized £235 (Hornstein); the original MS. of Oscar Wilde's "The Decay of Lying: a Dialogue," on 54 leaves, small folio, signed by the author—£111 (Hornstein); a letter signed twice by Charles II., to Sir G. Carteret, March 5, 1649—£20 10s. (Sabin); an autograph letter from Prince Rupert to Thomas Eliot, complaining of neglect in the King's service—£31 (Sabin); an autograph letter of W. M. Thackeray to J. F. Boyes, January 15, 1829—£35 10s. (Maggs); and autograph MS. of a poem by Goethe, "Buchstahl sin Gasele XIII.," six stanzas of four lines each—£21 10s. (Sabin).

It will be observed that even Oscar Wilde's manuscripts are now things of much value. It is not so many years since the back of the fire would have been deemed the most fitting place for them.

COTTON SPINNING.

Representatives of the Cotton Spinning Industry held a meeting on the 3rd inst. in Osaka and decided to reduce their production by 20 per cent., commencing from the 1st of October. This will be effected by taking five additional holidays in a month and by adding two hours to the weekly period for meals. It was agreed, however, that companies which send abroad 40 per cent. of their manufactures should be exempt from this project.

Referring to the above the Asahi Shimbun says that it is a mere simulation, for with the exception of the great companies all the factories have already reduced their output since April last by fully 20 per cent. They commenced this year with a supply of cheaply-purchased raw cotton, but this has been exhausted, and just at the time when the autumn demand for yarns should have become operative, the inundations ensued, to the great detriment of the people's purchasing power. In the Asahi's opinion, therefore, the situation could not be met by a reduction of less than 30 per cent.

THE ANGLO-JAPANESE EXHIBITION.

The Mainichi Dempo publishes a correspondence from a Japanese in London, who spares neither pen nor ink in denouncing the whole Exhibition as a miserable fiasco and in accusing the Japanese commissioners of having allowed themselves to be completely taken in by Mr. Kiralfy. We have read the letter with some attention, expecting to find explicit statements of the grievances it alleges. But there is nothing. The correspondent's critical horizon seemed to be limited to the fact of Mr. Kiralfy's Jewish origin. Why should he not be a Jew? There are no better or more business like people in the world than the Jews, and the miserable prejudice that still exists against them in certain minds is nothing but a relic of the days when religious intolerance was carried to barbarous length, and when even a quaker was regarded as a moral outcast. It is curious that any intelligent Japanese should have allowed themselves to become the victims of this ridiculously crooked notion about a people who has given to the world many of its greatest men from Jesus downwards.

Baron Oura, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, has just returned from his visit to London. On the 3rd inst. he invited a number of newspaper representatives to an interview at which he expounded his reasons for denying the allegation that the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition had been in any sense a failure. Alluding to the criticism that the British nation had shown itself indifferent to the fate of the Exhibition, the Baron pointed to the fact that the British Court and the Departments of War and of the Navy had contributed a large number of remarkable and unique exhibits, and that whereas in the case of the Anglo French Exhibition the attendance had never exceeded 196,000 in a day, it had risen in the case of the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition to 260,000, and had never been less than 40,000. Some critics contended that it had been a mistake to entrust the arrangements to a private person like Mr. Kiralfy. But the Baron insisted that no fault could be found with this gentleman's competence, and that his management of the business entrusted to him had left little or nothing to be desired. Dealing with the accusation that the side-shows had brought disgrace upon the name of Japan, Baron Oura made the point already taken in these columns, namely, that the side-shows were intended to show Japan as she is, not as she might be, and that if Japanese methods were deemed by the critics to be hurtful to her fair fame, the proper course is to correct these methods, not to condemn their display. If anything immoral were in question, the case would be different, but nothing of the kind could be truthfully alleged in the present instance. Altogether the Baron contended that the Exhibition has fully achieved its purpose, and that it would certainly have the effect of increasing the commerce between the two countries.

THE WEATHER.

Friday, September 2.

The centre of depression reported to have declared itself in the neighbourhood of the Ryukyu Islands on the 31st ult., has taken its way westward, and the Two-Hundred-and-Tenth-day passed off peacefully on the 2nd inst., with the exception of the Hokkaido, where some rain and wind were experienced.

There are conflicting rumours about the rice crop. All agree that the exceptionally warm weather which has prevailed of late has exercised a most revivifying effect upon the crops outside the inundated regions. But as to the actual yield there is a divergence of view. The Kokumin alleges that the first estimate of the Department of Agriculture and Commerce will be issued in two days, and that it will show a crop $2\frac{1}{2}$ million koku less than the 52 millions harvested last year, but still $4\frac{1}{2}$ millions, or 5-per-cent., greater than the yield of an average year.

Saturday, September 3.

The 2nd inst., namely the two-hundred-and-tenth day, passed off quietly, with the exception of a storm of minor magnitude which affected Formosa and Ryukyu. But the prospects for the next few days are not so encouraging. This Ryukyu storm has changed its direction so that it now seems likely to pass up the Sea of Japan, and another centre of depression, which has declared itself near the Bonin Islands, seems likely to strike Shikoku. If these forecasts be fulfilled, the south and the west, which promised by the abundance of their crops to compensate largely for the disasters in the north and east, will be included in the category of a short yield.

Sunday, September 4.

The reports this morning continue to be reassuring. As is usual at this season, however, there are several centres of depression cruising around. The one originating at the Bonin Islands has taken its course northward and will not seriously affect Japan. The one reported from Ryukyu has taken a north-westerly direction, and with the exception of some devastation in the neighbourhood of its origin, it will probably pass harmless. A third has made its appearance in the Yayeyama region, but this also seems disposed to direct itself towards the Chinese continent.

Tuesday September 6.

On Tuesday morning there were many low pressure areas. The depression which was felt off Osezaki the previous day, proceeded to the offing of Wakasa province. Another depression extended between Saseho and Fukuoka, besides two similar ones in the east of China and a new one in the south of Formosa. These depressions measured from 744 to 748 m.m. and all proceeded towards the Japan Sea, taking a north easterly direction. A strong southerly wind continued to blow in the Tokyo-Yokohama district. On Tuesday morning a furious storm was experienced in Kyushu while in most parts of the country it was cloudy or fair with strong southerly wind. In the north eastern provinces it rained, with fairly strong north-easterly wind.

THE KOREAN PATRIOTS.

A Russian newspaper of Vladivostock, translated into the columns of the Nichi Nichu Shimbun, says that the Koreans have formed a Patriotic League having its headquarters in Vladivostock. They have chosen the latter place because, although fully sensible of the disadvantage of working from a foreign base, they are convinced that Japanese surveillance is too thorough to permit any organization in Korea itself. The leaders of the League have prepared a document which is to be sent to the Governments of Russia, Austria-Hungary, France and the United States of America. It entreats these countries to lend their powerful aid in order to secure for Korea perpetuity of the independence guaranteed to her by treaty. They point out that while Japan was still in a semi-barbaric and unenlightened condition, Korea imparted to her all the elements of civilization and of religion then available in the world. In fact Korea was then the teacher and Japan the student. It is, therefore, contrary to reason or justice that the Peninsula should be absorbed into the Japanese Empire.

This is very good sentiment but very bad logic. The four Governments said to have been addressed will sympathise with Korea, as we all do, not least the Japanese; but they will smile at the argument that Korea's independence is to be for ever based upon her proficiency in the arts of civilization 1,500 years ago.

THE NIPPON YUSEN KAISHA AND THE TOYO KISEN KAISHA.

Mr. Ito, head of the business bureau of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, is quoted by the Fiji Shimpō as rather pool-pooling the reductions recently announced in the passenger fares on the Yusen Kaisha's American line. He notes that the Yusen Kaisha is free to take this course, inasmuch as it does not belong to the association of shipping companies in these particular waters. Therefore no objection can be raised to a lowering of fares. But Mr. Ito does not think that the results will be at all marked. His opinion is that the tendency of passenger traffic is to gravitate to large ships with special accommodation, and steamers like those of the Yusen Kaisha, which combine the carrying of cargo and of passengers, are not likely to attract many customers. Probably, for that very reason, the Directors of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha have made a drastic reduction, but at the same time Mr. Ito is quite right to advertise his own company.

The Directors of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha are quoted as explaining that, in lowering their passenger rates on the Seattle service, they are merely taking self defensive action. Since the Tōyō S.S. Company has separated itself from the Pacific Mail, and has formed a junction between its service and the Western Pacific Railway, it has become a direct competitor of the N.Y.K., and since it possesses such fine steamers as the Tenyō, the Chiyō and the Manchuria, these vessels naturally attract 1st class passengers. Therefore it has become a matter of self-preservation for the N.Y.K. to lower its rates.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN TRADE.

The following are the figures for Japan's foreign trade during the last eleven days of August:—

	Yen.
Exports	12,188,827
Imports	11,194,402
Excess of Exports.....	1,079,425

The figures for the period January 1st to August 31st are as follow:—

	Yen.	Compared with last year.
Exports	284,488,867	+31,858,426
Imports	312,710,402	+33,955,903

RICE IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The Governor of the Philippines is evidently quite convinced that a rice diet produces kakke. He has issued orders forbidding this kind of food in all cases over which he exercises authority. The measure seems to be somewhat extreme. Japanese physicians who have been investigating this subject with the utmost diligence for several years, may be said to have arrived at the conclusion that while a diet of pure rice is certainly liable to produce kakke, a diet of rice mixed with bran is quite innocuous. The only question that remains to be solved is how to combine the bran without spoiling the taste of the rice. Many practical people seem to think that to eat palatable food all the year round and take the very small risk of contracting kakke is better than to purchase immunity at the expense of eating a nasty mess from year's end to year's end.

Naturally the decision of the Governor of the Philippines that rice shall no longer be an article of diet in offices or for Government employees has created some criticism in Tokyo. Of course this subject has received much attention at the hands of the medical profession in Japan. Many experiments have been tried on fowls and pigeons, and in every case it has been proved that a diet of pure rice produces kakke. But it has also been proved, with almost equal conclusiveness, that rice with the husks attached may be eaten in any quantity without impunity, and that the particular hygienic ingredient which the husks contain may be extracted from pulse, from the red bean and from barley. Instead, therefore, of abolishing rice as an article of diet, Japanese physicians recommend that it should be supplemented with a relish prepared from one of the above three vegetables. That is doubtless a sound view, but pending the manufacture of such a relish, it is surely not an unwise plan to suspend the rice diet.

THE FOREIGN AMBASSADORS.

A representative of the Nichi Nichi Shimbun was sufficiently enterprising to visit Chusenji for the purpose of interviewing the Foreign Representatives who for the most part are residing there during the great heat. The interviewer writes to his journal that the enterprise ended in his being himself interviewed, and the topic to which the foreign Ambassadors chiefly alluded was the lantern procession got up by the Hochi Shimbun with the most pernicious results upon Japan's reputation for chivalry. This performance seems to have produced a naturally strong effect upon the minds of statesmen who appreciate the value of tact and courtesy.

With regard to the Yorozu's imitation of the Hochi's example, we are not at all surprised to find these two journals running in harness, nor are we surprised that the Yorozu Chōhō, not to be outdone by its rival in yellowness, puts the number of its lantern-bearers at 30,000. From our own observation, made, however, at a somewhat early period, and from the observation of a high English officer made when the procession was fully marshalled, the number of persons bearing lanterns did not exceed from 3,000 to 4,000. Thus the statements of our well assorted contemporaries recall vividly the Chinese classical rendering of hyperbole, namely, "Four thousand infantry making in all forty thousand."

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Friday, September 2.

The weather now rules the Exchange. The forenoon of the Nihyakuto ka having been bright, fine and hot, prices showed an upward tendency. But in the afternoon, news came that Osaka had weakened and much of the forenoon's appreciation was lost.

Saturday, September 3.

The market was tolerably steady on the 3rd instant, but although slight appreciation took place in the case of certain stocks, notably the Tanko K. Kaisha, the general tendency was in a downward direction. There is decided anxiety about the crops and about the arrangements for Korean Finance. We append the quotations for November delivery:—

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

A veritable care of entertaining angels unawares was furnished recently by the story of a piece of tapestry. It is described as "an oblong panel of Beauvais tapestry with children bird-nesting in a landscape, with festoons of flowers at the sides, 87 inches by 128 inches." Rolled up as a piece of carpet, it was purchased at a country sale a few years ago for £30, and, at a recent sale held by Messrs. Christie, Manson and Woods, this "piece of carpet" was purchased by Mr. Seligmann for 2,800 guineas.

In a very ungrammatical form of application the Osaka Shosen Kaisha invites foreign capitalists to subscribe to its issue of 3½ million yen of debentures bearing interest at the rate of 5½ per-cent. The minimum issue price is 98, and each debenture will carry a coupon covering the period from the 10th of October—when the price of the hand debenture has to be paid—to the 30th of November, the coupon being payable on the 1st of December. Applications are invited by the Nomura Shōten, No. 47, Hommachi, Osaka, and each application has to be accompanied by 3 yen per debenture, the remaining payment being made on October the 10th. The object of the loan is to convert or redeem a corresponding amount of 7-per-cent. debentures already issued by the Company.

The new 5-yen note just issued is a dainty little affair. It is much smaller than the old note; its design is very graceful, and a poetic element is imparted to it by the presence of a transparency, which, when held up to the light, discloses a substantial head of Daikoku, the God of Wealth; thus suggesting that the strength which exists for the redemption of these notes is illimitable, though latent.

The Directors of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha have taken an important step by materially reducing the passenger fares on the Yokohama-Seattle line. The accommodation and the treatment of passengers will remain unchanged, but the 1st class fare will be reduced from £35 to £25, and the 2nd class from £20 to £17.

It appears that the Kokumin Shimbun erred in saying that, according to official estimates, the rice crop this year would be above the average. The official statement has now been published, and it shows a crop of 48,725,597 koku, being 7.1 per cent less than an average year. The crops in the south and west are distinctly good, but those in the north and east have suffered from deficient heat and, above all, from inundations. The following table is published:—

	Koku:
1900	41,466,422
1901	46,914,434
1902	36,932,266
1903	46,473,298
1904	51,430,321
1905	38,172,560
1906	46,302,530
1907	49,052,065
1908	51,93,893
1909	52,437,662
1910 (Estimate)	48,725,597
(Average).....	49,038,41

The service of steamers at present connecting Fusan and Bakan is said to have proved insufficient. Two additional steamers of 3,000 tons each will be placed upon the line. They will have accommodation for 30 saloon passengers; 100 second class and 300 steerage; and will be capable of developing a speed of 15 knots, though their average will be only 13.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun quotes a high Japanese naval officer as saying that the Miyabara boiler is coming into use all over the world. In spite of considerable opposition at one time, English experts have decided in its favour. This authority explains that there is often a considerable difference between the results of trial trips made in England and the results of the same trips when repeated in Japan. This is owing to the deterioration of coal. Freshly mined Cardiff coal in England and the same coal a few months old in Japan develop a very different degree of horse-power. This factor is always to be allowed for in comparing results. As for the Miyabara boiler, its latest achievement was very signal. The first Japanese battleship Fuji, built in 1895 and displacing 12,320 tons, was lately fitted with Miyabara boilers, and on being tested she developed 600 horse-power more than that obtained on her original trial trip. Such a result in spite of the vessel's age and of her comparatively small coal consumption with the Miyabara boilers was justly regarded as conclusive.

It is announced that a quarry of white marble (dairi-seki) has been discovered in the Otosawa district of Etchu. The stone is said to be of an excellent quality and to exist in large quantities. The only quarry hitherto known is at Suwa-yama in Hitachi.

It may be in the memory of some of our readers that at the time when the relations between Japan and Russia were becoming strained, a society was formed in Tokyo under the name of the Kokumin Kyokai (People's party), which had for its object the popularization of stalwart methods. On the conclusion of the war, this party was formally dissolved. But in November of 1909 it saw a successor in the shape of the Chosen Dōshikai, which aimed at the annexation or amalgamation of Korea. This latter party, after a brief life of 9 months, has now been dissolved, its purpose having been attained. The resolution declaring dissolution contains an expression of conviction that the peace of the Far East has been assured by the inclusion of Korea in the Japanese Empire.

Sometimes the laws of Japan provide surprises. A case in point is the recent trial for gambling. The sentences passed have varied from a fine of 250 yen to 6 months' imprisonment with a fine of 300 yen. The latter judgment may be mitigated on appeal, but it is not thought that any attempt will be made to upset the judgments in the other seven cases. At the same time we have Japanese newspapers again and again publishing villainous libels on unhappy individuals, and the maligned parties have no recourse except to raise hands of despair, for they know well that if they complain to the courts a sentence of 50 or 100 yen will be the heaviest penalty inflicted on the libellers. There is not a race-course in Europe or America where incidents cognate with that which has just occupied the attention of Japanese courts do not occur, and therefore from an Occidental point of view this extreme severity is inexplicable, especially when we remember that only a few months have elapsed since the pari mutuel was openly practised with official approval, and was ultimately forbidden not for its own sake, but because it threatened to become epidemic.

The death of Baron Nagayo deprives Japan of one of her most distinguished physicians. The Baron, who owed his title not only to his own merits, but also to those of his illustrious father, Dr. Nagayo Sensai, was only in his 45th year at the time of his death. He had long suffered from peritonitis, precisely the disease which he and his father were supposed to be specially expert in treating. But though every care was taken and every known remedy applied the fell malady proved fatal. Baron Nagayo studied in Germany for 11 years, and it need hardly be said that he was thoroughly proficient in the German language. He fell into a state of insensibility on the 3rd instant, and died at a few minutes past 5 on the 5th inst.

The death is announced of Mr. Kawanobe Itcho, one of the greatest of modern experts in lacquer making. He expired on the morning of the 5th instant in his 80th year, his disease being laryngitis. The deceased was one of the teachers in the Art School, and also held the post of Court Artist (Teishitsu Gigei-in). Visitors to the various exhibitions held periodically in Tokyo are familiar with the exquisite productions of this master—productions which flatly contradict the often advanced theory that modern Japanese lacquer is far behind that of pre-Meiji days. Nothing could be less consistent with the truth.

A NAGASAKI despatch says that the Mitsubishi Shipbuilding Yard has contracted for towing off the stranded cruiser Bedford, and has sent the steamer Oura Maru to the scene of the disaster.

MARRIAGE IN TOKYO.

Tokyo journals announce that her Majesty the Empress has presented a wedding gift in the form of a silver vase to the Honorable Miss de Call, whose marriage to Lieut. Reddie of the 16th Lancers is to take place on the 10th instant in the Catholic Cathedral of Tokyo.

The Kokumin Shimbun has quite a long article discussing the accomplishments of the fair lady who has been the recipient of her Majesty's gift. It appears that Mademoiselle de Call has managed to acquire quite a remarkable knowledge of the Japanese language during her short stay in Japan, and has also developed much ability in Japanese pictorial art.

KOREA.

(FROM OUR SEOUL CORRESPONDENT.)

Seoul is pent up with expectancy. Seldom have these old hills that are supposed to stand guard over the city, seemed more dazed and helpless than to-day. Hands in their sleeves they look back and forth at each other. North Hill says to South Hill "What are you going to do about it?" South Hill replies "Keulse (I wonder) You are the watch that keeps the city, not I. I am merely signal hill." North Hill replies, "Dest ny is against us, Un-su, and you know there is no stopping Un-su. In fact it would not be right for Un-su is God, and you cannot stop God." Camel Mountain looks over to the Mount of Humanity, and the Mount of Humanity looks back. Camel-kind and Humanity-kind all regard each other and the day with fixed and settled hopelessness. Many solemn words of Scripture seem to come to lend them aid "It is finished," "The end is come," "This is indeed the wages of sin," "All is lost."

Many moments of intensity have held these hills spellbound in the past, times pregnant with fearful possibility, times accompanied by wild eyed omens, times when men's hearts have died in them, and to-day again, on the wheel of God's turning, we face a moment that splits up and severs the ages from the ages. In 1232, when the greasy Mongols, who were shaking all the heaven and the earth, clear from England to Japan, advanced, these hills saw the dreadful invasion of Song-do. May 1592, on the approach of Hideyoshi's army, when king and courtier fled toward Ping yang with all the speed in their bones, these hills saw once more a dire and awful day. When the barbarian Manchu entered the city in 1636, and the king fled to Nam han to escape them, these hills must have gasped for fear.

Four invasions have really ridden through this vale of tears, this vale in which Seoul sits and sleeps and smokes and agonizes. The Mongol invasion back of which were the two smoking power-houses of Genghis and Kublai; then the Japanese made terrible by the name of Hideyoshi; then the Manchus; then last and most formidable of all this twentieth-century invasion, quiet but irresistible. A long farewell must be taken by the hills and streams and people to the past and what the past stood for, and a new world be gripped firm hold of from to-day. No talk of Yo and Soon will any more avail. Door-post mottoes such as "Turn the hinge and luck comes in" have proven a failure, and geomancy and the mu-tang (wise woman or witch) likewise. The only word left to post up in the sight of all men is, "We have been unprofitable servants," "A very naughty people we," "Let's do well from to-day."

If annexation be truly an accomplished fact, as is persistently rumoured, then a new era truly begins, an era of hard struggle. For a backward untrained people to hope to compete with a keen, high-tensioned, thinking, ingenious race is a discouraging affair. Especially so is it to a people whose texts for by-gone days have been, Hal su upso (There is no help for it) Kwan-ki chanso

(Who cares?), Morogawo (Don't ask me). In the teeth of this invasion of twentieth century annexation new pass words must be invented, "Hurrah for the tug," "Don't give up," "Stick to it."

We wait with interest to see what the next ten years will develop in this people under the tutelage of Japan. Past days have been too easy; the hills have looked down upon altogether too lazy a life to last. That is finished, and from to-day on the hills will see labour and activity and we trust high accomplishment on the part of these people who have so sadly failed, but who have excellent qualities in them if they be but well developed. FLOODS IN KWANSAI DISTRICT.

Reports from Osaka say that since the small hours of the 7th inst. heavy rains have been experienced at Ikeda and other suburbs of Osaka. The Kanzaki, Ina, and other rivers inundated the fields and much damage was done to bridges and embankments, the communications being entirely interrupted. At Namaze a landslide occurred near the north entrance of the railway tunnel, so that the traffic has been suspended. In the districts of Iozaki and Ashiya, near the Hanshin Electric Railway line, the embankment was broken down in many places owing to the rising of the Kanzaki River. There was also much rain in Tamba province, and the Sonobe River rose over 10 feet near Kameoka. The bridge over the stream at Arashiyama in Kyoto is in extreme danger. In Kyoto-fu the Yura, Hozu, and Katsura Rivers rose to a considerable height, owing to the continuous rain since Tuesday night. Inhabitants in the vicinity of these streams are in a state of commotion, preparing for flight.

A Kobe despatch says that owing to the heavy rain on Tuesday night the Minatogawa has become so swollen that the water nearly covers its banks and a part of the embankment near the mouth has been washed away. A landslide occurred near Suwayama, resulting in the destruction of a house. One of the inmates is missing. The Gangawa overflowed and large numbers of houses at Aioi-cho and Tamon-dori were submerged, the muddy water reaching a depth of over two feet near Kobe Station. Many fences and roads were also destroyed. Over 3,900 houses are reported to have been submerged. In the district of Suma some 200 houses are submerged and electric railway traffic was suspended for a time. Train service between Shioya and Tarumi was also interrupted owing to a landslide near the railway.

According to the report of the Kobe Meteorological Station, the rainfall during Tuesday night measured 3 koku 6 to 7 shi per tsubo, such precipitation not having been experienced since 1897. Telephonic communication in most parts of the city has been interrupted since Wednesday morning, and it will take two or three days to finish repairs.

There was an inundation on Tuesday in the Arima hot springs valley. Many people took refuge on the hills close by.

At Takamatsu, Sanuki province, the Takarada river rose so high that a bridge 260 yards long was washed away, and many parts of the city and suburbs were submerged to a depth of three to five feet.

Similar disasters are reported from Nagoya and Gifu. In a suburb of the latter city over two hundred houses were submerged, twenty-three land-slides occurred, and ten bridges were washed away. At a village called Haranaka a small cottage with one inmate was carried away by the flood. A number of casualties are reported from various other districts of the prefecture.

At 2.27 p.m. on the 1st instant a slight earthquake was felt in Yokohama, lasting one minute and ten seconds. The oscillations were principally in a north-north-easterly and south-south-westerly direction.

THE QUESTION OF DREADNOUGHTS.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 3.)

WE note that our German contemporary is not satisfied with our exposition of the naval situation, so far as it depends upon the number of capital ships at present built and in process of construction for the two leading naval Powers. It insists that by taking a different basis of comparison in the two cases we have arrived at a false estimate of the situation. If that be so, we are sinning in good company. For our estimate accords with that officially given out in the House of Commons on behalf of a Liberal Government—an estimate arrived at by the head of a Ministry which has every reason for taking the most optimistic view of the British side, so as to reduce the expenditure on new construction to the lowest possible point. We do not think a Cabinet in which the Radical and Little-England element is admittedly strong can fairly be accused of exaggerating the needs of the situation from the English point of view. As a matter of fact, the figures quoted by Mr. ASQUITH in the middle of July last constitute the most moderate assessment of comparative naval strength we have seen, with the single exception of the estimate given by the Labour-leader Mr. BARNES, which is so absurdly remote from the truth that it may be dismissed without hesitation. However, we preferred to base our calculations on the figures given by such standard publications as Brassey's Naval Annual, which are as notable for their moderation as they are devoid of political bias. The whole question, as we remarked in our previous article, is one of facts. Our sole desire is to arrive at a just and correct estimate of the situation—a desire, we note, which is shared by our contemporary's correspondent; and we recognize with satisfaction the temperate and courteous tone which pervades his treatment of the whole subject.

We have already pointed out that this problem of comparative strength is complicated by the fact that we have to reckon on ships that are not yet completed and whose periods of completion are governed by uncertainty. A further element of confusion is supplied by the circumstance that the years which form so important a factor in the calculation do not correspond with the ordinary calendar year. Thus, the naval programme of 1909 is in reality the programme of 1909-10. Finally, a third circumstance adds to the complexity of the problem—namely the delay in the commencement of ships allotted to a certain programme-year. To this last circumstance, as we shall attempt to show, our contemporary's correspondent has scarcely, we think, paid sufficient attention.

We may reckon ships built, and ships building, but we can scarcely reckon ships that have not been begun. Our contemporary's correspondent contends that we ought to reckon the 5 battleships belonging to the British 1910-11 programme, if we include those of the so-called 1910 German programme. But so far as our information goes, the four ships of this latest German programme have been laid down, and will be followed, next spring, by an additional four, in accordance with the provisions of the Navy Act; while, on the other hand, the five ships of the British 1910-11 programme have not yet been laid down, nor indeed will they be, before the early months of next year. Even in the original Reuter telegram of July 15th this delay was suggested by the First Lord of the Admiralty, who said, in support of Mr. ASQUITH's statement, that "the contracts for the five Dreadnoughts of the 1910-11 programme would not be given out in time for completion in 1912." This point was further elucidated in response to a subsequent enquiry in Parliament:—

Lord CHARLES BERESFORD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty if it was still intended that the five battleships approved for this year's programme should not be laid down until January of March next year, and whether it was his intention to ask for a Supplementary Estimate for increasing the sum of £321,114 provided in this year's Navy Estimate as the total amount to be expended on the five battleships approved.

Mr. MCKENNA: The reply to the first part of the question is in the affirmative, and to the second part in the negative.

We say therefore that the following list correctly represents the number of capital ships actually in hand for the two leading Powers, with the probable dates of completion:—

ENGLAND.		GERMANY.
1	Dreadnought ... 1906	1	Nassau 1909
2	Indomitable ... 1906	2	Westfalen 1909

It is clear, however, that if these five Dreadnoughts are to be reckoned on the British side, the situation must be assessed as it will be, in all probability, in the spring of 1913—allowing a bare two years for the construction of these 1910-11 programme ships. And it is equally clear that the ships laid down by Germany in 1910 and those to be laid down in the early part of 1911 should be included in the calculation. The fundamental fact of the comparison is that the British ships ordered in a given year are frequently not laid down in that year. In this case they are to be delayed a whole year. The German authorities on the other hand are most business-like and prompt in the carrying out of their naval programmes, and indeed in some cases have anticipated both the laying down and the completion-dates of their vessels. Hence it follows that while the allotted year of a programme may be some guide to its completion in the one case, it is not in the other. The position case may be tabulated in another way and as convincingly as follows:—

DREADNOUGHTS.	BRITAIN.	GERMANY.
Ready for service.
Now	10	5
End of 1911.....	16	11
April 1912	20	13
April 1913	25†	21*
† Plus two Colonial Dreadnoughts.
* Four to be completed in the summer of 1912.

We should be glad to know if we are wrong, but we fear that not only the probabilities, but the facts—so far as they are known—all tend to show that our estimate is both conservative and correct.

IMPERIAL UNION IMPERILLED.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 6.)

IT is generally understood that the various political parties in England, whether tied or free, are in a throes of a tremendous struggle as to whether or not the House of Lords shall, or shall not, have the power to reject a Finance Bill. In other words, the greatest political crisis of the past quarter of a century has arisen on the question of the precise status of the Second Chamber as a factor in the British Constitution. That the matter is an important one, none can deny. It is highly desirable that the powers of the House of Lords as a revising body should be defined and placed beyond the reach of controversy. But there is a larger and more vital issue at stake in this decade-year of grace, than this Second-Chamber question; and the danger is lest, from that peculiar property of parochialism which magnifies the local at the expense of the general, the larger issue might be lost in the lesser. To borrow the words of the Evangel, what shall it profit the British people if they shall gain a Constitution and lose an Empire? For with the passing of the Empire would come the utter extinction of Britain as a Great Power, and the day of the "conscript appendage" will have irrevocably dawned. Yet the fact remains that what ought to be the dominant question in British politics, as it is the pivot upon which hangs the policy of the Dominions-over-sea—a question, in truth, the common property, the welcome burden, of every political party—is one which receives at the hands of the responsible government of the day the blighting curse of the Non possumus. The attitude of Ministers towards the most pressing need of the Empire is, to quote Mr. BALFOUR, that of "stolid isolation." "The Colonies?" they say, in effect, "What are they to us? Why should a Liberal Government, sworn to the perpetual adoration of Parochialism, bred in the school that viewed England's over-sea development to nothing more than to the possessions as millstones about her neck, skilful use of the tariff, are not only repudiated by Canadians in general, but are resented as revealing "the manifest influence of certain Americans who are seeking to bring about the union of Canada with the United States on a basis of 'reciprocity.'" In other words, it is merely a not surprising consequence of the inrush of American settlers into the Canadian West. "Canadians recognize," says the Ottawa correspondent of a London journal, "that while the transition from 'commercial intercourse' to 'closer intercourse' may seem natural, it might ultimately lead to absorption by their powerful neighbour. Everybody in the Dominion realises that the United States is striving with might and main to secure that preference which Great Britain persistently refuses. These overtures of the United States have hitherto failed, owing to the exertions of Canadians loyal to the British connection. But the rapid Americanisation of the North-West of Canada, coupled with the repeated rebuffs of the Mother-country, must inevitably neutralise and destroy the efforts of loyal Canadians. . . . Everywhere the opinion is held that within the next two years a treaty of reciprocity will be concluded between the United States and Canada. This will destroy at one fell swoop Great Britain's opportunity, and will mark the first step toward imperial disintegration."

The whole-hearted support which the idea of "closer relations" between the Dominion and its Republican neighbour is receiving from a large section of the American press, led by the New York Herald,—not to mention the endorsement of this policy attributed to President TAFT, who is said to have expressed apprehension lest "with the development of Tariff Reform in England, accompanied by Imperial Preference, much trade which should rightly go to the United States will be diverted to England"—should of itself speak volumes to all whose ears are not hopelessly stopped the played-out out dogmas of the past. Already valuable time has been lost. "For seven years," says the Observer, "neither the Mother Country nor any one of the Dominions has sufficiently understood the urgency of the case, or grasped the Imperial problem as a whole." The cry of the hour is the same as that raised by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN a decade ago—"Unite, unite, unite." Considerations of strength, of safety, of the commonweal, of the hour which passes never to return—have added to that call the urgency of time and circumstance. It is imperative that the warning, so far as those entrusted with the Empire's governance are concerned, should no longer fall on deaf ears. In the present fateful circumstances, every hour that a Liberal Government holds sway at Westminster is a peril to the Empire.

A PROPOSED WOMEN'S COUNCIL.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 7.)

UNDER the above heading a lady-writer discusses in the National Review the possibilities of a Women's Council as an outlet for the energies and aspirations of those who have set their hearts on Female Suffrage. While recognizing that Nature herself has "marked out one great primary set of duties for woman, and made her in a very special sense the maker and keeper of the home," the writer claims that, owing to the preponderance of the female population in the United Kingdom, there are large numbers of woman to whose the ordinary domestic ties of life do not fall. Granted that these woman form but a small fraction of the sex, and that their position and aspirations can not be regarded as normal, or as representative of the sex as a whole, it is nevertheless desirable that some means be found of enabling these women, many of who are possessed of great intellectual power, to render service to the State in some other capacity than that in which Nature has called their more numerous sisters to serve. Hence the proposition of "a Women's Council, elected by women, forming a recognized part of the machinery of State and holding a definite relationship towards the Imperial Parliament." Such a body, it is claimed, while not possessing direct legislative powers, would be "competent to discuss any matter social, moral or economic, concerning the interests of women and children. . . . Resolutions representing the mature wishes and opinions of the women of the country would inevitably mould and determine legislation when sent up to the House of Commons; and similarly, if a definite channel existed by means of which women's views and wishes could express themselves or recognized lines, there are many questions about which Parliament itself might gladly seek the advice and opinion of such a Council." The article is a frank attempt at finding a via media between the far-reaching claims of the suffragists, on the one hand, and the uncompromising hostility of the anti-suffragists on the other. For the sake of peace, it offers a compromise; and from that point of view would be more likely to succeed in its object than the proposed "first instalment" of Woman Suffrage embodied in Mr. SHACKLETON's so-called Conciliation Bill. In so far then as such a measure might constitute a way out of the threatened impasse, it will have the support of all moderate persons of either sex and of any political persuasion. A compromise, of course, never satisfies the extremists on either side; but in this case we fancy that, while few anti-suffragists would find any objection to the scheme, it would be incontinently condemned by practically all suffragists, militant or otherwise. For any such measure, if it ever reached the plane of practical politics, would carry with it the recognition of two dominant facts which it is the whole purpose and aim of the Votes for Women party to decline to recognize. These facts are, in the first place, the physical disabilities of women for the rôles of the legislator and the statesman, with all that those rôles involve; and, in the second place, that the women who are in a position to serve the State in any public capacity are in a very small minority—a minority insignificant, not by reason of the mental calibre of those composing it, but numerically. The lady-writer to whom we have alluded—we believe she is the daughter of a distinguished Admiral—dispassionately reviews the objections to the political enfranchisement of women, and finds them unanswerable. There is Mr. GLADSTONE's historic objection that, the right to vote conceded, the right to sit in Parliament, to take rank as a Cabinet Minister, must follow as a logical consequence. Further, there is the even graver objection that the extension of the suffrage even to a limited number of women constitutes, as the sponsors of the Conciliation Bill were foolish enough to admit in the House of Commons, "the thin end of the wedge," and must lead inevitably to universal adult suffrage. As the female population of the British Isles exceeds the male by a million and a half, "the ultimate governing authority" must eventually be shifted from men to women. Then there is what may be called the Imperial objection—the fact that the British Empire contains some 340 millions of coloured races who could never become reconciled to government by women, while no women could participate in the practical activities involved in the government of a Crown Colony. Finally, there is the unsurmountable obstacle which Nature herself has set up, and against which there is no appeal. It has been called "the scientific fact of specialization," and takes cognizance of men and women as "two highly developed, highly specialized instruments" in the scheme of Life, marked by profound and unalterable natural distinctions. The whole question is governed by "a difference of structure" which points to a difference of social or political function. "Obviously," says Miss MARKHAM, "if the State is to exist at all, the bearing and rearing of healthy citizens is one of the most important functions which can exist in that State." There are women who become restive, if not indignant, when confronted with what may be described as the domestic argument. It is as if a man were to be annoyed at being reminded that the office or the work-shop was his sphere of daily activity. But the rightly constituted woman looks upon the supremest function of her sex with far other eyes; or, as Miss MARKHAM puts it:—

Home rightly viewed is not the strong hold of bovine contentment. It is the focus from which the best and most intelligent life of men and women will radiate, and what the woman creates there will be writ large ultimately in the life of the nation. Hence the supreme importance of giving to woman the highest and best education of which she is capable, because she is in very truth the guardian of life, not only of the physical life she bears, but of that deeper moral and spiritual life by which humanity alone in any real sense lives. The very fact, however, of woman's specialisation for these great duties implies that there are other functions in the State for which belong more properly to men. Once again we should infer from scientific analogy that it is not by interference with one another's functions, but by each sex making the best of its own, that we shall arrive at the maximum of life for the whole community.

The legislator it must be remembered, has not merely to make laws; it falls to him ultimately to enforce them. The statesman has not merely to guide his country; he has in the last resort to defend it. Inasmuch as women-policemen, women soldiers and sailors, are in our present civilization unthinkable, so the supreme authority of government must of necessity remain in the hands of men. Woman, on the other hand, has an equally important and no less glorious part to play: with a single eye to the welfare of the race, she can perfect herself in all that pertains to its maintenance unimpaired.

THE NATION AND ITS DEPARTED KING.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 8.)

THE largeness of the place occupied by the late King EDWARD VII. in the hearts and minds of his people is further evidenced by the universality of the movement for establishing memorials in his honour. It will be remembered that, in the early part of last month, in reply to an enquiry from the Lord MAYOR of London, the Prime MINISTER suggested, as a preferable alternative to raising one single national memorial, that each county and large city should provide its own memorial, in accordance with local sentiment and conditions. This proposition has been eagerly taken up in many parts of the country. In most of the great cities and county divisions, schemes of various descriptions are beginning to take shape for commemorating, in some suitable manner, the brief but glorious reign of the departed King. Naturally London is leading the way, and the widespread interest aroused by the movement is shown by the fact that the special Mansion House committee, consisting of a hundred members, though it can hardly be said to have commenced its deliberations, is inundated with suggestions from all quarters as to the form the proposed memorial should take. It is understood, says a London journal, that the probable course that this committee will pursue, at as early a period as possible after assembling, will be to consult the Royal wishes with regard to the memorial. It is obvious that no method of commemorating King Edward's reign could be considered fitting unless it had the fullest approval of the Queen Mother, of King George and of Queen Mary; and the Royal wishes, predicts this journal, "will be on the side of a scheme which will make a successful and striking appeal to the imagination and to the hearts not only of London but also of the whole nation."

The character of the suggestions hitherto sent in is, naturally, for the most part architectural; but many of them show a desire to place on record the late KING's charitable instincts in the direction of Hospital work. Thus, as examples of proposed architectural memorials there may be mentioned the rebuilding of Trafalgar Square; the rebuilding of the front of Buckingham Palace on an imposing scale; the construction of a new bridge across the Thames and of an arch in Green Park; the improvement of Hyde Park Corner, the building of a Memorial Chapel in Westminster Abbey, or of a Pantheon adjoining that historic pile. Other propositions of a more general character are the erection of a State Opera House in Kingsway, of a vast Hall in the same thoroughfare to be called "The Great Globe," in honour of the Empire which King Edward did so much to strengthen; the purchase of the Crystal Palace and its devotion to purely national purposes; and the building of a magnificent "Indian Museum" on the Embankment, on a site adjoining that of the new County Council Hall. The proposals of a philanthropic character which have been put forward are the provision of a new home for incurables and of a hostel for friendless girls, of a further fund for cancer research, and of almshouses for the deserving poor; the clearing of St. Bartholomew's Hospital of debt and the creation of more open spaces for the East End. One correspondent advocates the making of a "garden city" to be known as King Edward's Town; another proposes the erection of "towers in open spaces," though what precise purpose the towers are to serve is not clear. From the provinces come propositions of a generally similar character, governed in some cases by entirely local considerations. The Liverpool memorial will include an equestrian statue of the King, a sum of £25,000 having been voted for the purpose; and Birmingham proposes to rebuild its Children's Hospital and erect a statue. In Norfolk and Shropshire, and at Warwick, Windsor, Lancaster, Chichester, and Hastings, it has been decided that the memorial funds shall be devoted to the extension, in one form or another, of hospital work, while Aberdeen has ordered a granite statue of the late King. Manchester is as yet divided between building a sanatorium or an art gallery and the abolition of slum property; Oxford and Durham propose sanatoria for tuberculosis; Hampshire is in favour of a statue at Winchester Cathedral, while Bristol proposes, among other things, the freeing of the Clifton Suspension Bridge.

As far as the Metropolis is concerned, we fancy that one or other of the architectural projects will win the day. For a great city, the greatest in the world, London is singularly deficient in architectural monuments of outstanding magnificence. Three of the propositions advanced seem to be more likely of realization than the rest—(1) the Buckingham Palace scheme; (2) the Trafalgar Square improvement, and (3) the Indian Museum. With regard to this last, the idea seems to be to provide a suitable housing for the collections originally made by the East India Government, while at the same time erecting a building of majestic and novel proportions in a very striking situation—"a sort of microcosm of our wonderful Indian Empire." A provisional design for the museum has been prepared by a former Government architect at Madras, and gives some precision to the scheme:—

The style of architecture is pure Gujarati, one of the happiest amalgamations of Hindu and Moslem art. It is proposed that the external portion should be executed by Indians with Indian materials, while the shell would be constructed by Englishmen, so that the workmen of both nations would be benefited. The length of the building would be about 370 feet, the breadth 210 feet, the height 130 feet, and the area 157,251 square feet, exclusive of corridors and staircases. On the basis of the cost of the County Council Hall the cost of the India Museum would be between £700,000 and £800,000. It would face south, as all Indian buildings should do, but there would be no competition between it and its important neighbour as regards æsthetic or artistic conditions, the two styles being so essentially different. To spectators, whether from the terrace of the House of Commons, or from Westminster Bridge, or from the Embankment, the home of treasures from our great Eastern Empire would offer a sight at once noble and inspiring.

The Trafalgar Square project, for which a well-known architect is sponsor, appears to have met with some criticism. "Surely," writes a correspondent to The Times, "it cannot be really contemplated to alter that square and its name for a memorial to King Edward. Trafalgar Square is already a monument to a great warrior and commemorative of a great victory, and will ever remain so in the eyes of the nation, and could not, therefore, be transformed into a patched-up memorial of King Edward the Peacemaker." However, there seems little ground for these objections, as the scheme, in its entirety, is not intended to diminish but to emphasise the great historic and naval character of the square; and "whilst sweeping away those features that are rather paltry, would reconstruct it on modern and artistic lines, elaborating its magnificent natural advantages and making it in every sense worthy of the nation." Of course the Buckingham Palace project was mooted long before the Memorials movement became general; and when it is taken into conjunction with the Victoria Memorial works now nearly completed, the scheme as a whole—apart from its near associations with the late King—seems as likely as any other to become the final choice of the Metropolis. That at least is our belief; but, of course, any of our readers, especially those familiar with the great city, are quite as competent to pass an opinion on the point, and we should be glad to invite their views on this interesting subject.

ANTI-IMPERIALISM IN THE PULPIT.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 9.)

FEW people, we believe, would be disposed to agree that the pulpit is a fit and proper place for the pronouncement of political sentiments, whether of Imperial or of anti-Imperial tendency. We do not say that such civic virtues as the sense of duty and of responsibility may not on occasion, with full propriety, be inculcated by ministers of religion, especially where the younger members of their congregations are concerned. And if there is one such occasion more appropriate than another, it is the Festival of Empire Day. But that opportunity should be taken of such an occasion to deliver to a number of young people an address more Anti-Imperial than Imperial in its tone is a remarkable illustration of the aphorism that England's worst enemies are within her own gates. What with British members of Parliament writing sympathetic letters to Bengali sedition-mongers, Irish members drawing funds for the disruption of the United Kingdom from American ex-dynamitards and Little Navyites demanding the reduction of Naval expenditure so that the national weakness might become a standing invitation to "the strong man armed," the Empire thus handicapped deserves no small commiseration. At any rate, it is the merest justice that these friends of every country but their own should be marked—with the traitor's mark—and known in their true colours by all to whom their native land is something more than a name. We fancy that ever since Empire Day, of this year of grace, the Rev. T. RHONDDA WILLIAMS has been duly listed among the enemies of the Empire. This well-known Congregationalist Minister, at present pastor of the Union Church, Brighton, achieved the rare distinction—we would probably be safe in saying the unique distinction—of delivering from his pulpit an anti-Imperial "Empire Day Sermon for Young People." Unfortunately, as is frequently the case with those who have set out on the blackguarding tack—whether the object of their vilifications be individuals or Empires—the calumniator produced such a medley of misleading and erroneous statements that his zeal in blackening the fair fame of his country clearly outran both his knowledge and his discretion. One of the statements made by this dangerous guide from the Celtic fringe was as follows:—

"In six years, between 1884 and 1890, when the Imperialistic spirit was very blatant, we acquired territories amounting to nearly three and three-quarter million square miles, and a population estimated at 57,000,000. I am tempted to give you the list. . . . In six years, then, remember, we added the following territories to the British Empire."

The list is as subjoined, with the addition of the actual dates on which the several possessions became incorporated in the British Empire, as given in the Colonial Office list:—

Name of Territory.	Date of Incorporation in British Empire.
British Guiana	1814
Kowloon (1st portion)	1861
Nigeria (2nd portion 1899)	1881
Somaliland (Protectorate)	1884
Bechuanaland (Protectorate)	1885-1891
Upper Burmah	1885
Zululand (Protectorate)	1887
Sarawak	1888
Pahang	1888
Rhodesia	1888-1898
Zanzibar (Protectorate)	1890
British Central Africa (Protectorate)	1891
British East Africa (Protectorate)	1894
Pondoland	1894
Uganda (Protectorate)	1894
(Ama) tongaland	1895
Kowloon (2nd portion)	1898
Soudan (administered by British Officials on behalf of Egyptian Government)	1898
Wei-hai-wei	1898
Transvaal	(granted Autonomy in 1907).
Orange River Colony
Ashantee	1901

The reverend gentleman, be it observed, takes no note of the fact that the period during which these twenty-one British territories over-sea were "annexed," in a "blatant spirit of aggrandisement," was a period in which the great Powers of Europe all took a share in the partition of Africa into spheres of influence. It was a period marked by the colonial expansion not only of Great Britain, but of Germany, France and the United States. However, the actual period of the incorporation of these twenty-one territories covers not six years only, but eighty-seven—namely, from 1814 to 1901; and furthermore, of these twenty-one territories, there were but seven that came completely, and two others partially, under the British Crown. No less than six of the nine, correctly given, happen to be in Africa.

"It is strange," remarks the correspondent of a service journal, "that a speaker of anti-Imperial bias, who could persuade himself ten years ago that the Boers' bold bid for empire and forcible seizure of British Colonies who had no quarrel with them, was somehow an aggressive attack by Britain on Boerdom, should state that the Transvaal and Orange River Colony were, as also the Sudan, annexed before 1890!" Of course, as every one knows, the Sudan was not annexed at all, but is administered by the British Government on behalf of the Egyptian Khedive. But this ecclesiastic's lapses from accuracy by no mean end here. After making the curious statements, characteristic of his class, that the Empire has increased in most cases by wrongful aggression; that it is useless; that "it makes neither you nor me a penny the richer"; that "the Colonies have no economic advantage for us whatever," Mr. WILLIAMS favours us with a definition of Imperialism as "an amalgam of frontier wars, spurious philanthropy, racial pride, and pretended trade relations." Such are the articles of faith which have obsessed of the minds the British people for the past thirty-five years!

Other fanciful statements propounded by this false preacher from his pulpit are that the administrators of the non-self-governing portions of the Empire are all "aristocrats who keep the Indian Civil Service as a lucrative field of employment for themselves"—a palpable absurdity in these days of open competitive examinations; that despite the 33⅓ per cent. preference given by the Dominion to British trade, Canada "in buying and selling never thinks she is British;" and, as a climax to his clap-trap, that "fifty Dreadnoughts will not enable us to sell as much as one penknife more." One begins to wonder, writes the correspondent whom we have already quoted, how much of the widespread British Empire the pious speaker has observed at first hand; whether he has "actually seen at his post, say, the Collector of an Indian rural district, the British Resident in a Malay State, an English Bimbashi in a Soudanese province, or one of the subaltern administrators of the Nigerian Hinterland, or of an outpost on the North-West frontier. These men, 'doing the King's work all the dim day long,' are bringing, without recourse to arms, order, peace, security of life and property, humane treatment, to the peoples they control, implanting in uncivilised minds faith in the justice of the British Government, trust in 'an Englishman's word,' belief in the unassailable incorruptibility of the servants of the British Crown." We strongly incline to the belief—and, indeed, it is the most charitable view to take—that the key to Mr. WILLIAMS' extraordinary representations is his own ignorance. He is clearly one of those "who only England know"; and we recommend him to extend his knowledge of the Empire—academically at all costs, practically, if possible—before he next undertakes the task for which he is at present utterly unfitted—that of preaching an "Empire Day Sermon for Young People."

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE JAPANESE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

Last month we epitomized from the pages of the July number of the To-A-no-Hikari part of an article on "The Future of Christianity," penned by Mr. Akashi Hantarō. Having commented on the insincerity of certain Christian pastors and the harm it does to the Christian cause, he proceeds to notice some fundamental changes in the views of enlightened Christian laymen as follows:—It used to be held by the leading Protestant sects as well as by the Roman Catholics that people had to go to church in order to be saved. But the educated Protestant laymen who heartily endorse this view to-day are hard to find (Gyōten no hoshi yori mo sukunai no de aru)*, though there are many who object to saying what they actually think on this subject. How long conservative thought will hold its own in certain churches it is hard to say. In a church like that at Fujimi-chō, Tōkyō, of which Mr. Uemura Masahisa is the pastor, there are many people past middle age who have had the old Calvinistic doctrines instilled into them. But it happens with many such Christians that when they come into contact with rationalistic thought they lose faith in religion altogether. Superstition dies hard, and when we see how prosperous a sect like the Tenri-kyō is to-day, we perceive that there are a good many Japanese whose credulity leads them to believe anything that is told them by their instructors.

It is much to be deplored, concludes Mr. Akashi, that in the minds of the people who belong to the outside world Christianity should always be associated with orthodox doctrines and condemned as quite irrational. Dr. Katō Hiroyuki's views on Christianity are quite behind the age. Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō has moved ahead, and he now sees that the conceptions of Christianity he had when he penned the famous attack on it many years ago were entirely wrong. He perceives that real Christianity is independent of orthodox teaching. It has of course been known in the West since the days of Lessing that St. Paul, pr. Augustine and Calvin all seriously misinterpreted the teaching of Christ. All the antagonism between science and Christianity that exists has its origin in the errors which have been propagated in Christ's name. To the actual teaching of Christ science never can be opposed. The Christianity of the future as far as Japan is concerned will certainly be that of the liberal section of the Christian Church. Nationalized Christianity will make converts more and more rapidly as time goes on.

* * *

The August Rikugō Zasshi contains several thoughtful articles dealing with fundamental questions connected with the nature and the development of Christianity. The first we propose to deal with here is from the pen of Mr. Yamaji Aizan, a prolific writer, entitled History or Doctrine? It is admitted on all sides, says Mr. Yamaji, that in past ages Christianity exercised enormous influence in the Western World. What was it that stirred men's minds? The doctrines taught by priests, or the Bible records that were regarded as historical? Undoubtedly the latter. To me it appears that the doctrinal part of the Bible, such, for instance, as the epistles of St. Paul, are far less interesting than the account of Christ's life and teaching given in the four Gospels. St. Paul's writings appear to us Japanese to be involved and hard to understand. And so they no doubt appeared to the majority of European readers in past ages. The heroic spirit of Europe in former times received its inspiration from two sources: one was Biblical history and the other Plutarch's "Lives of Greeks and Romans." In China the same thing has taken place. The Chinese have never been much interested in sacred writings that deal with abstract questions, theories and doctrines. But the heroic actions of their ancestors have always moved them. In this country we have the same feeling. Takeda Shingen confessed that reading the analects always made him feel drowsy. But he never wearied of reading tales concerning the brave exploits of Yoshitsune and other warriors. In this respect then there is no difference between East and West. The spirit of hero-worship pervades all minds. The actions of men and women are far more entertaining than the doctrines they may have taught. No sooner do our Chinese teachers begin to quote from the Classics than the pupils commence to yawn. It is the same at Sunday Schools when attempts are made to explain Christian doctrines. But tales concerning real life never fail to awaken interest. Teaching doctrines only has almost emptied some of the churches in this country. These doctrines are said to be beneficial to mankind and no charge is made for admittance to the churches where they are explained, and still the attendance is miserably poor in most cases. The people who assemble are told they must believe this and that and reject such and such doctrines as false, and so on. The whole thing has no interest for them. How is it that our Kōshakushi attract such large audiences? How is it that the theatres are so much frequented? In both cases actions form the principal themes of the speakers, and so people are ready to pay for the privilege of listening to them. It is then true to affirm that with the great majority of mankind history is preferred to doctrines, national annals to philosophy.

But there are people who will tell us that nourishing food is not always pleasant to the palate, that mental culture is not best promoted by feeding the mind only with that which entertains it; bitter pills are often more effective than sweet ones, and so on. This theory may apply to abnormal persons or in some exceptional cases, but it is true to affirm that with the majority of mankind palatability and power to nourish are closely connected with each other. The food that is taken with the most relish as a rule proves to be the most nutritious when mind and body are in a perfectly healthy condition.

Where Christ was accused of violating the sacredness of the sabbath day, he defended himself by saying that the sabbath was made for man. This gives us the secret of the superiority of human action to the theories, doctrines, rules and restrictions which have been drawn up for the purpose of controlling human conduct. The heroes of history invariably refused to submit to the control of the current doctrines of their times. They set these aside and went their own way. They made their own rules and laws and thus showed their superiority. Greater than laws are the law-makers. Higher far than the doctrines he teaches is the truly great man. Knowing Tokutomi the novelist (the younger brother of Shōhō) intimately, there is no need for me to read his books. Personality it is that attracts us, and so the Christ of the Gospels, the individuality of the maker of laws for mankind, is an infinitely more interesting study than St. Paul's disquisitions on Christian doctrine. Why we go to sleep while perusing the latter and read the former with pleasure is because one is only explaining laws while the other is revealing the personality of the lawgiver. (Waga hai wa shokan wo yomu to nan to naku nemuku naru to iu no wa, itsu wa hōritsu wo shimeshi, itsu wa rippōsha wo shimesu tame de arō to omou). The heroic actions of mankind need only to be related in order to elicit admiration. We are attracted by them quite involuntarily. Asked to say why we admire certain men and certain actions, we are often at a loss for a reply. We admire them because we admire them. They appeal to us in a far more powerful way than doctrinal disquisitions however learned can ever do.

From the Kaitakusha we have frequently epitomized Captain I. Okada's articles on the progress of Christian thought. Discerning readers have of course noted the fact that the Y. M. C. A. organ publishes articles that propound views which are mutually destructive. No adept at logic-chopping could ever reconcile the views championed by the conservative and progressive thinkers who furnish material for the Kaitakusha. Among the keen-witted, outspoken and logical writers whose essays we have studied Captain Okada merits special mention. He has the happy knack of probing subjects to their depths and he displays a very minute knowledge of recent criticism and advanced thought in Western countries. In the August Rikugō Zasshi Captain Okada essays the task of defining what can be accepted and what must be rejected in current religious thought. He first distinguishes between two fundamentally different views of religion. All are agreed that religion concerns the relation of God and man. According to those who believe that the Biblical Revelation is the only real Revelation that exists and that it ceased in the Apostolic age, the world and man were made by God and are governed by God and the Biblical Revelation is His method of making known his will to mankind. This theory makes God the standard (本位) of all things. A diametrically opposite view to this is that of those who believe that religion originated with man, whose conceptions of Deity developed from the crudities of barbaric ages till they reached the philosophic subtlety they now display. To these thinkers it appears that religion as it exists to-day is altogether a product of the human mind and represents natural aspirations only. One thing is quite certain; and that is that the ultra-conservative view that Christianity as it is known to us to-day came direct from Heaven utterly ignores certain historical facts. Christianity may be correctly traced to four different sources: (1) To Judaism and kindred faiths known to the Jews at the time of Christ; (2) to Greek philosophy as known to St. Paul and the early Christian fathers; (3) to the Roman political organization which furnished a model for the system of Church Government set up by the Papacy, and (4) to the sound morality which prevailed among the Teutonic tribes in the early Christian centuries. For some centuries the Roman Catholic Church was supreme. Politics, philosophy, science, literature and art were all under her control. But with the rise of Protestantism came a strong movement in favour of rendering the five above-named subjects quite independent of the Church, and this has been accomplished in all Protestant countries. Thus we see that religion has had to give way to outside pressure in a number of important particulars. But in the ranks of Protestantism inside the Church great changes have taken place in recent years. There are to-day Missionary Societies that publicly acknowledge the fact that the object of missionary work is no longer the saving of individual souls from the wrath to come, from eternal predation, but to teach morality, to raise the general standard of social life to a higher level, to encourage devotion to duty and to noble causes. Thus has the very motive for missionary work undergone a striking change (Ima ya senkyōshi nō tōkyōkusha sude ni dōki (motive) no henkwa wo kōgen (公言) shite, ima wa shu to shite kojō oyobi shakai no kōjō (向上) hatten wo kito shite oru.)

The situation in Japan is just this. The old enthusiasm for Christianity has gone. The Christian church has lost influence. Whether the setback will be permanent or only temporary remains to be seen, but in any case religion is lagging behind the age. (Izure ni shite mo, jisei ga saki ni susunde kyōsei ga okureta no de aru.) In Western lands, attacked by philosophers, attacked by scientists, attacked by learned critics, attacked by historians, Christianity has receded step by step from the position it occupied years ago, so that to-day even the orthodox party are no longer heard defending the infallibility of the Bible—to the Divinity of Christ and the doctrine of the atonement alone they still hold on. Christianity has now reached such a critical time that its survival depends on its ability to reconstruct itself. Its whole doctrinal system must be overhauled and what is no longer tenable must be expunged. In advocating selection I am advocating nothing new, for to a greater or less extent it has been going on for centuries, as the history of church doctrine plainly shows. The books of the Bible were selected, the articles of faith professed by each Christian sect were selected, and to-day hardly a Christian is to be found who attaches the same weight to every article of his Church's creed, proving that selection is going on in the minds of individual Christians all the time. Some articles of faith are quietly rejected or replaced by others of an entirely different kind. And the churches in propagating Christianity in foreign lands make selections from their creeds to suit the people they are trying to convert. The Athanasian creed in its entirety is not preached to South Sea islanders. In both America and England numerous articles and books are appearing which advocate a thorough adaptation of Christian doctrine to modern thought.

Only two courses are open to us. We must either adapt our religion to our intellectual environment or reject it altogether and try to get on without any religion at all; for the notion that we can evolve out of our new consciousness a new form of religion can not be accepted. History records endless examples of old faiths undergoing transformation. Such was the origin of Christianity itself and such was the origin of Buddhism. So there is nothing to be feared if reconstruction be carefully done.

In the opinion of Captain Okada modern thought demands that certain fundamental changes should be made in the Christian creed.

(1) The notion of a God existing outside the universe and man must be abandoned in favour of the pantheistic belief in Divine immanency. We can not but recognize, says Captain Okada, that the tendency of thought to-day is strongly in this direction (Harera wa tada ippun no keikō ga ichijirushiku nai zai-teki (内在的) naru Bonshin ron ni katamuki tsutsu aru koto wa mitomeneba naranu.)

(2) Modern thought has explained the word supernatural and the term Revelation in a new way. What is supernatural is not anti-natural. It is only something that is above our comprehension. It is nothing but the working of natural laws in ways that are unfamiliar to us. As science advances, what formerly seemed supernatural is shown to be quite natural; and what was declared miraculous comes to be regarded as quite ordinary. Revelation is now explained as including all that is discoverable by man's reason and nothing more, according to Kant's words. The old meanings attached to the terms supernatural and Revelation have been abandoned.

(3) The doctrine of the fall of man and original sin must be abandoned and along with it the doctrine of the atonement, for which it forms a basis. The notion that man has fallen from a high estate is quite wrong. He has risen from a low one. This error has been the source of many false doctrines. It has done much towards enervating Christian morality, which is denounced by Nietzsche as slavery and which has aroused tremendous opposition in other quarters.

(4) Discussion over Christianity still goes on, but many of the old points of controversy have lost their significance. If God be regarded as dwelling in us, what is human and what is divine are indistinguishable. The Trinitarian controversy has no longer any interest for us to-day. It is so with the doctrine concerning the alleged Divinity of Christ. The attribution of Divinity to Christ came from the belief that among supermen he was the greatest. Though the question of what the historical Christ was like is an important one, we are more concerned with the ideal Christ, whose existence nobody doubts, and whose evolution has stretched itself out over many centuries and is still incomplete.

(4) A great fight is going on both among Protestants and Roman Catholics as to the authority which churches have a right to claim. Wholesale secession, it is considered, can only be stopped by a relaxation of the rules that have hitherto been in force and by the abandonment of all doctrinal tests whatever, for the age is intensely anti-dogmatic. Schemes are on foot for the abolition of confessions of faith and for a union of good men and good women based on the possession of common noble aspirations, ardent devotion to the cause of humanity and the spirit of self-sacrifice and self-denial for the sake of others. The age is moving onward and we must move with it or be left behind.

The Seikyō Shimpō (Greek Church) in an article entitled, Conference Resolutions and their Observance in Practice, says that Greek Church priests in Japan are very remiss in insisting on a strict observance of the Resolutions passed at Annual Conferences among provincial converts. We are told that seven years ago a Resolution was unanimously passed to the effect that each convert should subscribe one yen per month towards a capital fund and that the amount thus collected should be sent to Tōkyō. But judging from the amount of money sent it is evident that the Resolution has been ignored by those who helped to pass it and by the laity generally. It would seem as though the Resolution of 1903 had been quite forgotten by many of our priests, as at last year's Conference another Resolution was passed bearing on the creation of a capital fund which provided that "Every Christian house, or every convert should subscribe over 3 sen a month towards a capital fund." On this occasion no reference was made to the 1903 Resolution. It should have been either annulled or amended, but it seems to have been entirely forgotten. There is no guarantee that the new Resolution will be observed by our Churches better than that of 1903. The passing of Resolutions becomes a mere farce if at our Conferences no notice is taken of their non-observance. There are Resolutions which were passed at last year's Conference which might as well never have been drawn up, as no attempt has been made to carry them into effect. At this year's Conference steps should be taken to remedy this defect, which threatens to rob our Conferences of the authority they ought to wield.

The Seikyō Shimpō of August 1st contains an article on "The Demand for School Graduates" which shows by statistics that numbers of graduates of the Tōkyō Imperial University and private Universities have to remain idle several years before obtaining employment. These are mostly Law or Literature students. Those who obtain employment after graduating in Law often have to begin with a salary of 20 or 30 yen a month only. But engineers get from 40 to 70 yen a month, whilst doctors begin with from 100 to 300 yen a month. The table of statistics given originally appeared in the Tōkyō Asahi Shimbun. It deals with the graduates of 12 universities and high schools. The literary graduates of the Waseda University last year were 78 in number. Only 26 of these have found employment as teachers or journalists at salaries of about 30 yen a month. The comment made by Mr. Shirako, the writer in the Seikyō Shimpō, is that if the object of high class education be money-making, then it only pays in the case of medicine, engineering and applied sciences generally. A University degree is not in itself a sufficient recommendation for anybody in Japan to-day in the eyes of business men.

Mr. Murai Chishitsu, writing in the August Michi on "The Standard of our Party," specifies five particulars in which in his opinion the recently formed Nihon Kyōkai differs from other Christian bodies. There are five things in which we glory, says Mr. Murai, and these are (1) Our faithfulness to truth; (2) our broad-mindedness; (3) the spirit of independence which actuates us; (4) our great activity, and (5) our high aspirations. Commenting on these, he says:—Faithfulness to truth is something that many profess but few practice. Faithfulness to truth has made us reject the supernaturalism proclaimed by the missionaries who brought Christianity to this country. Christ's alleged miraculous birth, the divine authority attributed to the Bible, the teaching of St. Paul on the atonement, along with the members of other Japanese churches, we no longer believe. (Waga kuni Kirisutokyōkai no shikisha to shō subeki hitobito mo, mata korera no ten ni oite gojin to selsu wo onajū shite oru no de aru.) The difference between us and many other Protestant Christians is just this: while we proclaim openly what we believe, they have not the courage to do so. They lack sincerity and can not escape from the charge of cowardice. For our outspokenness we are hated and maligned both by Japanese Christians and by certain of the missionaries. By the attitude we have taken we have not only brought pecuniary loss on ourselves, but we have alienated the sympathy of many of our fellow-Christians, but the course we are following is a far nobler one than that taken by our opponents. (2) The four articles of our faith are so simple and so general that few people could object to them—belief in God, self-culture, love of our neighbours and belief in immortality, beyond this we do not go. We do not regard connection with any church as necessary to entitle anyone to enjoy our fellowship. (3) We are so independent that we refuse to bow to Church authority of any kind. To reason alone do we submit. Theodore Parker once astonished a Boston audience by reading a quotation from Marcus Aurelius instead of from the Bible, thereby showing that the utterances of this great moralist were regarded by the preacher as on a level with the words found in the Bible. This is our opinion too, and when preaching we follow Parker's example and often take as texts the sayings of Confucius, Mencius or other Chinese sages. In the matter of rites and ceremonies we are quite free. We regard neither baptism nor the Lord's Supper as of any importance, nor do we consider Sunday to be more sacred than any other day (Bansanrei no gotoki wa mureo hai shi-sari, senrei no shiki mo, ansokunichi no seido mo, hai shi shita no de aru). We Japanese are not impressed by the baptismal service, nor does the practice of declaring one day to be more sacred than another appear to be anything but objectionable. All times are alike to the truly virtuous. We don't observe Sunday at all. Our weekly gatherings may be held on that day or on any other to suit the convenience of the congregation. (4) Our Party places vitality before all else in religion. The lifeless formalism so common among church-goers, the retiring spirit and separation from the world so much cultivated by many Christians we avoid. We are no worshippers of the Church after the manner of some Christians, who seem to think that nobody can have spiritual vitality unless by the use of this one channel. We obtain our life direct from God. And the life we possess is more manifest to men of the world than to members of Churches.

(5) Small as is our sect, insignificant as are the numbers that belong to it, we aspire to give the nation a form of religion that it can accept—a thing which no existing Christian Sect has been able to do. The beginnings of all great movements have been small. Strong ambition, noble aspirations, accompanied by ardent devotion are in the end sure to be crowned with success. So we are full of hope for the future.

Advanced thinkers among the Congregationalists in this country naturally take the deepest interest in the big fight that is taking place in England between Dr. Forsythe, the leader of the conservatives, and Dr. Campbell, the leader of the Christian freethinkers. On the ground that the issues in England and the issues in Japan are one and the same, we produce from the pages of the Kirisutokyō Sekai a short account of the controversy over fundamental principles and essential religious elements which is still raging in England. It would be a mistake to suppose, says the Kirisutokyō Sekai, that the English Congregationalists as a body are about to split into sections and either follow Dr. Forsythe or Dr. Campbell. A very large number of Congregationalists agree with neither of these Divines, regarding one of them as too conservative and the other as too liberal. The English mind is opposed to extremes, and in theology as in other things naturally seeks for a via media. So it is pretty certain that the main body of the Congregationalists will keep aloof from both the factions which are in process of formation. It is a fact worth noting that the Christian World is pronouncedly on the side of Dr. Forsythe and treats Dr. Campbell and his arguments with manifest unfairness. The paper is evidently being run in the interests of conservative Congregationalists. England is a very conservative country and there seems to be little doubt that the mass of the congregationalists sympathize more with Dr. Forsythe's views than with those of Dr. Campbell. Liberal thought has a hard battle to fight in every country and every age. (Shimpo shisō no yo ni irezaru, izure no jidai, izure no hōdo wo towarazu omune kaku no gotoshi). The English Congregationalists are to be congratulated on the production of such a truly great man as Dr. Campbell; for it looks as if he were about to save religion from the obloquy which in recent years it has encountered. But the leader of the conservatives has tried his utmost to induce the Congregational Union to expel Dr. Campbell from the Sect. After a series of meetings and much correspondence between the parties, it was decided at a big meeting of Congregationalists held last May that according to their rules of Association each minister is at liberty to hold and to preach what views he pleases and that no Congregational Body exists which has the power to eject a minister from the Sect. He may be asked to leave, but he has the power to refuse. The Chairman of the big meeting held on May 9th reproved Dr. Forsythe and other conservatives for the violent language they used in attacking Dr. Campbell and complimented the latter on the temperateness of his speech. The whole commotion is of course much regretted by the majority of the Congregationalists, who prefer to jog along in the old sleepy fashion without calling into question the foundations of their faith. Dr. Campbell came out of the controversy stronger than when he went into it. His self-control, logicalness, sincerity and earnestness impressed many of his hearers. Dr. Forsythe's attempt to introduce Papal methods among the Congregationalists has exposed him to much ridicule. The points at issue between the two champions concern Christians the world over, and hence the future action of both leaders will be watched with considerable interest by Japanese theologians. We certainly have something to learn from the impartial attitude shown by the English Congregational body to the various controversialists, concludes the Kirisutokyō Sekai. The Union decided not to follow either disputant implicitly, thus leaving everybody free to formulate his own creed.

KARUIZAWA NOTES.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Karuizawa, September 7.

This week sees most of the summer residents of Karuizawa getting back to their respective occupations. The important question for some weeks has been how to get back to one's place of former abode. Most people thought for a while that there was nothing for it but to leave the household in Karuizawa until the railway lines were again open, and to strike for home alone; but this week has seen a rapid and remarkable improvement in railway communication. For some days the authorities have been selling tickets to Tokyo by way of Takasaki, and sending baggage on the same tickets round by way of Matsumoto and Kofu, which was a great improvement on the weeks previous when no luggage of any account was accepted, and every passenger had himself to look after what hand-baggage he ventured to take with him aboard the various trains passing between the broken sections. Now this is all changed, however, and one can buy a ticket and check baggage from Karuizawa to Ueno station, having the baggage go through on the same train, though it is said the agents will not receive large pieces of baggage, as all luggage has to be carried by hand, over the few breaks in the line that still remain. The chief of these interruptions is in the tunnels between Yokogawa and Karuizawa, where the high bridges have been badly washed out and some enormous landslides have blocked the track. At any rate we are now beyond the period of complaint, and must, on our honour, give the Railway Department all praise for the various courtesies its agents have extended to unfortunate travellers in trying circumstances. It may be said that this year will see a larger number of families remaining up for the month of September, than in previous years. A good many people, especially those with a considerable number of children, feel that the floods have so greatly and inconveniently broken into the summer's rest that the only way to get the full benefit for which they came so far, is to stay through the beautiful clear days of September. Some of the visitors from China had just arrived in the village when the rain descended and the flood came and beat upon them, driving them out.

We have been having two bishops with us for some days, Bishop Maloney of China, and Bishop Cecil of Tokyo. Bishop Maloney preached in the English Church last Sunday, and Bishop Cecil addressed the children in a very unique and interesting manner, giving an object lesson with a broken wine-glass, that could not stand alone, illustrating the text, "Hold Thou me up and I shall be safe." In the Auditorium Dr. White, an American visitor, has been giving lectures on the Bible, which appear to have been appreciated by a large number of people. Needless to say the lecturer did not pretend to give anything new on so old a theme, but he gave some new ways of looking at old questions, and showed that, as reason and knowledge develop, or are kept from retrograding, the truth represented by the Book of Books will grow to be ever more appreciated by the best minds and the most useful people.

There has been quite a stampede for real estate on the hills since the floods. Evidently a good many have finally been convinced that risking the cheaper lots on the plains is not what it is cracked up to be. The residents of the North, however, do not absolutely welcome the rush in their direction. Those who had the foresight, in the days when land was less than it is now, to buy lots large enough to permit them to be their own neighbours, are now congratulating themselves on their good fortune; but this is the lot of few. One gentleman, of an exclusive turn of mind, thought he was quite safe from invasion by setting his house on a hill in manner that could not be hid. There from night to night and day to day he blew his bugle to the hills, and the hills answered, echoes dying, dying, dying; but now even he is no longer to be immune from the madding crowd, and next year will see new building after building rise about him, though for some time he will doubtless be able to lock down upon them all. At the foot of Atago Yama several lots have been purchased, and already the ground there is being cleared for the erection of the new houses to be occupied next year. On the whole it may be said that prices for lots are going up apace since the flood; which seems so different from the days of Noah. Land in Karuizawa that a short time ago was selling for 7 sen a tsubo is now bringing from 20 to 30; and some that was bought at 7 can be sold for yen 1.25.

The floods this year have so largely taken the place of athletics that not so much has been done in this line as formerly, but nevertheless the Association has not been wholly inactive. After the tennis grounds were hopelessly destroyed by the inundation, the Committee at once set to work and had four good courts made alongside the base ball ground; but interest in tennis seemed to languish after the regular annual tournament had to be abandoned. This defect was quite compensated for by the additional interest displayed in base ball. The "Tokyo Americans" played several matches, notably those with Nozawa School and with Waseda University, in which they came off victors. Of course, as most of those young fellows are, or have been, crack players in the teams of their respective universities at home, it would take an uncommon team in this country to match them. The Japanese teams, however, put up an excellent showing, the superiority of the foreigners being seen chiefly in the length of their legs and the shrewd use made of this advantage. A regrettable accident befell one of our best baseballers on Saturday morning last in the game with Waseda, when Mr. Coleman had an ankle broken and will be laid up for some time. In the athletic tournament Mr. Coleman took most of the laurels for such feats as high and broad jumping, and he is regarded as one of our best all round athletes. Mr. Coleman is a teacher at the Keiogijuku and a member of the Friends' Mission.

Now that the season is over and the exodus homeward has set in, we are glad to say that the chief complaints against Karuizawa have been made by the doctors, for the summer has seen very few cases of serious illness and but one death that of Mrs. Hawthorne, who, we understand, was in a delicate condition of health before coming to Karuizawa. There must have been over 1,000 foreigners sojourning here during the summer; and most of them admit that, after trying various places for recuperation, Karuizawa is about as satisfactory a place as they have visited. It is wet at times, but is always cooler than elsewhere, while the surrounding country furnishes a new walk or excursion for every day of one's stay in the hills, with about the finest scenery that a lover of nature could wish. The only danger about Karuizawa is that prices and cost of living generally are showing a tendency to go up, and if the village gets the name of a fashionable summering place for people of means, it will get beyond the pockets of most of those now coming here, and they will be obliged to seek pastures new for the hot season. For a time it was thought that Gotemba and the new watering place near Sendai would attract quite a number from Karuizawa, but this place has more than held its own, while the resorts named have not increased as anticipated. Nevertheless if cost of living and rents continue to rise, as they have been doing for the last three years, the place will undoubtedly cease to hold its attraction. Of course the cost of living to foreigners is going up all over Japan, and Karuizawa must expect to show a similar tendency; but it ought not to be so much as it threatens to become.

The railway authorities are to be complimented on the finely appointed new station built at Karuizawa during the summer. When visitors began to arrive it was in a shocking state of unpreparedness, but it was got into order with an expedition that greatly surprised those who complained of its condition. The next thing wanted is a new post office, with prompt delivery of telegrams; for it is not altogether pleasant for an old and well known resident to be awakened at 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning to receive a telegram that had arrived in Karuizawa at 7 o'clock in the evening; that is, five hours to find a person well known to the post office, and about five minutes walk from its doors. Possibly the difficulty lies in the employing of young boys as telegraph messengers, who have no idea of responsibility, and to whom the time of delivery makes no difference. These criticisms are in no way a reflection on the postmaster here, who is always courteous and obliging, and is as efficient an official as is to be found in any of the post-offices in Japan that we have used. Karuizawa is also in need of a good notion shop that keeps such things as stationery, pens, and pencils at reasonable prices. It is not a bit of use bringing up expensive foreign stationery at fancy prices when just as useful can be had in Tokyo for half the money. No one wants to pay, say 75 or 80 sen for a hundred envelopes that are being made in Japan in just as good a quality of paper and sold by Japanese shops in Tokyo for from 35 to 45 sen a hundred. By all means let those who want the fancy foreign styles have them and pay for them, but why not have the domestic-made article also for those who want it? Unless this is done most people will bring their stationery with them, and such goods will be at a still greater discount in Karuizawa. Here is a chance for some enterprising Japanese stationer from Tokyo or Yokohama for next year.

SEMPER IDEM.

A LETTER FOR LADIES.

London, August, 1910.

The vogue for the uncomfortable and unbecoming narrow skirt is still at its height in London, although in Paris, and indeed, all over the continent, there are signs and portents of its decay. Upon any fine morning in London now the narrow skirted ladies may be seen. Tall or short, stout, or slender (for in England, this fashion like many other fashions is adopted quite regardless of the suitability of personal attributes), they take their painful, mincing way along Oxford Street, Bond Street and Regent Street pavements. Was there ever a garment invented so unpractical, so ugly, so lacking in dignity? Indeed it is to be hoped not. The broad hat, the closely fitting bodice, the short and skimpy skirt, these things may not utterly destroy the slender and graceful attractions of fresh youth, but women past their twenties should harden their hearts and summon strength of mind enough to put them aside. A person of mature charms, say somebody's delightful aunt or much respected mother, is a pitiful sight banded in about the knees, villainously curtailed in the matter of petticoats, with the too conspicuous open work stockings and patent leather shoes which are de ugeur with the fashionable skirt.

A considerable amount of amusement was caused the other day by a small incident in Oxford street. A very fashionably attired young lady was walking along that thoroughfare, from Oxford Circus in the direction of the Marble Arch. Having arrived about the neighbourhood of Selfridge's Emporium the lady had occasion to cross the street. Now, as all the world knows, unfortunate Londoners have been suffering martyrdom from the abominably wet weather. Indeed, it was raining slightly at the moment when the fashionable young lady wished to cross the street, and she held an umbrella carefully over her fashionable attire. Beside the curb there flowed a narrow stream of muddy water. The lady gauged the stream with her eye, she stood upon the pavement's brink and stretched forth a foot as far as it would go. Alack, it would not go far enough, she wore the skirt of the moment. At length she made her decision, shut her umbrella and put it under her arm, put her feet together and jumped the stream. The handful of idlers who had watched these evolutions, loudly cheered the lady's success and she went on her way triumphant. Less fortunate was the votary of fashion, who on leaving her dressmaker, failed in the attempt to step into her motor, lost her balance and rolled in the mud. From this melancholy position, she was unable to extricate herself, (for she wore the fashionable skirt) and she had to be picked up and set upon her feet like a three year old child.

The narrow skirt of to day, says Femina the French Ladies journal, is a revival of a fashion which flourished under the Directorate. Upon the 18th of July 1797, Esseid Ali was solemnly received in Paris by the Directorate. The Journal des Dames then announced that by way of graceful compliment, the fair ones of France would follow the fashions of the fair ones of Turkey. Women would abandon greek costume which they had affected, and adopt the attires of "odalisques and sultanas." No sooner said than done. Ladies "en odalisque" peopled the Faubourg Saint. Germain and at a great dinner given by Citizen Talleyrand Mademoiselle Tallien appeared à la Turque, apparently, turban and all. Now London ladies imitate Mademoiselle Tallien's imitation, nor is the turban wanting. It appears in the evening coiffure, and often by day the broad flat hat is replaced by a toque of oriental colour folded like a turban and decorated with an aigrette.

However, it is announced with authority that we are presently to see a change. It is said that rather wide skirts are being made in the Parisian ateliers and are presently to be launched. Evening dresses are to be of the ample and flowing order, and several tailor-made costumes have even now appeared with the startling innovation of a slight train.

In spite of every prediction to the contrary the blouse is with us still. Indeed though its aspect is somewhat changed, it has never been more popular than it is at this moment. Nor is it likely so useful and practical an article of attire will ever disappear from the feminine wardrobe. During the spring and summer, the Maygar or Roumanian seamless blouse has carried all before it. Various modifications of it are still in high favour. The prettiest of these modifications is perhaps the sleeveless Maygar, which is to be worn over a light summer dress, and forms a little wrap very acceptable in this summer of chill damp days. Carried out in white cashmere or heavy silk with clever touches of black it is delightfully simple and smart. There have been numerous blouses made in paisly pattern materials, these, as well as the blouses with bright chinz designs, are charming when lightly veiled with chiffon of the same shade as the suit with which the blouse is to be worn. The chiffon veiling does away most successfully with hardness of outline or crudeness of colouring. Fine white lingerie blouses are correct with morning and strictly tailor made suits, but for smart occasions the blouse waist positively matches the rest of the costume in colour, though a lighter or even a darker shade of that colour may be chosen according to the fancy of the wearer. The little embroidered Peter Pan collar divides the honours with the pitted all round collar of fine lawn; sleeves are to the elbow, or of three quarter length, often turned back with embroidered or pitted lawn cuffs.

Coloured foot gear has enjoyed an immense vogue, but its charm has palled at last upon the lady of fashion. Last summer red, green, mauve, tan and grey shoes were ubiquitous; now taste inclines to black with grey suede uppers, or little American pumps decorated with a simple jet buckle. With lingerie frocks black patent leather or black suede is worn in preference to white, whilst there is a growing fancy for the old fashioned black velvet slipper, which has been seen even in the streets, with a gilded or scarlet heel, presenting a pretty, but rather extravagant effect. By the way, there is a rage for black velvet. It enters largely into the composition of the ariest white muslin frocks and summer hats. A hat which had great success had its entire crown fashioned of black velvet, its brim was of white lace, and there was no trimming.

Hats are either very large or very small. Where young girls are concerned, nothing is prettier or more fashionable than the "Charlotte" or "mob" of lace or muslin simply trimmed with a band and knot of bright chiné ribbon, through the new wreathed hats run them close. These are very broad and straight in the brim and have their crowns wreathed with large flowers such as lilies, poppies, cornflowers, roses and dahlias fashioned in delicate coloured muslin. The hats themselves are of black or very dark straw by way of contrast but are lined with muslin to match the flowers.

Some curious little toques and turbans are to be seen at the French watering places. They are excessively diminutive, and pulled well down over the brow. They can scarcely be called becoming, though doubtless they have advantages on windy or dusty days. One shape resembles a tiny busby, another a Minerva's helmet, while there seems to be an extraordinary fancy for wearing white woollen St. Moritz caps with depending motor veils. St. Moritz caps are very well in their place and season but they are highly unsuitable for a sunny, sandy beach on an August day. The wearing of them expresses a quality strongly developed in womankind who do things, without rhyme or reason, simply and solely to be in the fashion.

Psychologically, it is a very curious thing, this mania for imitation, not so much in the matter of mere clothes, where, of course, the influence of manufacturer's tailors and dressmakers counts for a great deal, but in other every day departments of life. In the middle ages certain towns, in Holland and Belgium more especially, were visited by the dancing mania or epidemic, one or two people began to dance; others joined them, soon there were crowds of people, whole populations of towns dancing together, and they danced till they fell down exhausted. People left their business and their pleasure and rushed forth to dance. They could not help it, their desire was overwhelming. It was an extraordinary phenomenon, but surely no more extraordinary than the bridge mania that beset London a few years ago, or the more recent infliction of jigsaws, and at this moment, what but a monstrous sort of fashion binds together nine tenths of the suffragettes who prate and process and parade the London Streets.

More pitiful, and more dangerous still, is the prevailing fashion for "nerves," "break-downs," "depressions," all sorts of hysterical and neurotic affections. Of course the causes of neurasthenia are not one, but many, and amongst them must be counted tremendous strain on mind and body exacted by the swift moving complexity of our latter day civilization. Still, it cannot be denied that fashion (in the largest sense of the word), has something to do with it, it is "the thing" to be highly strung, and alas the neurotic condition is the most easily communicated disease in the world. Thus the number of persons who cannot eat, cannot sleep, cannot work, cannot be crossed, cannot be bored, cannot bear the slightest disagreeable sound, daily increase, and so do the number of "cures" which they adopt. Oh these "cures,"—their name is very legion. There is the "rest cure" and the "fasting cure" the "orange cure" and the apple cure, the "carrot cure" and the "onion cure," the "minced meat cure," and the "sour milk cure," the "all vegetable cure" and the "no vegetable cure."

These crazes are dependant upon a curious quality inherent in mankind which quality is attracting great attention at the present time from all sorts of people. The quality is called suggestibility and the thing itself is, of course, as old as the hills and its presence has always been tacitly recognized. The training and upbringing of children depends upon their suggestibility, as every parent and guardian knows. If you say "Billy, go and wash your face," the chances are that he does so directly. Now, why does he? Because he considers it a desirable course of action? Probably not at all, but merely because of the quality of suggestibility implanted in him. Again, why is advertisement of commodities so universally practised? A moment's thought will show that the advertiser appeals, and appeals with extraordinary success, to this same quality of suggestibility, as revealed in children of a larger growth "Buy Pears Soap" says the advertiser, and the world obeys.

Now Medicine has begun to realize the importance and the significance of this quality. Doctors have discovered in the power of suggestion a weapon ready to their hands. They use it, combined with hypnotism, or simply as assurance, or tactful persuasion and they say it has worked wonders in cases of nervous or functional disease.

The latest proposal in this line is an institution or "home" for hysterical or neurotic young women. The patients are to be cut off from all communication with their friends, and they are to be employed in doing the entire housework of the establishment. The scheme is simple, yet masterly. Probably every one will agree that "no bed to sleep in unless you make it," and "no dinner to eat unless you cook it," are very suggestive thoughts indeed.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

The brigade manoeuvres at Krasnoe Selo opened a couple of days ago with an attack of 8 battalions with 25 guns and two squadrons of cavalry on a force similarly composed with the addition of a battery of horse artillery, the latter force having to defend Peterhof from the hostile raid. At ten in the morning the Emperor appeared on the scene and operations were stopped at one o'clock, apparently without the affair having been brought to any definite conclusion. The weather, which has been of the drizzling order recently, was unfavourable from the spectacular point of view. A military banquet presided over by the Emperor and a gala performance at the Krasnoe Selo theatre concluded this stage of the annual manoeuvres.

Lord Roberts, Sir Ian Hamilton and other members of the special Embassy to announce the accession of King George V. arrive to-morrow by the Nord Express. Apartments are already prepared during their stay in the Winter Palace, but I hear that the distinguished soldier will probably pass most of his time at Peterhof and Krasnoe Selo. Carriages from the Imperial stables, with coachmen and lackeys in the striking scarlet cloaks, edged with embroidery in gold bearing the Russian eagle in black, will convey the guests from the railway station. As to-morrow is a holiday in Russia many British residents intend to take the opportunity of seeing "Bobs" on his arrival.

Replying to an article on the "Question of Manchuria" in the London Times, the Rossia remarks that it is useless for this paper to assume the role of defender of supposed British industrial and commercial interests attacked by the recent Russo-Japanese agreement and in particular by the stopping of the Khin-Chow-Aigun railway scheme. Any apprehensions such as those on which this article is based are unfounded. "We admit foreigners" says the "Rossia" "to the settlements in the zone of the Chinese Eastern Railway and give them the same rights as the Russian population. In our tariff policy we make no difference whatever between Russian and foreign consignors. English firms exporting Chinese beans from Manchuria freely utilise our railway without any hindrance. In a word we continue to keep to that path which has given foreign trade in Manchuria such opportunities for development since before the war with Japan. It must not be forgotten that this progress in trade was only made possible by our railway, without which northern Manchuria would have continued for trade purposes a desert land to this day. Neither before the war nor after it have we done anything in any way contrary to the principles of equal opportunity and the open door."

A sixteenth century MSS. Gospel in Russian has been discovered in the library of a prison in the Province of Orel, a find of extreme rarity, the text of the Gospel dating before the reforms of the Patriarch Nikon. How such a priceless MSS. got into a prison library remains a mystery.

The St. Petersburg University has just received a copy of the magnificent publication "Arms & Armour at Sandringham" prepared by order of King Edward VII. and promised, among other public institutions, to the University here.

An attempt is to be made this Autumn to place upon the London market consignments of fresh fruits from the Caucasus and Central Asia. All manner of fruits grow wild or with the slightest cultivation in such luxuriance and of such quality as to warrant a belief that the Garden of London must have been located hereabouts. The French candied fruit industry has been supplied for some years already by large consignments direct to Marseilles from these natural fruit gardens of Russia. Strange to say, owing to poor facilities for traffic by rail in Russia this cheap fruit supply is not largely drawn upon by St. Petersburg and Moscow.

The sentences passed upon twenty persons accused of attempting to start in 1905 the "New Russian Republic" in the Caucasus have been reduced by Imperial clemency by one-half in celebration of the birthday of the Czarevich.

A shocking outrage is reported from Elizavetpol. A merchant with his wife and three children, the eldest only ten years of age, travelling to their country place in a carriage were stopped by three armed Tartars on the highroad, who demanded money. Purses and valuables were flung to the robbers, who then demanded all firearms. When these had been surrendered the adults were ordered to alight, were driven off into the forest adjoining, the carriage being dragged painfully after them. Here before the eyes of their children the man and his wife were put to death and the carriage, with the children still in it, sent with a pair of panic-stricken horses flying whither fate might lead it. The horses eventually brought the children back safe to their home in the town, but for a long time nothing could be learned from the terrified little things, and no captures have been made.

Cholera is now making its appearance with increasing frequency at the summer resorts of fashion near the capital, and appears to have spread all over the central district of the St. Petersburg Province. The Prefect has ordered the closing of all Government Drink Monopoly shops from early evening before a holiday until the morning after the holiday, Sundays included. As Russia is just entering upon one of its periods of fasting it is feared that the consumption of fish that has been in contact with Neva water will only further intensify the epidemic. Meantime the figures continue, since the new method of reckoning has been produced, to show a slight decrease of cases and deaths in the city. A Saratov paper tells a story which shows how easily the ignorant peasantry come to believe that it is the doctors who are "sowing cholera" broadcast for their own benefit. In a remote village died a man from "suspected cholera." The rules forbid declaring cholera until the fact has been proved by bacteriological analysis, whereby time is gained and the authorities are protected against scarce rumours based upon mere ocular evidence! The local "medical orderly" (a class usually recruited from old soldiers who have done duty in military hospitals and have no qualification) put a sample of the excreta in a glass jar and sent it off to the nearest town for analysis, as prescribed by regulation, telling the muzhik carter to be careful and not break it as it contained "cholera excreta." The muzhik deputed the conveyance to his son, a boy of fourteen, who fell asleep on the road, the cart got badly jolted as the horse sought to pasture on the way, and the precious jar was smashed. On awaking the boy rushed wildly to the nearest hamlet and raised an alarm that he had been given "a bottle of cholera to take to town and it had got broken and the demon would soon be upon the hamlet!" To him cholera was just the evil genie imprisoned by a doctor in a bottle. The liberal organs demand more education on the ground that this, and every other epidemic, only proves the inability of any government to care for the welfare of a people steeped in ignorance. The Government organs reply that it would be well if the people of Russia would learn to look after themselves a little, as do the peoples of other countries, and complain of the unfairness of abusing the Government and its servants instead of seeking an opportunity to lend a hand in the work needed for the general welfare in many other matters than merely cholera. There is plenty of truth on both sides: the Russian people are woefully ignorant, and cholera, like other dread diseases, thrives as much on ignorance as on anything else. At the same time ignorance cannot be removed in a day or a year, when it is a question of not far short of two hundreds millions of people; whereas active work for the public good may be begun any day by persons sincerely wishing to forward the public good without any intermixture of party politics. But is always much easier at a fire—and an epidemic such as that which is raging in Russia resembles a conflagration in many respects—to shout than to pump, and everybody who never did anything knows precisely how everything ought to be done.

Yet another quarrel is on foot arising out of the defence of Port Arthur, which it is time to forget altogether. General Fock has published a pamphlet in which he attacks a brother general, a professor of the Military Academy, who has appealed to the authorities to give him justice. Apparently the experience which the authorities had some years ago in the duel between Generals Fock and another hero of Port Arthur has discouraged the idea of a duel between military men of such high rank. The opponents, obviously either by agreement or under instructions, aimed persistently at a "safe and certain place," and being both good shots at length after a sevenfold exchange of bullets one lodged in the required spot, to the amusement of everybody outside military circles.

The return from leave of the United States Ambassador, Mr. Rockhill, has been very quickly marked by a change in tone of the press towards America, which unmistakably indicates that the Ambassador has returned with a palm-branch in hand instead of the more substantial weapon that has been flourished of late days in certain American papers. The Novoe Vremia welcomes the change of tone, and indeed remarks that the best American papers were even beforehand with avowed friends of Russian in recognising the true meaning of the recent Russo-Japanese Agreement.

It is convinced that America has now discovered her mistake in the Far East. She stopped the war at a moment when Russian hopes of eventual success were at their highest: she thus exchanged Russia for Japan as a rival in Far Eastern commerce, and the returns published of imports into Manchuria plainly show how great has been the loss of the United States in this exchange. "It is difficult to understand on a cool consideration of all the facts, why America should ever have sought to injure Russia. Apparently a more sober view is now prevailing at any rate the Russo Japanese Agreement had robbed international adventurers of the possibility of building their plans of self-aggrandizement upon the mutual hostility of Russia and Japan. We remain perfectly content with the situation created by this agreement and shall not depart from it so long as it is honourably observed by the other party."

Sir Arthur Nicolson left to-day by the Nord Express for London. The send-off at the St. Petersburg Railway Station was distinguished by an unusually large gathering of the diplomatic corps present in St. Petersburg, and of Russian Ministers and officials, the Emperor specially sending a personal representative to wish the most popular British Ambassador good-bye and God-speed to his new and onerous post as Permanent Head of the Foreign Office.

The British Community of St. Petersburg took leave of Sir Arthur Nicolson last night at a farewell dinner which was attended by 130 members of the community, including the staff of the Embassy, the Consul and vice-Consul, and our Consuls from Riga and Helsingfors. The company was a most representative one of the British Colony of St. Petersburg, including members of the English Club, and of the various sporting clubs, football, tennis, etc., all of which have owed so much to the friendly sympathy always shown to their work by the Ambassador. After the usual toasts a speech by Mr. Ebsworth, which was only the more telling from being couched in familiar conversational forms of expression without the slightest seeking after effect, introduced the presentation of an address of farewell signed by over two hundred members of the British Community and a silver gilt enamelled "kovshik," or drinking bowl, of the familiar quaint shape of these ancient Russian vessels, with the head of a horse at one end and the tail of a bird, both fanciful, at the other, and over a foot in length and half that deep. The references to the warm personal interest taken by Lady Nicolson in the welfare of the community called forth a cheer as hearty and prolonged, as that which followed the drinking of the toast with all the usual honours, enthusiastically given. His Excellency, in a reply marked throughout by that unstudied eloquence which, as it never comes from the head, strikes to the hearts of all hearers, spoke feelingly of the affection for Russia and the Russians which his four years' stay here has nourished, and the deep regret he felt that it had been ordained for him to leave, thus closing down one of the later pages of his official life upon which he would always look back regretfully as too short for all he would have liked to do. In his new post, happily, he would be constantly brought into contact with Russia and his friends in Russia, and those present might rely upon it that he would forget neither. He firmly believed that the friendship between England and Russia would continue to grow and strengthen. The friendship between these two mighty Empires made powerfully for that end towards which all the civilised world was straining, the end of peace and liberty to work together for the advancement of the world by the arts of peace. This was the only reference to politics, Sir Arthur preferring to speak throughout "as a friend to his friends" rather than as the King's representative to the subjects of the King. The speech will not be forgotten by any who were present, for it was a characteristic revelation of the man that usually lies deeply hidden beneath the exterior of the official.

Sir Arthur Nicolson is known in certain circles of St. Petersburg by the appreciative nickname of "Talleyrand-the-other-way-round," a tribute to the brain-power and training of the ambassador on the one hand and the sincerity and straightforwardness of the man on the other. Nicknames attach only to those who in an unusual degree move like or dislike in their fellows, and no surer proof can be found of the place won by any personality in the feelings of those about him. To the unofficial world with whom he came in contact, the members of the British community, Sir Arthur Nicolson has always been emphatically the "friend" rather than the patron or the official merely. What he has been to the official world here is plain from the ring of sincerity and feeling in the regrets expressed on all hands no less than from the more telling evidence of—"Talleyrand-the other-way-round."

ROOSEVELT ON AFRICAN MISSIONS.

In a notable article in the August number of "Seribner's Magagine," Theodore Roosevelt has this to say on missions:

"Those who complain of, or rail at missionary work in Africa, and who confine themselves to pointing out the undoubtedly too numerous errors of the missionaries and shortcomings of their flocks, would do well to consider that even if the light which has been let in is but feeble and gray, it has at least dispelled a worse than Stygian darkness. As soon as native African religions—practically none of which have hitherto evolved any substantial ethical basis—develop beyond the most primitive stage they tend, notably in middle and western Africa, to grow into malign creeds of unspeakable cruelty and immorality, with a bestial and revolting ritual and ceremonial. Even a poorly taught and imperfectly understood Christianity, with its underlying foundation of justice and mercy, represents an immeasurable advance on such a creed.

"Where, as in Uganda, the people are intelligent and the missionaries unite disinterestedness and zeal with common sense, the result is astounding. The majority of the people of Uganda are now Christian, Protestant or Catholic; and many thousands among them are sincerely Christian and show their Christianity in practical fashion by putting conduct above ceremonial and dogma. Most fortunately, Protestant and Catholic seem now to be growing to work in charity together, and to show rivalry only in healthy effort against the common foe; there is certainly enough evil in the world to offer a target at which all good men can direct their shafts without expending them on one another."

COUNT HAYASHI'S REMINISCENCES.

(FROM THE "JUJI SHIMPO.")

I.—SCHOOL DAYS.

I was born, says the Count, at the town of Sakura, in Inba gō i, Shimōsa, on the 22nd February in the 3rd year Kaei (1851) as a member of the Sato family. My father was a physician, a retainer of that branch of the Hottas who ruled in Sakura from the year 1745 until the Restoration of Meiji.

In my boyish years there were no schools to speak of except those in which Chinese classics were taught, and of such there was one in every clan, with a superior institution known as the Shoheiko in the Kanda district of Yedo, which stood under the direct control of the Tokugawa Government. The study of the Dutch language was coming into vogue, but there was no official school at which Dutch was taught, those who desired to learn the language mostly resorting to Nagasaki, where they took lessons from physicians and interpreters. There were however two institutions which attracted a considerable number of Dutch scholars, the one Ogata Kōan's school in Osaka, which plays an important role in the life of the late Mr. Fukuzawa, and the other kept by my father, Sato Tainen, at Sakura.

In my father's school there were generally from one hundred to one hundred and thirty boarders, picked students most of them, and sent by the various clan governments for special purposes of study. But their manners were wild beyond conception. They would think nothing of breaking up shōji, and doors, and tearing up the tatami of their dormitories if they were cold on a winter's day and wanted a fire: and scarcely a day passed without a 'town and gown' riot between the students and the townspeople of Sakura. They were all the sons of samurai, and were all supposed to carry swords, but, as a matter of fact, there were in the school, only two or three sets of swords which were worn indiscriminately by any student who happened to have need of them for some ceremonial purpose. The rest had found their way to the pawnbrokers in exchange for saké.

The well being of the dormitory depended entirely upon the character of an official known as the jukuehō, or head of the dormitory. If the jukuehō was a reliable personage and up to his work the life of the dormitory would be orderly and the students fairly diligent, but laxity of administration made the boys terribly unruly.

The fees were paid monthly, and amounted to one bu and two shu per head, a bu being equivalent to 25 sen, and four shu making a bu. This small sum (37½ sen, or nine pence half-penny in English money) covered all expenses of board and tuition but before I left the school the fee was raised to two bu (one shilling) per month. Things were very cheap in those days: eggs could be brought for a rin a piece, (i.e. ten for a farthing), and the lower samurai who stood beneath the hatamoto or direct retainers of the Shogunate received a stipend of three ryō (six shillings) a year and their food.

I was five years old when Commodore Perry visited Japan and the opening of the port of Kanagawa took place four years later. Prices of all commodities went up at once, we had touched the outside world, and prices like water always tend to uniform level. This appreciation of prices was, however, mainly due to the fact that Shogun's Government tried to meet a deficiency of revenue by a debasement of coinage, a procedure which though it served a very temporary purpose, only served to diminish the purchasing power of the various denominations of coin. How great, since those days, has been the increase in the wealth of Japan!

II.—THE MISTRESS OF THE "TERAKOYA."

The Sakura clan had its own Chinese school, known as the Onkodō, at which the children of the feudal lord, as well as the sons of the samurai received their ordinary education. There were also two elementary schools which taught writing, which were known as the eastern and western juku. There was constant rivalry between the boys attending these two schools, and frequent fights.

In the town distinct from the samurai quarter—there were one or two private teachers, who gave lessons to the sons of merchant and farmers. I was sent, at the age of six to study under one of these,—a man named Hamada, who kept a terakoya, or private school in Nibancho, with about one hundred and fifty boys and girls, all under fifteen.

During school hours Hamada's wife used to stand in the class room with a long bamboo stick in her hand, at one end of which was a leathern ball filled with cotton. The instrument was used for the purpose of enforcing attention. Whenever she saw a boy or a girl playing, or inattentive, down would come the leather ball on his head. In extreme cases, she would pile several desks one on the top of another, and make the delinquent sit on the top with a bowl of water in one hand and an incense-stick in the other, and woe betide the poor lad if he dropped either before she gave him permission to come down from his stool of repentance.

I stayed in this school till I was ten years old, and learned the elements of writing, especially the Chinese characters for the names of places, persons and things in common use, and the phrases necessary for simple letter-writing. At ten I was sent to a Chinese scholar named Tsutsuki Hōtoku, with whom I read the Chinese classics. At thirteen, I went to Yokohama where I commenced the study of English. At the same time I gave up the study of the Chinese classics a fact that I have often had reason to regret, as I have more than once been at a disadvantage owing to my imperfect mastery of Chinese.

III.—RUMOURS OF THE CONCLUSION OF THE TREATY.

When I was five years old, my mother took me for a visit to Kamakura and Enoshima. This was in 1854, and on our way home we stopped for one night at Kanagawa. Our landlord pointed to a village across the bay and told us that it was Yokohama. He also added that the negotiations for the treaty were then going on, and that the Treaty itself would shortly be signed. The people of our clan had been busily engaged with warlike preparations ever since the first arrival of the American fleet, and everybody was sure that war was imminent.

IV.—THE GREAT TAIRO.

It was on the 3rd of March in the 1st year of Man'en that the great Tairō, Ii Naosuke, Kamon no Kami, and Prime Minister of the Shōgun's Government, was assassinated by rōnin of the Mito clan. Previously to this occurrence, our feudal chief, the Lord Hotta Fumiaki, of the Sakura clan, had been put under arrest by the order of the Tairō, and as the Tairō's death brought with it the release of our master, our people were overjoyed at the news. It became the fashion among our boys to play at the assassination of Ii Kamon, but the Tairō was so unpopular a personage that no boy would voluntarily play his part. I was the youngest boy in my set, and it was therefore very often my misfortune to be assigned the hateful role.

V.—"THE MITO RONIN ARE COMING."

The assassination of Ii Kamon was followed by the disturbances among the Mito rōnin which are known as the Kengū Sōdō, or the "Kabasan affair." The agitation was not confined to the Mito rōnin, though it originated with them: there were many unprincipled persons who took advantage of the confusion to go round the country terrorizing and robbing innocent people. It was the cry of the Mito rōnin that the country should be kept closed against foreigners, and as my father's school was for teaching Dutch, it was commonly supposed that its existence was threatened by the turbulent fighting men. It was indeed very liable to attack, had the Mito men really determined to invade the Sakura territories, for it lay isolated on the outskirts of the town. But our students were not afraid of the Mito ruffians. They fortified the school-house, and armed themselves with all manner of weapons, and bravely awaited an attack, which, however, never came.

VI.—THE ELECTION OF A NANUSHI.

My father's house was situated in Honchō, an outlying part of the town of Sakura, inhabited mainly by small merchants and farmers. The district was divided into two portions, an upper Honchō and a lower, the whole being administered by a Nanushi or "headman," who was elected annually by the inhabitants. There was not much choice of candidates, the voice of the electors being generally given, in alternate years, to a saké-brewer named Tsuchiya and a physician who was also a teacher of calligraphy. I do not know how things were managed elsewhere, but certainly in this section of our town this alternating arrangement was maintained for many years.

VII.—A DOG FIGHT.

When I was a very small boy I kept a black dog. The Tsuchiya family, referred to above, kept a white one, which was reputed to be the strongest dog in the town, having never yet been beaten in any one of his many battles. As my dog grew up, however, it more than once attacked and vanquished the brewer's white dog, much to the annoyance of the brewer's men, one of whom, like a coward that he was, pierced my dog through the body with a sharp bamboo spear. The poor dog was not killed outright: it managed to drag itself to the house, and having shown me its lacerated belly, died at my feet. The sight was too much for our dormitory students. They armed themselves (mainly with clubs), and, assembling in the great porch of the School house, sent for the saké brewer himself to present himself before their tribunal. When the brewer came he was told to squat on the floor while the head student harangued him. Did he know why the dog was kept at the school? It was kept for purposes of dissection. Suppose the lord or one of his family fell ill, the dog would be dissected and the internal organs examined so that the physician might know how to deal with the internal organs of the honourable patient. Letting the black dog be killed, merely out of paltry spite, was a crime against the feudal lord, and one that would not easily be forgiven. The only way for the brewer was to deliver up the offending servant and to send a letter of apology. The brewer saw good reason to do as the boys recommended.

VIII.—A FIGHT WITH A FARMER.

There was no limit in those days to the pride and arrogance with which the Samurai behaved towards common people. We might indeed say that they behaved as they liked. They went to theatres and shows without payment: they claimed the right to use the ferry boats without paying toll, and there were many other similar privileges that they claimed. When I was a boy I took my walks abroad, with one sword, and the servant who accompanied me wore another. If we met a commoner on horseback, my servant would put his sword into my belt, and then, on the strength of my being a two-sworded gentleman we would make the commoner dismount and do us reverence. Had he refused to do so we might have killed him with impunity. If a rude farmer tried to pass us on horseback my servant would run after him and pull him off. One day we met a stubborn farmer who refused to dismount for us, saying that I was only a boy and that he was not going to get off for me. My servant then tried to pull him off, and the result was a fierce fight between the two men in which my servant came off second best. When I got home I told my father what had occurred, fully expecting that he would commend us for our zeal in vindicating the privileges of our order. But my father, being a physician, with many clients among the farmers and merchants, took a different view of the matter, and sternly forbade me ever to attempt such a foolish thing again.

IX.—THE CHOLERA RAGES THROUGHOUT JAPAN.

In the 5th year of Ansei (A.D. 1857) the epidemic raged throughout the country, and no one knew how to fight it. It was commonly believed that the foreigners had infected the sea with it, and in consequence, no one would eat fish for fear of being attacked with sickness. The master of the Hayashi, who was himself also a doctor, with many clients, was naturally very much occupied with sick-bed visits. In those days no one knew anything about preventive measures, or disinfecting precautions, and the doctor would go his rounds without dreaming of washing his hands after handling his patients. Yet none of the household caught the infection. So I learned that only those who were weakly or in bad health were liable to the disease, and that there was very little to fear so long as one kept oneself healthy and in good condition.

The epidemic was at its height for about fifty days, from July to September, and about 30,000 persons perished in the city of Yedo alone.

X.—SHRINES AND ACTORS.

The temple known as the Shinshōji takes charge of the famous shrine of Fudō Myōō at Narita, and it is commonly believed that this deity was the special protector of the famous archer Tawaratoda Hidesato. Narita is also famed as the birth place of the celebrated Danjurō, the first of the line of actors who bore that name. Danjurō I, was born in the 4th year of Keian (A.D. 1650). His father had been a devoted worshipper at the shrine of Fudō, the son followed suit, and Fudō became the patron deity of the whole succession of the Danjurō. To this fact may be attributed the popularity of the shrine of Narita Fudō, it having become fashionable among the theatre loving people of Tokyo to worship at the same shrine with the all-popular family of actors.

About a ri from Narita, on the Tokyo side of the town, at the village of Kotsu, there stands a splendid shrine dedicated to the memory of the celebrated Kiuchi Sōgoro, (or as he is more commonly called Sakura ōgoro), the famous patriot who sacrificed his life for the welfare of the common people. When I was a boy there was nothing here but a plain tombstone; but when Ichikawa Kodanji was acting in Tokyo the play of Sōgoro's martyrdom he used to send his men every day to worship at the grave of the popular hero. The play turned out to be an immense success, popular sympathy was aroused, and Kadanji's action in sending men daily to worship at Sōgoro's grave coming to be known, it became the fashionable thing for Kodanji's admirers to do the same, and the result has been the handsome shrine that now stands by the side of the grave. The incident shows how great is the power wielded by the stage in promoting the cult of various Gods and Buddhas, and this is a matter well deserving the attention of the Government.

XI.—SOGORO'S DIRECT APPEAL TO THE SHOGUN.

Sōgoro's story is principally known to the public through the medium of theatrical representations. The popular version of the story does not however seem to be correct in all its details. It is popularly supposed that the direct personal appeal to the Shōgun, which caused Sōgoro's death, was made at the Samurai Bridge at Ueno. But truth is that Sōgoro availed himself of the opportunity given him by a visit paid by the Shōgun to Lord Hotta's residence in Asakusa, Hotta being, as the reader knows, Sōgoro's feudal chief. According to the registers kept at the Tōshōji, which is the village-temple at Kotsu, Kiuchi Sōgoro was executed on the second day of the 8th month in the 23rd year of Shōō (A.D. 1653), at the age of 42. His four children were put to death at the same time. The eldest of the four was a boy, the other three were girls, and according to the laws of the time women were exempt from capital punishment. But Hotta Masanobu was much incensed against Sōgoro for making the appeal, and resolved on signal vengeance. The whole family was to be blotted out, and to effect this it was determined to treat the three girls, by a legal fiction, as boys, and to behead them along with their brother at the same time that their father was crucified. It was impossible to try to turn Sōgoro's wife into a man, for no legal fiction could get over the fact she had borne her husband four children, so she was allowed to shave her head and become a nun.

Many strange stories are told of what the Hotta family in later years had to put up with from Sōgoro's ghost. When I was Minister in London I made the acquaintance of Mr. Hotta Seikyo, son and heir of Viscount Hotta Seiyo. From this gentleman I learned that there was still within the precincts of the Hotta mansion a shrine in honour of the spirits of the five victims at which propitiatory worship was regularly offered. The propitiation did not however do much good. For many generations after the execution of Sōgoro and his children no son was born in the family of the Hotta lord, or, if born, it died very soon. The family had been kept up entirely by adoption. His own father was an adopted son, and he himself was the first son born and reared to an estate since the crucifixion of Sōgoro. It seemed as though not until the Restoration, when the feudal lords were stripped of their political power forever, was the spirit of Sōgoro to be appeased. It is said by some people that Sōgoro and his children were executed within the precincts of the Tōshōji Temple. Their heads were buried at Masako-Yama on the shores of Emba numa.

XII.—THE GREAT TROUBLE OF LORD HOTTA.

When I was a little boy the head of our clan was known as the Lord Hotta Bitchū no Kami Masamutsu. After the conclusion of the treaty with America, and when the foreign affairs of the country were beginning to get complicated, he was appointed a rochū (Shogunal Cabinet Minister) on the recommendation of Lord Abe Ise no Kami Masahiro, and had to deal principally with foreign matters. He was much liked by the foreigners and was an intimate friend of Shimadzu Hisamitsu, the great lord of Satsuma. Lord Hotta was a progressive man and advocated on principle the opening of the country. It was for this reason, because he was a far-seeing man, that our clan commenced the introduction of foreign military drill and tactics before any of the other clans of Japan.

One day, when he was at a rochū meeting, a great dispute arose at the Shōgun's Palace as to the advisability of opening the country for foreign trade. Hotta was of course on the side of progress, but was vehemently opposed by the lords of Mito, Echizen and Kuwana. When he returned from the Council he told my father that, in view of strenuous opposition raised by certain of the daimyō to the opening of the country to foreign trade, he had taken the trouble to send trusty men to investigate the state of military preparedness in their several territories. To his great astonishment he had found that the Kuwana clan only possessed thirty muskets, and that the rest of recalcitrant clans were in no better state of preparedness. It was absurd, with such armaments, to talk of repelling or expelling the foreigner. Further, he had had a talk with Mr. Harris on the subject of a treaty, and had been much struck with the soundness of his reasoning. In the fourth year of Ansei (A.D. 1857) he went up to Kyoto to obtain the Emperor's sanction for the newly concluded treaty, for he was fully convinced that the opening of the country was for the national good, and that the opposition to the measure on the part of the Emperor's officers, being based on their ignorance of foreign countries, would disappear as soon as they were enlightened as to the state of western civilization and progress. Things turned out, however, quite contrary to what he expected, and the ignorant intransigents carried the day at Kyoto and elsewhere.

A few far-seeing men had for a long time before told of the inevitable necessity of opening the country. Watanabe Kwazan and Takano Chōei had done this as early as the Tempō Era (A.D. 1830-44) and the village of Matsushita, Yoshida Shōin, the famous teacher of the Hagi clan, was busily imbuing the minds of his pupils with the belief in the necessity of a change of national policy, and with some of the more ardent of his followers, Ito, Yamagata, Iinoye, was already contemplating a flight to America on board a Yankee man-of-war, for the purpose of learning the truth about the great world. But the great majority of the daimyō and influential men in the councils of the Shōgun as well as of the Emperor were actuated by an intense hatred of all foreigners, and this was Lord Hotta's great trouble during his term of office as a member of the Shōgun's cabinet.

XIII.—A FOX BEWITCHED MAID IS BURNT TO DEATH.

My father's house was in the poor quarter at the extreme end of the town of Sakura, close to farmlands and scrubs which were much frequented by foxes. There were many cases of so called fox-possession, though they were in reality nothing more than cases of hysteria or nervous disorder, made more pronounced in consequence of the wild stories of fox-power which were so common in the town. People were quite firm in their belief that these nervous disorders were due to the influence of foxes, and they would try to drive the foxes out of the bodies of these unfortunate people by burning red-pepper under their noses, it being well known that of all pungent odours foxes dislike this the most.

On one occasion, a woman who had once been a servant in my father's family, was suffering with an inflammation of the lacteal glands, and was losing flesh rapidly in spite of the plentiful nutriment with which she tried to keep herself in good condition. Every-one thought that a fox had taken up his abode in her body and was taking all the food for himself. So, having previously taken the precaution of binding her securely, so that she could not escape from the torture, they made fires of tōgarushi (red pepper) on all sides of her, and the fumes which arose were so strong that presently she was suffocated and died. I cannot tell if this cruel practice still exists in out of the way places or not.

XIV.—"KURUMA," "KAGO," BOATS.

The jinrikisha was invented in the early years of Meiji. As is the case with so many of the inventions of old Japan, the name of the inventor is unknown.* Previous to this, there used to be kago stands at the cross roads in Tokyo, and many sampans plied for hire on the river and canals.

XV.—A DREADFUL CUSTOM.

In the house opposite ours there lived a poor shopkeeper, named Kimbei, with his wife and two children, a boy and a girl. I often noticed that the woman would at times look as though she were about to become a mother. Then she would be confined to the house for some days, after which she would come out again, apparently quite well, but without a baby. It was the practice in this family to suffocate the poor little infants as soon as they came into the world, so as to avoid the trouble and expense of having to rear them. The practice was not looked upon by the family as a shameful one. It prevailed at one time very widely in the provinces of Shimosa, Kadzusa, and Awa, and I have heard of people who made it their boast that they did not intend to rear more than three children, however many might be born to them. The Shogunal government did its best to put an end to this barbarous custom, but it was not until the Meiji Restoration that anything effectual was done to stop it.

XVI.—THE NECESSITY OF KNOWING ENGLISH.

In the second year of Bunkyo (1862) my father resigned his office and removed to Yokohama where he took up his abode with my cousin Yamanouchi Rokusaburo, an interpreter, who also practised medicine. At Yokohama he became impressed with the importance of studying English, and he had not been there many weeks before he wrote for me to join him there and devote myself to the study of the language. My mother and I joined him in June of the same year.

XVII.—MAKING FUN OF THE "NAPPA."

Yokohama was very different then from what it is now. Where at present Kaigandōri, Kita-

* Is this so? Tr.

nakadōri, Bentendōri, Ōtamachi and the Railway Station stand was dry land, the rest was a swamp washed on three sides by the sea. It was separated from Honmura by a canal over which there were two bridges with barriers at one end. Across the swamp from Noge to Kanagawa ran an embankment of earth and stones which served as a road, and there was another barrier at Voshida-bashi. At Honchodori Ichome there was a ferry with boats plying to and fro from Kanagawa. Here there was another barrier, and as this ferry was used solely for passenger traffic, all personal effects and baggage were scrutinized with special care. The officers in charge of these barriers were mostly the sons of Hatamoto or Goukenin (both classes of samurai in direct relation to Shogunal fiefs.) The officers were called jōban ("high watch"), their subordinates, who wore green uniforms being nicknamed by the people as nappa or "vegetables."

XVIII.—THE NAMAMUGI AFFAIR.

During the second year of Bunkyo, the Shogunal Government notified the foreign residents in Yokohama to refrain from walking or riding along the Tokaido so as to avoid the numerous processions which passed along on their way to and from the capital. Not much notice was taken of this warning, however, it being impossible according to the contention of the foreigners to take any exercise without passing along the Tokaido. The Government then constructed a broad road leading to Honmoku along which the foreigners might take exercise, and notified them to abstain from appearing on the Tokaido when Daimyo processions (of which due notice would be given) were expected to pass that way. It so happened however that a party of four foreigners from Hongkong, who were anxious to see Yedo, insisted, in spite of warnings, in riding along the Tokaido when the procession of Shimazu, Daimyo of Satsuma was expected to pass along the road.

The party was warned repeatedly of the danger, but they all said that they understood how to treat Asiatics, and the unfortunate upshot of the matter was the Namamugi incident so familiar to all Japanese people. I was at the time acquainted with an American gentleman who was familiar with Japanese. This man told me that some years previous to the Nagamugi incident he had met the procession of the Satsuma Daimyo along the same Tokaido. He had, however, immediately dismounted from his horse and had stood hat in hand until the procession passed him, and had received no hurt. He felt sure that the Richardson party, through ignorance of Japanese customs, had brought the calamity upon themselves by arrogant and haughty behaviour, and the results of this calamity were very far reaching. I think that my own countrymen in Korea and Manchuria should learn from the incidents of the Namamugi outrage how much injury they may cause to their own country by a heedless violation of the customs of the place in which they are living.

XIX.—A SLUMP IN FURNITURE

The negotiations which went on with regard to the Namamugi incident were very grave in their immediate effects on the people in the vicinity, for almost a panic was caused by the appearance the next year of a British squadron of seven vessels in Yokohama harbour. I remember that a high officer, Wakana by name, was so alarmed by the appearance of the British ships that he immediately sent his family and household goods to Yedo for safety. The people in and about Yokohama were much alarmed. Everybody thought that war was imminent and the greatest confusion prevailed. Household goods were offered for sale on all sides by would-be refugees, yet even the lowest prices brought no buyers. In one case ten tatami were sold for 60 mon (=6 rin, at exchange then current, about a farthing). At present they would fetch $4\frac{1}{2}$ yen, or about nine shillings of English money.

XX.—TOY-GUNS.

In the first year of Genji (A.D. 1864) the combined fleets of Great Britain, America, France, and Holland bombarded Shimoda and captured some guns. These guns were afterwards landed on an open space by the side of Dr. Hepburn's house, where I used to go for my English lessons. They were all wooden guns bound with bamboo hoops, and looked for all the world like the cannon that are used for discharging fireworks. What a comedy it was for our people to dream of expelling foreigners with guns of this description. It was a perfectly natural sequence of events that our jingoists should be defeated at the first battle, and then be obliged to make peace with the foreigners through the intervention of those very advocates of the opening of the country, whom they had been trying to get out of the way by assassination and other equally reprehensible means. If it had not been for those men, the true patriots, Japan would have met with a great misfortune in 1864.

XXI.—A FOREIGNO-PHILE.

And yet when the British squadron bombarded Kagoshima the British sustained considerable losses. The Japanese successes on this occasion were not due to any one of the Joi Jingoists. They were due to the wisdom and forethought of Lord Saishin (Shimadzu), who was a great admirer of foreign ways and science, and who had made careful preparations for the defences of his city.

XXII.—THE GREATEST COMEDY OF ALL.

From among other comedies enacted by the members of the Shōgun's Government, I shall select one for special mention,—the comedy which related to the translation of Government documents.

All letters sent to the Government by the Ministers of Foreign Powers were written in Dutch, and were translated by Government interpreters into Japanese. It was the custom of these translators to use many courtly phrases, and their versions abounded with phrases such as zonji tatematsuri sōrō, goza sōrō, c. The letters were written on a very fine kind of paper known as Hōsho, on which also were written the communications sent by the Japanese Government to the Foreign Legations, though these latter were couched in language which was haughty rather than polite or courteous. The translations were written with a fude on torinoko paper.

When communication became frequent and the negotiations became complicated, the translators found that it was impossible always to translate with exactitude and yet to preserve the requisite courtliness of style. So they adopted a style somewhat more closely resembling the language in ordinary use, and phrases such as shikazaru orozu and sezaru bekarazu began to make their appearance in the documents. When the wise-heads of the Government read these versions they lost their tempers. "See," they said, "the barbarians are beginning to despise us."

XXIII.—THE AFFAIR OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN

Whenever in those days a foreigner was assassinated the first question asked always referred to the amount of indemnity to be paid. The Shogunate Ministers were in session when the news was brought them of the assassination of President Lincoln. They heaved a deep sigh and looked at one another. "There now!" they said, "we shall have another indemnity to pay."

XXXIV.—THE GWAJOKU BUGYO'S SHARP PRACTICE.

The British Minister, Sir Harry Parkes, was pressing hard for the opening, in accordance with the treaty, of the port of Kobe.

The Imperial Government at Kyoto was however bitterly opposed to the opening of the port, and the Shōgun's government was thereby placed in a very great dilemma. The Shōgun's Minister for Foreign affairs (the Gwaikoku bugyō) was therefore instructed to request the British Minister to consent to a postponement of this part of the treaty, but the request was in vain. One day the Minister had gone to the British Legation on this difficult business, when a letter was brought him from his own house. He read it, a dark shade passed over his brow, but he went on with the business in hand. Presently a second letter came, and this time the Japanese Minister turned pale as he read it. "Sir Harry asked what had happened. The Japanese Minister's son was dying. Then Sir Harry suggested that the conference be postponed. But to this the Japanese Minister would not consent. 'My son's sickness is a private business of my own,' he said; 'but this conference is national business. I cannot leave this grave national business to attend to my own trifling concerns, until I have your assurance that you consent to the request which I have made for a postponement in opening the port of Kobe.' And so, out of sheer politeness and courtesy, Sir Harry Parkes was forced to give way."

When his colleagues heard of the success of the ruse to which their representative had resorted, they were loud in their praises of the firmness with which he had made his stand in the matter. It did not seem to them that the gwaikokubugyō had put Sir Harry Parkes into a very difficult position by his insistence on his Mission at such a moment, nor had they the experience of the world to enable them to understand that such conduct could only lead to having foreigners conceive a great dislike and contempt for the queer ways of Japanese diplomacy.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

THE ANNEXATION OF KOREA BY JAPAN AND ITS RELATION TO THE CHRISTIAN MOVEMENT IN THAT COUNTRY.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

One of the providential things in the propagation of the Gospel in Korea has been the friendly attitude on the part of the Japanese Prime Minister and Prince Ito. To the latter the missionaries have been especially indebted for sympathy and cordial support; and this has meant more than it is possible to realize, because, in a country where the government is absolute, the friendly attitude of the officials is essential to any successful religious propaganda. Even indifference would have made the work of the missionaries much less popular and successful.

As the successor of Prince Ito was a military man, and supposed to be of a more stern disposition, as well as accustomed to deal with questions from a different standpoint, it was generally feared that a different atmosphere would prevail among those in official circles and the work of the missionaries in Korea would suffer.

But to the credit of the rulers in Japan, and the relief of many anxious minds, the policy that has been proclaimed is one that gives entire relief and is certainly creditable to the wise and liberal statesmanship of the men who have had the direction of affairs. In the treatment of a subject nation and careful consideration of the interests of the missionary body working in Korea no more generous terms or attitude could be asked for or expected. It is also in strange contrast with the conduct of France in Madagascar, or the East India Company in India in the beginning of mission work there.

In a Proclamation by the Governor General of Korea, Viscount Terauchi, he speaks as follows:

"The freedom of religious belief is recognized in all civilized countries. There is indeed nothing to be said against anybody trying to gain spiritual peace by believing in whatever religious faith he or she considers to be true. But those who engage in strife on account of sectarian differences, or take part in politics, or pursue political intrigues under the name of religious propaganda, will injure good customs and manners and disturb public peace and order and as such shall be dealt with by law. There is no doubt, however, that a good religion, be it either Buddhism or Confucianism, or Christianity, has as its aim the improvement, spiritual as well as material, of mankind at large, and in this not only does it not conflict with administration but really helps it in attaining the purpose it has in view. Consequently all religions shall be treated equally and further due protection and facilities shall be accorded to their legitimate propagation."

All those who will behave themselves loyally and abide by law peacefully shall receive the benefit of a judicious and benevolent rule. You people of hosen, should therefore take due cognizance of the new regime and be careful not to go astray."

In his Instructions to the Japanese residents in Korea the Resident General adds:—

"The aim and purpose of the annexation is to consolidate the bonds of two countries, removing all causes for the territorial and national discriminations necessarily existing as separate powers, so as to perfectly promote the mutual welfare and happiness of the two peoples in general. Consequently should the Japanese people regard it as a result of the conquest of a weak country by a stronger one and speak and act under such illusion in an overbearing and undignified manner they would go contrary to the spirit in which the present step has been taken. Japanese settlers in Chosen seem to have hitherto considered themselves to be living in a foreign land and have often fallen into the mistake of holding themselves as superiors at the expense of the people of the country.

It is opportune that things have now assumed a new aspect. Let them take this opportunity to change their ideas and attitude towards the people of Chosan. Let them always bear in mind that they are our brothers, and treat them with sympathy and friendship; and in pursuing individual avocations by mutual help and coöperation, both people should contribute their shares to the progress and growth of the whole Empire."

The same kind sentiments towards the Koreans are entertained by the Japanese people as a class. In one of the leading papers in Tokyo has appeared an article entitled "Assimilation through Love and Sympathy," in which it says:—

"The union of Japan and Korea is absolute once and forever, as the terms of Annexation Treaty show, and it is not unreasonable, therefore, that Japan should feel anxious to forthwith begin the work of assimilation of Koreans. In the days of conquest by arms, the law and troops, the police and repression might have succeeded in forcing assimilation. But not to-day, not at least in the case of a country like Korea, which becomes a part of another country through a friendly annexation. Hence says the journal, there arises the need for assimilation through sympathy. Koreans are often spoken of as being a people who deserve no sympathy. But what is it that has made them so crooked in thought, perfidious, deceitful and treacherous? Ages of maladministration, and in that respect they indeed deserve all sympathy. True there are incorrigible Koreans who would spurn sympathy. "On these force may properly be used."

It is indeed unfortunate that unscrupulous adventurers have gone to Korea and by their evil conduct given a bad and wrong impression of the Japanese people as a whole. But such men are being dealt with as they deserve and justice being administered as never before.

The retention of the eminent Christian, Judge Watanabe, at the Head of the Judicial Department is an indication and assurance that Christian men and Christian principles are not to be discriminated against, but on the contrary, given the recognition to which they are entitled.

What is of special interest and importance is the appointment of a Christian man also, Governor Ariyoshi, as the Executive of the Governor General. It was feared by some that when called to such a position Mr. Ariyoshi might not identify himself with Christianity or the Christian movement, but such has not been the case. In a personal letter from a friend in a high position in Korea the writer says:

"It is now becoming evident that Mr. Ariyoshi is going to prove himself a good Christian. He has expressed his desire to lead a good Christian life here, to Mr. Niwa, the Secretary of the Y.M.C.A., and me. Christians here, are going to give him a dinner at the Kiyō Hotel, to-morrow evening which invitation he has accepted. We have already had Mr. Watanabe at the Head of the Court of Law, and are now going to have another Christian in the most important place in the Government. Something is surely working among us, and we have no doubt that the new change will become a source of much happiness to the people concerned. God be praised."

The Nippon Yusen Kaisha has arranged to make a reduction in the first-class fare between Yokohama and Seattle, maintaining the same accommodation and treatment accorded as hitherto, from £35 to £25 dating from the 1st inst. The second-class fare is reduced from £20 to £17. The rates from other ports are also to be proportionally reduced.

Prince Tsai Hsun who had intended to visit the Steel Foundry at Muroran, abandoned the project and left for America on the 4th inst. on board the above steamer. A handsome bouquet was presented to the Prince by the Yokohama Municipality.

His Highness the Prince donated the sum of 100 yen to the townspeople of Oiso, the Preliminary School of the town, and the officials of Oiso station, respectively.

Mr. Komatsubara, Minister of Education, who has been acting as Minister of Agriculture and Commerce during the absence of Baron Oura, was relieved, on the 3rd inst., of his additional post on the return of Baron Oura.

Mr. M. Yukawa, Secretary of the Department of Communications, has been appointed Director of the Mercantile Marine Bureau, in succession to Mr. K. Uchida who was recently promoted to the position of Chief of the Civil Administration Office in Formosa.

In connection with the sale of the Yokohama Gas Works the negotiations between the Gas Bureau and the Tokyo Gas Company have so far made no substantial progress. The valuation made by the Gas Bureau is 3,000,000 yen, simultaneously claiming six per cent. interest as well as four per cent. extra allowance per annum. The Gas Company, on the other hand, proposes even to increase the value to 3,500,000 yen, but to reduce the rate of interest by one per cent. and to allow the extra with due proportion to the amount of net profit.

With regard to the Meguro horse-race betting prosecutions sentence was passed on Tuesday in the Tokyo District Court. Namba Kimpatsu, Editor of the Racing Magazine, was sentenced to six months' imprisonment and fined 300 yen. Katsura Jiro and his wife were each fined 700 yen. Hiroaka Hiroraka, Proprietor of the Kagetsu Restaurant, and Yamamoto Gijiro, better known as the actor Shikan, were fined 500 yen respectively. Fujita Kenichi of the Oriental Salt Company and two others were likewise punished with a fine of 250 yen.

THE JAPANESE ARMY.

[CONTRIBUTED].

The London Standard in a recent article on the Japanese army refers to their splendid training and state of preparation for their last great war. Certainly. They were splendidly trained and prepared! The world took off its hat and acknowledged this fact five years ago. But the writer adds: "Does anyone think that the South African campaign or the war in the Philippines would have dragged on so long had there been more troops adequately drilled in their duties beforehand?" The suggestion is absurd. There is no possible comparison of the South African and the Philippine wars with Russo-Japanese struggle. Compare rather the guerilla warfare in the two former with the exactly similar guerilla warfare in Formosa. All respect to the splendid Japanese Army, but it is not necessary to resort to wild exaggeration. South Africa is conquered and pacified; the Philippine head-hunters were tracked down through swamp, forest, and mountain. But the war in Formosa goes merrily on, as it has for many years. The Standard correspondent simply shows his ignorance. For, to anyone who knows, it is very evident that either England, with her experience of meeting all conditions, in every section of the globe, or the United States with her 150 years of Indian fighting, could teach Japan a great deal about guerilla warfare; in fact, the methods which are finally enabling the Japanese troops to conquer Formosa, as they have now nearly done, are merely a combination of the methods worked out by the two countries above named.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NATIVE AND FOREIGN MISSION WORKERS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In your weekly issue of June 25th, on pages 953 and 954, there is an account of an interview between Dr. King and Mr. Kaiseki Matsumura. To one who has sat under Dr. King's preaching and teaching, to one who knows his utter lack of self conceit or self importance, it seems impossible that Dr. King ever made the answer attributed to him, which seems to admit himself a great scholar—however true the fact may be—or that he alone could do a far greater amount of good in Japan, than many inferior missionaries, inferior, that is, to himself.

Many missionaries in Japan and China are men trained by Dr. King himself. He never would sanction the going out of any man he considered inferior.

If there are so many eager earnest preachers, burning with zeal, men with "high ideals," "lofty standards" and competent, only waiting for foreign money to do it, why do they wait for money? They are to their own homeland and would be received without suspicion by their own people. Let them start out without purse or scrip as the old disciples did, as Roman Catholic priests in many lands, as Buddhist priests have done in the past, and preach as they tramp it over the countries. Even Buddhists pilgrims tramp on long journeys to famous temples, considering it more meritorious to do it all on foot and without money. What hinders these men eager for foreign money, what hinders Mr. Matsumura himself from doing it?—We are thankful there are some Christian men in Japan who scorn foreign money.

I wonder if Mr. Kaiseki Matsumura has ever formed one single close personal friendship with even one missionary. If he has, he is a treacherous friend; if he has not, he scarcely knows all that a missionary is or may be. It is said that it takes a great mind and heart to discover good, some talent in every body. Frances Willard was such an one. She always found something to admire, something to love, some ability for some special work in every body, and drew it out. It is a distinctive mark of the Christian spirit; a characteristic of the heart filled with love to fellow men and of the Christ spirit. We are thankful to know for a fact that there are many noble-minded youth and men, dear lovely girls and women, who do not share the same feelings towards missionaries of the said interviews.

On another page of the same issue it was stated that there is one prostitute to every 219 inhabitants in Tokyo; in Osaka one to every 143; in Nagasaki one to every 46. On the same page with part of Mr. Matsumura's interview was an item from Mr. S. Motoki on the morality of magazines, where he speaks of their low ideals, degrading "matter" publishing "details of the dark side of social life," "gratifying morbid curiosity" "all done for the sake of gain." Mr. Matsumura needs to consider this and the condition of young students of both sexes in Tokyo, young girls of respectable families prostituting themselves, visiting the young men students boarding houses for the purpose of getting money for their education* yet he thinks St. Paul's teaching in Romans is not fit for the pure ears of Japanese young people.

If Mr. Matsumura had a tithe of the ardour and lofty standards which he affects, was reasonably eager for the uplifting of his people, and conditions in his country, would he not welcome the least help from even missionaries "inferior" to Dr. King, they can help and they have helped and not only with money either. Mr. Matsumura has access to the gospel; let him go to work with it without help of missionaries or foreign money, they will not bother him. What is to hinder?

Compared with the narrow mindedness, the littleness and self conceit of the interviews we must believe in the work of such a man as Mr. Tsurin Kanamori who has taken himself out of the Christian ranks altogether, calls himself no longer a Christian, though he still treasures his old time missionary friendships, gives himself to tramps through the country, on long weary marches, self sacrificingly separates himself from his home and family to which he is devotedly attached, for long periods, for love of his fellow men, preaching a gospel of thrift and economy. We do not care if he has good backing for it. We'll venture that his work is of vastly more value than the work of some Christians who preach a Christianity of their own making. We would rather see a dozen healthy non-Christians at work for their fellow men in Japan than one sickly moonshine like the interviewer.

Mr. Matsumura needs to get down on his knees before his Maker and ask to be shown his own heart.

Mr. Matsumura thinks too that the Old Testament is not fitted for Japanese ears. We believe that one great mistake in the teaching of Japanese Christians has been in the lack of training in the Old Testament—the very ground work of Christianity. Higher or Historical Criticism has only made it more noble, more grand; the inspired Revelation from God to Humanity is all there intact. The Old Testament is still the foundation of the Christian religion, one cannot properly understand the New Testament without it; the wonderful world-thought of the Creator: the Old Testament with its lofty truths, and God-Companionship, and laws is still the foundation of all Christian Governments; but does the Interviewer comprehend it? More study, not less, of the Old Testament is needed even in Japan. Perhaps the lack of it is the cause of some wobbly Christians without stamina, "light in the helve" as Joseph Cook said was the Japanese ax.

Oh, how little does Mr. Matsumura know of the heart aches, that such take as his causes the many really noble able men and women, who have come to Japan in the spirit of brotherhood with high purposes and ideals those whom one would think he would gladly consider his Christian brothers and sisters, working to the same end with himself. One thinks of the patience of these same berated missionaries with some Japanese Christians and some preacher fledglings, on whom labour and love without stint have been given, who come into one's house as if they owned the place, sometimes appointing meetings in the missionary's house without previous consultation: sometimes walking into the house and upstairs without announcement or permission as they would never do in a Japanese home. We know of one instance when the lady of the house was taken by surprise at her early morning bath, entirely nude in her private chamber. Chairs and other house furniture have been borrowed for some special occasion, which after days of waiting the missionary has had to send after, which were constantly needed in his own house; often these were damaged but never a word of apology. Good table linen has been loaned and come back ruined with stains. I do not know whether it is the same ones who want the money and not the missionary, who come into one's study and borrow books which the owner is always glad to loan, though the borrower often has no idea of the value of the book to the owner, and often forgets to return it or returns it in sorry condition.

One such book was once found on the shelves of a preacher some 12 or 15 years after it was loaned, with the owner's name in it; a question was asked and the reply was "Really I liked that book so much I simply could not return it." These are the same young men with "lofty standards" to whom it is not safe to make a requested loan of ten yen if one needs it returned.

'Twas the same "lofty standards" that made the theft of the Doshisha and Kumamoto properties. All these things can be borne, but it is a culmination to have it said missionaries are not wanted in Japan.

One wonders what the future of Japan is to be, full of contradictions as it is, immorality eating into the vitals of the country, with the men of the people saturated with an unnamable disease, with some of her most noted statesmen setting the example, an immorality that must sooner or later surely bring the downfall of any country, with none to check it; with on the one hand unbalanced, unreliable irresponsible men without insight into the needs of their country, and on the other hand statesmen—perhaps the very same immoral men—guiding the affairs of government wisely and well to splendid achievement: with an Emperor whose public utterances and acts have ever been wise, just, sincere, noble and high minded. He alone cannot keep the nation from downfall, if its heart is rotten. None of her internal native religions have any power of regeneration.—The treasurer of the Hongwan-ji temple in Honolulu is a saloon keeper.—Has Japan after a millennium of existence suddenly come to splendid flowering only to sink like Rome? God forbid! Beautiful lovely Japan! with a people with so many admirable excellent characteristics! With all her faults we love her and desire only her progress and strength in all that is good.

Many missionaries feel and think these same things but are too wise and kind hearted to say them. With our candid speech we are only following a recent notable example of wholesome plain speaking, and alas, we fear this will never reach Mr. Matsumura's ears for he probably does not take the Japan Mail. Poor Dr. King; he nor any other American Ph. D. D.D. is used to such vapourings, I do not wonder that he "looked troubled," and from a far deeper cause than the Rev. Mr. Matsumura had any conception of.

Verily, is it a desirable thing to become "Japonicized"?

AN ONLOOKER.

Los Angeles, California, August 21, 1910.

THE SOUTH POLE EXPEDITION.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

MONSIEUR,—Des farceurs, plus polissons que spirituels, répandent par des imprimés en Français et en Japonais, la sottise idée d'accoler mon nom du projet d'expédition au Pôle Sud.

Est il nécessaire d'avertir vos lecteurs que le seul but de cette odieuse mystification est de jeter le ridicule sur un vieillard qui a l'honneur d'être prêtre catholique. Tout honnête homme qui soupçonnerait quel est l'habit qui portent ces drôles honte du corps dont ils sont membres, serait indigné. Quoique vieille de 19 siècles la race de Judas n'est pas éteinte.

Veuillez, Monsieur le rédacteur agréer l'expression de ma reconnaissance et de mes sentiments les plus distingués.

L. DROUARD DE LEZEY,
Mis. Ap.

* Let him notice the fact that Japanese prostitutes in numbers are prominent in every seaboard city of the world, because they are so easily procured. Let him examine the moral condition of public schools all through his country, where immorality ad nauseam among teachers and pupils is to be found.

In the small hours of Wednesday a man named Saito Akisada, residing at Tobe-cho, Yokohama, killed his wife, her sister and brother with a large knife. He then committed suicide on the spot. It is said that the murderer was very angry at his wife's misconduct.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SERVICE.)

THE VATICAN AND FRANCE.

London, September 1.

The latest Catholic sensation is a Papal letter condemning the French organisation known as The Sillon, formed over a decade ago by Marc Sangnier, which aims at reconciling the Catholics in France with the Papacy.

The Pope denounces this society as wandering from the true faith, and demands that it change its name to the Catholic Sillonists, and that Sangnier withdraw.

The latter has agreed and declares that the result is a victory for the conservatives of France.

THE KITCHENER AGITATION.

Criticisms of the Territorial Army have culminated in strong suggestions that Lord Kitchener be given a free hand to examine the service and report.

THE ANNEXATION.

PROTEST FROM KOREAN NATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

London, September 1.

Reuter's correspondent at San Francisco says that the Korean National Association, the general office of which is at San Francisco, has passed a resolution firmly repudiating the cession of sovereignty and severely arraigning the tyrannical compulsion of Japanese methods, concluding in the following terms:—"We, true sons of Korea will never give up the struggle for liberty and independence."

THE CROWN PRINCE'S BIRTHDAY.

CELEBRATION AT THE EXHIBITION.

The birthday of the Crown Prince was celebrated with a banquet at the Exhibition, which was specially decorated for the occasion. Mr. Wada presided and Lord Rotherham toasted the Prince who, he said, had shown himself keenly alive to the responsibilities of his position. It was apparent to all that Japan intended to play a bigger part in the history of the world than hitherto.

Mr. Wada responding dwelt on the significance of the celebration in a country whose friendship the Japanese valued beyond measure. He hoped that many similar gathering's would continue to inspire no ideal common to both and contributing at the peace of the world.

UPRISING IN THE PHILIPPINES.

London, August 2.

Manila.—There is a rising in province of Nuevaviscaya headed by Simeon Mandac ex governor of Ilocos Norte who is a fugitive from justice. The constabulary are hurrying to the scene.

THE "BEDFORD."

The Admiralty announces that salvage of the Bedford has been abandoned. It is hoped to save a portion of the guns.

GERMANY.

The Japanese General Kawamura attended the annual autumn Parade before the Kaiser at Berlin.

PORTUGAL RELIGIOUS TROUBLES

The Ministers are preparing to promulgate measures against religious congregations similar to those of Spain.

LABOUR TROUBLE IN GERMANY.

Twenty-one yards and 22,000 men are affected by the German ship building lock-out. Numbers of men obtained work further afield.

TIBET.

Darjeeling.—The stores collected at Sili-guri for the Tibetan expedition have been dispersed elsewhere. The advance is understood to have been abandoned. Traders are deeply chagrined, and the Dalai Lama's Entourage are much depressed as they had a secret hope that the Chinese and British would be at variance at last.

ENGLISH SHIPBUILDING LOCK OUT.

50,000 MEN THROWN OUT OF WORK.

London, September 3.

Lockout notices, posted in all federated shipyards, will become effective to-morrow. Fifty thousand members of the boiler-makers' societies are involved. This is another instance of the men ignoring their union.

Later.

The shipbuilding crisis has caused a sensation, as the industry is recovering from long depression and much valuable work is promised, including twenty destroyers.

The employers defend the lockout without notice, on the ground that the Boilermakers' Society was warned that there would be a lockout unless the society maintained discipline. Employers are determined that the men shall not resume work until the Boiler-makers' Society guarantees the fulfilment of its agreement.

TRIPLE ALLIANCE SECURE.

Conferences between Ministers Sanguiano and Aehrenthal at Ischl are regarded as disposing of rumours as to the weakening of the Triple Alliance.

POPULATION OF NEW YORK CITY.

The census of greater New York shows a population of 4,766,883. This is an increase of 1,329,681 in a decade.

GERMAN CROWN PRINCE'S TOUR.

London, September 4.

Berlin.—It is semi-officially stated that the Crown Princess will accompany the Crown Prince on his tour, as far as Ceylon. After the return of the Crown Princess, the Crown Prince will proceed through India and Siam and via Tsingtau and Peking to Tokyo, returning according to present arrangements, via Siberia.

THE SHIPBUILDER'S STRIKE.

The majority of the shipyards men ceased work yesterday afternoon.

A NEW METAL.

A new alloy called Duralumin has been discovered at the Vickers-Maxim Works. It is slightly heavier than Aluminium and as strong as steel.

U.S. DESTROYER TESTED.

The U.S. oil-burning destroyer Paulding averaged 32.58 knots in a four hour trial under perfect conditions.

HONOUR TO MONTENEGRO'S NEW KING.

London, September 5.

Cetlinge.—Grand Duke Nicholas presented the King the baton of a Field Marshal in the Russian Army.

SHIPBUILDING STRIKES.

Further notice by the boiler maker masters, that resumption of work will not be permitted, unless satisfactory arrangement are made and assurances agreed upon, regarding the due observance of ship yards' agreements and working conditions, surprises the men who realize the gravity of their position.

PHILIPPINE REBELLION.

London, September 5.

The people seized ex-Governor Mandao on the 2nd instant and gave him up to the Authorities. A number of his followers have been arrested. The rebellion is thus nipped in the bud.

FRENCH AEROPLANE SERVICE IN ALGERIA.

General Bailloud, commanding in Algeria, ascended in an aeroplane driven by an officer, and is much impressed with the facilities afforded for military observation. It is thought that aeroplanes will be useful in making reconnaissances in Southern Algeria.

Later.

The French Ministry of War plans to establish an aerial base in South Algeria, with a view to a trans-Saharan service of aeroplanes, linking up the French possessions.

GERMAN DEFENCE AGAINST DREADNOUGHTS.

INVULNERABLE SHIP OF THE MONITOR TYPE.

The German Admiralty is constructing a motor-driven monitor to deal with Dreadnoughts. This vessel has great speed and exposes only a low freeboard. It carries two huge 16-inch guns throwing shells capable of piercing the armour of a Dreadnought, while the immense thickness of its own armour renders it invulnerable against 12-inch guns.

GERMAN OFFICER ARRESTED AT PORTSMOUTH.

London, September 6.

The Evening News reports that a subaltern of a German pioneer regiment was arrested this afternoon in the act of sketching the fortifications at Portsmouth.

TURKEY AND FRANCE.

The French papers state that the Grand Vizier's interviews with MM. Briand and Pichon have left the proposed Turkish loan in an unsettled state. M. Pichon insisted that the proceeds of the loan should not be spent on Krupp guns or in a manner to help the German Navy.

A TURKISH EXPEDITION.

Constantinople.—Preparations are proceeding at Damascus for a Turkish expedition against the Druses.

MR. CHURCHILL WOUNDED.

London, September 6.

According to the Manchester Guardian, Mr. Churchill was accidentally wounded slightly in the leg. He has been operated on in an English hospital at Smyrna, and is doing well.

THE SHIPBUILDING LOCK-OUT.

An official statement has been issued to the effect that the Employers and the Trades Unions are presently negotiating the terms of a settlement. The crux of the question is what the employers will accept as assurances that there will be no recurrences of sectional strikes. The assurances offered will imply loyalty on the part of the members of the Unions, but how to ensure that loyalty is the problem.

A NEW ARSENICAL REMEDY.

Dr. Ehulicks has made an arsenical preparation named "606" which is engrossing the attention of the medical world. It has been applied in cases of tropical diseases, and the experiments point to its efficacy with malaria, sleeping sickness and recurrent fever.

GERMAN SUBALTERN'S ARREST CONFIRMED.

London, September 7.

The arrest of the German Subaltern at Portsmouth is confirmed. Documents have been sent for the inspection of the war office. Meanwhile the officer is being treated well, merely being deprived of his liberty.

THE CHINESE MINISTRY.

LONDON VIEW OF YUAN SHIH-KAI.

The Times sincerely hopes in the interest of China that she will be spared further palace revolutions, and considers the Prince Regent should lose no time in rehabilitating the one man who in late years has shown energy, strength and will.

EMPEROR MENELIK.

Emperor Menelik is now reported to be much better.

ENGLISHMEN ARRESTED IN GERMANY.

Berlin.—The examination of documents by the Public prosecutor established sufficient ground of suspicion for a charge of espionage against the two Englishmen named Brandon and Trench. An order is to be issued transferring the accused to Leipsic prison.

AMERICAN CUSTOMS REGULATIONS PROHIBITIVE.

The Foreign office has instructed Ambassador Bryce to protest at Washington that the new customs regulations in reference to textiles, requiring the revelation of trade secrets and imposing other conditions, are regarded by British exporters as prohibitive.

ENGLISH LABOUR TROUBLES.

The boiler smiths at South Shields have unexpectedly struck in sympathy with the locked-out boiler makers.

FIELD MARSHAL WHITE.

Field Marshall Sir George White has recovered.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

HAGUE ARBITRATION AWARD.

London, September 8.

The Hague.—The President of the Arbitration Tribunal has delivered the Newfoundland Fisheries Award. Of the seven points submitted to the judgment of the Tribunal, the two most important have been decided in favour of Great Britain, who thus has power to make laws for the regulation of the fisheries without submitting them to the approval of the United States.

[The hearing of this case, which began on June 2nd, was concluded on the 13th ult. The controversy has lasted for 130 years.—ED. J.M.]

PERSIA'S FINANCES.

Teheran.—The Mejliss has decided almost unanimously to employ American financial advisers instead of French, as previously agreed.

THE ST. LEGER.

The result of the St. Leger is 1. Swynford; 2. Bronzino; 3. Lemberg.

THE GERMAN SUBALTERN.

The German subaltern, who is named Helm, has been remanded in Winchester gaol. He denies that he was spying, but was drawing for his own information.

THE AMERICAN CUSTOMS PROTEST.

Washington.—It is stated that a new customs circular, or a modification of the old, is in preparation, in deference to the protests of the British textile exporters who complained that American manufacturers were appropriating trade secrets.

RADIUM.

Later.

Paris.—Mme. Curie announces that, in collaboration with M. Dedièrne, she has succeeded in obtaining pure metallic radium. Hitherto only the salts of that metal were obtainable.

MORE FIRE AT BRUSSELS.

There was another outbreak of fire at Brussels yesterday, but it was promptly extinguished.

PERSIA AND THE RUSSIAN TROOPS.

The Times correspondent at Teheran says that the negotiations for the removal of the Russian troops are dangerously near a deadlock. The British Minister is actively promoting a friendly understanding.

BRITISH TRADE.

There is an increase in the imports for August of £3,619,413, and in exports, £6,534,183, the latter principally in ships, iron, steel, cotton, wool and manufactured goods.

OBITUARY.

William Holman-Hunt, O.M.

[The distinguished artist, and painter of "The Light of the World," was born in London in 1827.—ED. J.M.]

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE TOKYO "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

INDIAN ANTI-EUROPEAN CONSPIRACY.

September 2.

The Bombay police is reported to possess confessions of the existence of an Anti-European conspiracy because of the conviction of Jilak.

RUSSIAN NAVAL ACCIDENT.

St. Petersburg.—The admiralty yacht Neva leaving Kronstadt with the Minister of Marine aboard collided with the submarine Kamiak. Both were damaged and one person was drowned.

THE ANGLO-JAPANESE EXHIBITION.

Notwithstanding unfavourable weather 5,260,000 visitors visited the Exhibition to the end of August. This is 180,000 more than attended the Franco-British exhibition during the corresponding period.

NEW YORK'S SUBWAYS.

New York.—The Public Service Commission proposes to build a new system of subways, costing probably twenty-five million pounds.

THE SHIPBUILDING STRIKES.

London, September 3.

The drastic action of the Shipbuilder's Federation in locking out members of the boilermaker's society implies a determination to end the frequent disputes, stoppages of work and contravention of the National agreement between the masters and men.

It is understood the men will not be allowed to resume work until the society guarantees the fulfillment of its agreements. About 20,000 men are affected and the commercial outlook in the north is regarded as serious. All ship-building branches will ultimately be involved.

EVICCTIONS IN NEW YORK.

New York.—Nearly 10,000 occupants of tenements in the lower east side, largely Jews, are threatened with eviction for non-payment of rent. The majority are in distressed circumstances.

THE SULTAN'S JEWELS.

Constantinople.—The Government has agreed to devote the jewels of the ex-Sultan, valued at £350,000 to a national fund for the new fleet.

FORTIFYING THE PANAMA CANAL.

London, August 5.

Washington.—Although President Taft and Ex President Roosevelt both agree as to the necessity of fortifying the Panama Canal, a rather strong feeling prevails against it. This sentiment will probably be overcome by the reminder of the double strength thereby given the navy.

THE NEAR EAST.

London, September 5.

The diplomatists of the principal European capitals are closely watching the Near Eastern situation. Suspicions are entertained that Turco-Greek relations will be affected by the somewhat truculent attitude of the Bulgarians, who are mobilizing 70,000 troops for autumn manoeuvres.

FRENCH INVESTORS AND TURKISH ORDERS.

The French press reiterate the fact that the new financial policy is unacceptable to French investors unless French trade receives orders equal to those placed with German firms. The Turkish Grand Vizier's conferences with the French Premier and Foreign Minister lead to the hope that harmony will be restored.

THE SHIPBUILDERS' LOCK-OUT.

The action of the employers of the Shipbuilding Federation in declining to allow the men to resume work until a satisfactory arrangement is effected ensuring the fulfilment of agreements is generally approved. The British public resents the serious upsetting of trade through the inability of the workmen-leaders to control the men.

THE CRETAN QUESTION.

London, September 6.

Constantinople.—The protecting Powers have informed the Porte that the Greek Government did nothing unconstitutional in the recent elections. The hope is expressed that the Turkish Government, by its attitude, will help to eliminate the difficulties of the situation.

"THE TIMES" AND CHINA'S PALACE REVOLUTIONS.

Later.

The Times, discussing the changes in high Government offices in Peking, hopes that, in the interests of China and the peace of the Far East, the Middle Kingdom will be spared further palace revolutions. The Regent ought immediately to rehabilitate Yuan Shihkai.

STRIKE IN STETTIN DOCKYARD.

Berlin.—A thousand workmen of the Vulcan shipbuilding yard at Stettin have struck because the Vulcan undertook work. Other yards are affected.

GERMAN SOCIALISTS.

London, September 7.

Berlin.—20,000 socialists met at Hamburg to protest against the recent speech of the Emperor at Koenigsberg.

THE NEAR EASTERN SITUATION.

The Porte disapproves the view of the Powers as to the position of Crete and asks a more definite view.

PERSIA AND THE RUSSIAN TROOPS.

Teheran.—Negotiations regarding the removal of Russian troops are dangerously near a deadlock.

COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING.

London, September 8.

Thirty thousand Boy-scouts have been enrolled. The War Minister is about to introduce a bill for compulsory military training in all schools of the Empire.

M. ISWOLSKY.

St. Petersburg.—The German rumour as to M. Iswolsky's retirement is not credited.

CRIME IN PARIS.

Paris.—In view of the increase of crimes of violence the Minister of Justice is preparing a bill prohibiting the unrestricted sale of revolvers to irresponsible persons.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

AMERICAN NEWSPAPERS ON ANNEXATION.

Washington.—The American newspapers maintain towards the annexation of Korea the tone adopted in their previous arguments. They regard annexation as an inevitable outcome of the situation. Many of them hold that annexation will make for the prosperity of the people of Korea, will bring to her the blessing of security of life and property, and will develop her material resources. One journal regards the event as natural and says that it will inure to America's advantage by diverting Japanese attention from the Philippines to continental Asia.

The Tribune praises Japan's leniency in leaving the customs tariff unaltered for 10 years. It says that such action on her part, in spite of the fact that she had the international right on her side, will tend to placate the world.

The section of the press habitually hostile to Japan essays to sneer at the incident, but obviously this is not serious criticism.

The press in general regards annexation a proper step on Japan's part.

JAPANESE EXHIBITION IN MEXICO.

Mexico City, September 3.

On the 2nd instant the Japanese Exhibition was successfully opened, the President and Cabinet Ministers being present. The Exhibition was thrown open to the public at 3 p.m., and has caught the public fancy. The exhibitors are all contented.

PRESENT CONDITIONS AT HSINMIN-PU.

Mukden, September 3.

The inundation at Hsinmin pu has not fully subsided. Whenever even a little rain falls, the disastrous conditions are repeated. Floods were again experienced on the 31st ult. and 2nd inst. The inhabitants are completely demoralized being unable to make repairs to their houses or to put their property in order. The supplying of food from the branch office of the Consulate, which was expected to be stopped to-day, will have to be continued for several days more.

AMBASSADOR INOUE.

Valparaiso, September 6.

Ambassador Inoue and suite arrived here yesterday and left for Santiago to-day.

OBITUARY.

Santiago, September 6.

Senor Fernandez, Vice-President of the Chilean Republic, passed away to-day.

NEW VICE PRESIDENT.

Santiago, September 7.

In accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, Senor Emiliano Figueroa, Minister of Education, has assumed the office of Vice-President. The decease has not affected the centennial celebration. The funeral of the late Vice-President will take place to-morrow. Ambassador Inoue arrived here yesterday.

APPOINTMENT OF MINISTERS OF STATE.

Brussels, September 7.

It was published in Monday's Official Gazette that M. Berryer, a member of the Senate, has been appointed Minister of the Interior, and M. de Broqueville, a member of the Chamber of Representatives, Minister of Railways.

CONDITIONS AT HSINMIN-PU.

Mukden, September 7.

Mr. Hojo, Official in charge of the Consulate, reports that normal conditions of weather being resumed, repairs to embankments will be completed in a few days. The supplying of food from the Consulate will be stopped from to-morrow, and the police who went to the rescue will return on the 9th instant.

(RECEIVED AT THE NAVAL DEPARTMENT.)

THE "IKOMA" HOMEWARD BOUND.

The cruiser Ikoma left Naples on Sunday afternoon for Port Said.

THE "INAZUMA."

The fore part of the destroyer Inazuma which was wrecked in the port of Hakodate, was towed on the 4th instant to a place near the Dock Company, where the water is five fathoms deep.

[The other portion of the ship was previously removed from the harbour.]

BELGIUM.

The International Light Railway Congress has been opened at Brussels.

NEWS OF THE DAY.

THE clearing off of freights on R.R. lines damaged by the late floods, is a question that deserved much attention. According to the statement of an authority concerned, the accumulated freights at various stations on the Shinyetsu line are only 300 cars, but in addition to this there must be about 20,000 tons of goods piled up in warehouses along the line, so that it will take at least a month to clear all of these goods.

ACCORDING to official investigations, over 800,000 cattle are being raised in Korea at the present time. All of these oxen are for the purpose of exportation. They are mostly exported to Japan, with small numbers to Canton China, and other places. The Korean oxen are good in quality, but the methods of rearing are still inadequate, so much so that Korean cattle are not fit for beef as they are exported from Korea.

It is reported from Kyoto that on the 30th ult. 74 Korean workmen belonging to the Ujigawa Hydro electric Power house, who had been discharged several days ago, called at the office, demanding travelling expenses to their homes. They threatened to set fire to a storehouse in which a quantity of dynamite and gunpowder is placed. The workmen at last succeeded in obtaining their travelling expenses and left for Chosen on the 3rd instant.

RUMOURS in Japanese papers state that Roosevelt has been employed as adviser and protector to the young Emperor of China. It is a most improbable yarn, but its a pity it isn't true! That's just about a big enough job to hold "Terrible Teddy" down for awhile at least. Then again most of the world believes that if his "big stick and a decently large Taka-broom" could be at work in China for awhile, it would be good for China, if Teddy didn't involve the whole eastern world in war in the meantime.

QUEEN ALEXANDRA, says a despatch to the S.-C. Morning Post, has expressed her sympathy with the families of the victims of the disaster to H.M.S. Bedford. She has sent to Admiral Carden, the new Mayor of Portsmouth, a cheque for £100 to the fund which he is raising for the widows and orphans of the drowned sailors.

THE Japanese exhibits sold at the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition from the opening day till August 10th, amounted to £3,560. The particulars are as follows:—

SKIN DISEASE PUZZLED DOCTORS

They Could Not Relieve Weeping,
Itching Eczema that Spread Over Face and Chest—Suffering Lasted a Year and a Half—Economically

CURED BY CUTICURA SOAP AND OINTMENT

"A rash broke out on my face and chest, which was caused by scratching a pimple on my neck. It spread across my face and had the appearance of a red line, and at night it showed up very red. The disease gradually developed into eczema, affecting my face and chest. I continued to suffer with the ailment for about one and one half years. During the earliest stages of this trouble I had tried — but it did me no good. I also had the services of two doctors but they could not help me. They gave me several kinds of ointments but again I found no relief.

"A friend told me to send for some Cuticura. When I received the Cuticura I applied it to my face and this soon stopped the weeping and itching. I used two more boxes of the Cuticura Ointment, bathing the affected parts first with Cuticura Soap. I continued with the Cuticura Remedies and after using four cakes of Cuticura Soap and not quite three boxes of Cuticura Ointment I was completely cured, and there has been not the slightest return of the eczema. C. Jones, 9, Deacon St., Dean Lane, St. George, Bristol, England, Nov. 17, 1909."

FOR SKIN HUMOURS

Torturing, disfiguring patches of humour on the skin, scalp or hands are instantly relieved and speedily cured, in the majority of cases, by warm baths with Cuticura Soap and gentle anointings of Cuticura Ointment. For eczemas, rashes, itchings, irritations, inflammations, dandruff, dry, thin and falling hair, for sanative, antiseptic cleansing and all purposes of the toilet, these pure, sweet, gentle emollients are unrivaled.

Cuticura is the most economical treatment known for the skin, scalp, hair and hands, of infants, children and adults. A tablet of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment are often sufficient to cure. Sold throughout the world. Depots: London, 27, Charterhouse Sq.; Paris, 10, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin; Australia, R. Towns & Co., Sydney; India, B. K. Paul, Calcutta; Japan, Maruya, Ltd., Tokio; So. Africa, Lennon, Ltd., Cape Town, etc.; U. S. A., Potter Drug & Chem. Corp., Sole Props., Boston. Post-free, 32-page Cuticura Book, a Guide to the Care and Treatment of the Skin and Scalp, AYLMER-COATES.—On 14th September, at Azabu, Tokyo, the wife of RICHARD AYLME-COATES, of a Daughter.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

ACCORDING to a Dairén report over 4,000 houses have been destroyed and over 17,000 persons are suffering from the recent floods at Hsinmin-pu.

THE construction of the railway between Chin-nanpho and Phungyang being completed, will be opened to traffic it on the 15th of October next.

A PEKING despatch says that the Viceroy of Manchuria has been authorized to raise a foreign loan amounting to 20,000,000 yen for the administrative expenditure in his regime.

A CONFERENCE for the settlement of provisions supplementary to the Convention for the establishment of an International Prize Court, will be opened at The Hague on the 19th instant.

THE Department of Education has distributed without charge 117,668 text-books to be used in schools by the children of sufferers from the recent floods in Tokyo and other prefectures.

ON the 17th instant the opening ceremony of the Mayebashi Competitive Exhibition will take place. It is stated that the exhibits consist of those from Tokyo and fourteen other prefectures.

THE Japanese authorities concerned are reported to be contemplating the despatch of two warships to attend King George's coronation. A Prince of the Blood will also be sent as Imperial representative.

It is reported from Seoul that, on receiving the news of the death of Viscount Sone, Princes Shotoku and Tokujin immediately sent a telegram of condolence to the family of the late ex-Resident-General.

It is said that the Japanese residents in Harbin decided some time ago to erect a monument to the late Prince Ito in that city, and their preparations are greatly advanced by the assistance of Russian authorities there.

THE cruiser Ikoma which arrived at Port Said on the 16th instant, is officially reported to have passed the Canal the same day. The cruiser is expected to return to Yokosuka about the 27th proximo, via Colombo and Singapore.

THE revised Berne Treaty for the protection of literary works and object of art, which has been signed at Berlin by the representatives of Japan and fourteen other countries, was promulgated on the 7th instant, being sanctioned by His Majesty the Emperor.

Mr. CHIBA TIJIRO, M.P. for Chiba prefecture, was arrested on the 16th instant on a charge of embezzlement. It is alleged that he misappropriated the money of the Shinkoku Life Insurance Company to the amount of 35,000 yen in connection with the recent by-election in Chiba prefecture.

THE investigations concerning the relief of private sufferers from the Russo-Japanese war, are practically completed, but a final meeting will be held shortly to report its result to the Foreign Minister. The bills will be transferred to the Ministry of Finance after approval by a Cabinet Council.

THE Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China inform us that they are in receipt of a telegram from their London Office intimating that the Directors of the Bank have declared an interim dividend for the half-year ended 30th June last at the rate of 13 per cent. per annum, free of Income Tax.

A KYOTO telephone message says that on Monday afternoon an explosion of a dynamite cartridge occurred in a tunnel which is now being constructed at Ikeo, near Uji, by the Ujiyama Electric Company. Seven workmen in the tunnel were more or less seriously injured. The accident is said to have been due to unwittingly hitting the cartridge with a pick-axe.

ON the night of the 16th instant a collision took place five miles off Vladivostock between a Russian volunteer steamship and a chain of five junks. These junks were laden with various effects salvaged from the stranded steamer Gaisen Maru.

One of the junks was sunk and a Chinese sailor is missing. The loss is estimated at 11,500 yen including a diving apparatus.

AT 10:09 a.m. on the 13th instant a slight earthquake shock was felt in Yokohama, lasting fifty seconds. The oscillations were principally in a northerly and southerly directions. Another shock was experienced at 3.35 a.m. on the 14th, which was more severe and lasted one minute and forty-three seconds the oscillations in this case running south-south-west and north-north-east.

HERR Dernburg who has been staying in Tokyo, will leave Shimbashi at 8.40 a.m. the 16th instant, and from Kobe he will board the steamer Momiji Maru to cruise the inland sea. Subsequently he proceeds to China via Chosen. During the latter half of October he will stay at Shanghai and, before leaving for home in the middle of November, will probably visit Canton and Hankow.

A NAGASAKI despatch says that at the instance of the Mayor and President of the Chamber of Commerce, the sum of 3,000 yen has been collected with the object of expressing sympathy with the marines and families of those who died on board the warship Bedford. The money was presented on the 7th instant to Vice-Admiral Winsloe who received it with much gratitude.

ACCORDING to the report made on the 31st ult. of revenue and expenditure during the 42nd fiscal year, it will be seen that there was an increase of 12,700,000 yen in ordinary revenue and that of 144,260,000 yen in extraordinary revenue, as compared with the estimates. As to the expenditure, a decrease of 12,040,000 yen in ordinary expenses and that of 7,129,000 yen in extraordinary ones, are reported.

THE flood relief fund, amounting to 246,000 yen including the Imperial donation of 15,000 yen and 10,000 yen contributed by Marquis Mayeda, is awaiting distribution by the Tokyo Municipality among the sufferers. As to the manner in which the fund is to be distributed, the Authorities are putting their heads together and it will not be long before the final decision will be given. The Imperial donation will be distributed in a special manner, in order that the sufferers may partake of the Imperial benevolence equally and impartially.

THE new loan of the Nippon Steel Foundry was first undertaken in London, but the terms proposed by the English capitalists were not such as the Company cared to accept, unless forced to do so. They therefore turned their eyes to the home market, where the conditions are as sluggish as ever, and have opened private negotiations with the six big banks. The Company has to answer the English Syndicate with whom it first negotiated by Saturday, so that whether the loan will be raised in the home market or abroad will have to be settled by that date.

THE fishing industry in Chosen is undergoing marked development year by year. According to an official report the number of fishermen, Japanese and Korean, fishingboats employed by them and the value of their catch last year were as follows:—

	Fisher-men.	Vessels.	Catch.	Average income.
			Yen.	Yen.
Japanese.....	16,644	3,898	3,418,850	205
Korean	68,520	12,411	3,171,900	45

It may be added that the capital invested in the industry by Japanese is 3,418,850 yen, while the amount invested by Koreans is 3,139,100 yen.

CHOSŌN.

It is stated that when the meeting of Councillors in Seoul came to consider the draft of the administrative system compiled in Tokyo, they found it defective in some practical respects. Necessary amendments were therefore made and the document was returned to Tokyo, where it is supposed to have already received approval. We need not enter into the details of the changes made by the Council in Seoul, as they are essentially of a technical character, and the completed system will doubtless be promulgated in a few days.

In the Asahi we find an interesting statement relating to the transport of passengers and goods between Japan and Chosen during the month of August. The number of travellers from Chosen to Japan was 5,748, and the number from Japan to Chosen 6,029, the increases, as compared with July, being 279 and 836, respectively. With regard to goods, the exports amounted to 3,171 tons and the imports (to Japan) to 1,679, the respective increases being 1,045 and 277. A curious feature about the exports from Japan was that they showed a large increase in wooden clogs and sauce-pans. The inference drawn by our contemporary is that this indicates an augmented number of settlers.

According to the Jiji Shimpō seven Korean would-be assassins landed recently on the coast of Izumo and proceeded to Inaba, in Tottori prefecture, thence making their way to Tokyo. They are attired in foreign or Japanese costume, and they speak fluently either the Japanese or the English language, so that their nationality is impossible to distinguish at first sight. Each carries a hand-bag containing an infernal machine. On the 2nd inst. one of the seven escaped from his comrades, and gave information of the plot, but the police of Inaba were nevertheless unable to effect any arrest. Due precautions have been taken to guard the persons whose lives are threatened, and as the police are said to be in possession of the names of the six men, their apprehension is expected to take place shortly.

Mr. Yi Yong-kyu, the titular leader of the Il Ching-hoi, is said to be fatally sick, and as a meeting of the members was considered necessary in view of the present situation, circulars inviting the presence of all affiliates were sent out in the name of the ex-President and original leader, Sun Pyong-chun. The meeting has not yet been held, but the expectation is that its proceedings will take the form of discussing a memorial addressed to the Resident-General with reference to the political situation, and that thereafter a vote for dissolving the Society will be passed. The disappearance of this association from the political arena will doubtless furnish an occasion for much comment. In the eyes of some on-lookers this Il Ching-hoi will be held to have acted anything but a patriotic part yet we cannot possibly deny that their leaders and members showed a much juster appreciation of the trend of the times than did any of those who condemned them most loudly at the outset. They have certainly contributed to the peaceful solution of a problem which might have been attended with much bloodshed.

A question which seems likely to press for speedy solution is that of the currency in Chosen. At present the system in that country is silver mono-metallism. The same system exists in Formosa, and both the Bank of Formosa and that of Chosen are empowered to issue silver convertible notes. On the other hand, the notes issued by the Bank of Japan are convertible into gold mono-metallism. Undoubtedly it will be for the convenience of commerce that this discrepancy should be remedied as soon as possible. The suggestion is that the Banks of Formosa and Chosen should both be deprived of their note-issuing power, which should be entrusted to the Bank of Japan alone.

The eight Koreans who were said to have entered Tokyo by a circuitous route with the intention of assassinating the leading politicians of that city, are gradually assuming a nebulous form. The Chief of the Metropolitan Police in Tokyo denies flatly that he has received any information to such an effect, and the Korean School authorities in the Japanese capital explain that the pseudo-assassins are really students returning to their work after the holidays. Shimono-seki, however, persists in sending alarmist telegrams. For our own part, we must confess that we found the story apocryphal from the outset. It was too circumstantial.

Japanese newspapers state that the Christian missionaries in Korea are about to organize a general meeting in Kaison within a few days. Their objects are to draw a distinct line between politics and propaganda, and, if possible, to introduce greater uniformity into their own methods of winning converts. It is said that they have it in contemplation to invite the most distinguished missionaries from Peking and Tokyo, in order to make the meeting's decisions as authoritative as possible. It is certainly unfortunate that the missionaries have not yet succeeded in wholly obliterating the false impression which exists in some quarters as to their attitude towards politics. On the other hand, we can well understand and sympathise with their reluctance to give factitious importance to idle rumours by noticing them officially.

It is observable that no radical changes are contemplated in the region of local administrative organs under the new regime in Chosen. Except that the principal officials are changed from Korean to Japanese, there is no radical alteration. Thus the provincial inspectors who have hitherto been Korean now become Japanese and receive the title of "Prefects" (Chōkwan), and the seconds-in-command, who have hitherto been Japanese, become Korean. For the rest, the organization of village headmen and so forth remains unaltered.

Six men have been arrested in Chosen on a charge of conspiring to produce agitation. Investigation shows that these six, none of whom enjoys any special reputation, were domiciled in Hawaii at the time of that place's incorporation into the United States, and from the tactics of the anti-amalgamationists at that time they learned the methods which they have now pursued in Chosen. Their principal plan was to send out circulars and platform lectures for the purpose of creating a public feeling hostile to Japan. Abundant proofs are said to have been found in a corollary to the effect that the association which calls itself the Chengwihoi, or Righteous Party, has at its back some influential personage. Of course by the latter term the ex-Emperor is designated. It would be strange if his Majesty did not make some struggle on behalf of his Dynasty.

We recently heard from two or three reporters that the criminals released in accordance with the amnesty proclaimed in Chosen had shown very great gratitude, and even enthusiasm, in favour of Japan. That was comprehensible enough. But it is more difficult to understand the action of a certain Mr. Kil and his associates. Mr. Kil is described as a graduate of a preparatory school, and the proposition ascribed to him is to collect subscriptions for setting up a monument to commemorate the annexation. The telegram suggests that there is an element of farce in this procedure, and it must be confessed that the inference seems natural.

We observed in a recent issue that there had not been any evidences of vitality on the part of the insurrection in Chosen for a considerable time. This period of calm is now broken by news from Yongdok, a place lying between Pyongan-do and Hanyong-do. The telegram says that a band of 130 insurgents have made their appearance in that district, and that a detachment of Japanese troops is engaged in dealing with them.

Among those released from arrest in connexion with the recent amnesty was Mr. Cho, a nephew of the ex-Emperor. A telegram from Seoul says that he has been again seized by the police on a charge of bribery and corruption, and the man from whom he received the bribe, namely a certain wealthy Mr. Yi, has also been apprehended. It is said that on searching the house of Cho a sum of 2,000 yen, which had been sent by Mr. Yi, was discovered, and so also were drafts of documents inciting the people to rebel against annexation. It will be remembered that the crime of which Cho was originally suspected was forgery of the ex-Emperor's seal in connexion with the payment of a large sum of money.

About 18 arrests of other persons have also been effected, and it appears likely that the number will receive considerable accessions. The offence in this case is posting up at various places in the Korean capital notices inciting the people to kill the former Ministers of State, and the leaders of the Il Ching-hoi, as of two other political parties.

One of the earliest results of the conversion of the Korean Peninsula into Japanese territory is that the Chinese Consul in Seoul has issued strict orders against the sale of lottery tickets in any shape or form. This will be a serious blow to not a few Chinese who were engaged in such traffic.

The newspaper organ of the Il Ching-hoi has published an article which is said to be strongly approved by many people. Its gist is that restitution should be made of the ranks and properties of all persons condemned for political offences subsequent to the murder of the Queen. It is claimed that among these persons there are included many men who worked zealously and unselfishly in their country's cause, but who are nevertheless suffering great hardships at present owing to poverty. This appeal includes the families of men who met their death owing to the prosecution of patriotic designs, as for example, Kin Ok-kyun. It must be confessed that the time seems to be badly chosen for advancing such a petition. All the Koreans concerned were, as they believed, acting in the cause of their country's independence. How is it possible to distinguish between them and men who from equally patriotic motives resort to violence as a protest against annexation? Patriotism is a very elastic term. It can be stretched in more directions than one.

It is stated that the arrears of taxation which have been remitted in accordance with the scheme of annexation aggregate 4 million yen and concern 4,300 persons. Curiously enough, unless the telegraph errs, the number of those released from prison owing to the amnesty totals also 4,300.

The retiring Sovereign of Chosen has exercised his last power of granting distinctions in a very generous manner. He has granted to Japanese subjects who have served his country no less than eight Grand Orders of Merit, six First Class Orders; two Second Class and several of lower degree.

The agitation continues among Koreans in foreign countries, and it is now beginning to be believed that they have relations with some influential person or persons in Korea. Evidently the allusion is to the old Emperor, namely Li Dai-O, or to a coterie of the Yangan. Japanese newspapers are plainly of the opinion that the present visit to Tokyo of Mr. Yamagata, Vice-Resident General, is connected with this question. They think that the Japanese Government has some intention of taking steps to restrain the mischievous potentialities of the Korean agitators, whatever their leadership. Mr. Yamagata, on his arrival at Shimonoseki, was interviewed by a representative of the Asahi Shimbun, but he observed strict reticence on every topic except the reorganization of the administrative machine, and even in that realm he declined to be explicit. Asked whether the ex-Emperor, Li-O, is not contemplating a visit to Japan, Mr. Yamagata replied simply that he had not heard anything of the kind.

It is beginning to be observed in Japan that the former Emperor of Korea has not yet made any recognition of the visit paid to him by an Imperial Envoy from Japan, who represented to him his patent of Prince.

The newsmongers are really becoming too meticulous. They make clubs out of needles. The latest story which the services of the telegraph have been enlisted to circulate is that a certain Mr. Yung called recently at the Residency-General and obtained an interview with the Secretary, Count Kodama. Mr. Yung explained that he had served formerly as interpreter to the Japanese gendarmes, and also as an officer of the disbanded army. He declared his sincere admiration of the methods pursued by Viscount Terauchi, and he announced his own satisfaction at finding himself a Japanese subject.

Then he wound up by asking that a suitable office should be found for him. "This," sapiently observes the telegraphist, "shows how the wind is blowing." It is indeed a veritable straw.

Mr. Ishizuka, Councillor of the Residency-General, has just returned to Tokyo. He is understood to be the bearer of a draft scheme for the administration of the New Territory. As to this, he is of course reticent, since the project has still to be submitted to the proper authorities in Tokyo. But it is evident that the question of public rights and private rights for the new subjects of Japan has been a topic of profound thought by the Authorities concerned. We gather from Mr. Ishizuka's remarks that the idea is to confer a full measure of private rights, but that there will necessarily be certain restrictions in the matter of public rights. We also gather that it is the intention not to disturb the officials now serving in Korea unless some changes be unavoidable, whether on account of the modified system or because of personal incompetence. Whenever dismissals have to take place, a fitting solatium will be given to the retiring official. Mr. Ishizuka says that 30,000 copies of a document explaining the reasons and the purposes of annexation were printed and exposed in public places throughout the whole of Chosen, so that facilities were afforded to the people for forming a clear conception of the whole incident.

Major-General Takeda, who is in charge of the Coal Briquette Factories at Tokuyama in Chosen and at Pyongyang in Korea, is quoted by the Asahi Shimbun as saying that the latter factory was started by the Korean Government some years ago with a capital of 250,000 yen, but it proved a white elephant. Finally Viscount Sone, when he occupied the post of Resident-General, entered into a contract with the Japanese Naval Department to supply 70,000 tons annually at a cost of from 4 to 5 yen per ton. In consideration of this contract the Korean Government invested a further amount of 700,000 yen in the mine, and arrangements were made for the production of 100,000 tons annually, of which 30,000 were for private consumption. The calculation is that the enterprise will yield a profit of 150,000 yen per year. Since the annexation the Factory has been handed over to the Japanese Government, and will be carried on as before, the interest and the principal of the invested capital being paid off in the space of a few years.

A curious statement appears in the columns of the Asahi Shimbun. It relates to the object of the Vice-Resident-General, Mr. Yamagata, in returning to Japan. According to this statement, it has hitherto been found impossible to obtain suitable persons for filling the important office of Provincial Governors in Chosen. There are thirteen provinces, and that number of Governors is required, but no candidates have offered themselves, and the men immediately available are not thought qualified to discharge the duties of such a post. Mr. Yamagata himself has therefore returned to Japan in search of candidates. The whole story sounds very doubtful. The position of Provincial Governor in Korea, though not over-well paid, is of such importance that scores of candidates should be at once forthcoming, especially when we remember that the slowness of promotion and the difficulty of finding employment are constant causes of complaint in Japan.

It was clearly foreseen when Japan annexed Korea that many troublesome problems would present themselves for solution. One of them is now pressing for settlement. It is the manner of dealing with Korean officials whose services are no longer required. These officials have been disposed to welcome annexation in the belief that it would put a substantial solatium into their pockets. But we read in Tokyo newspapers that on coming to add up the various sums required to satisfy these retiring officials, the total assumes inconveniently large dimensions. Thus it is being considered whether, instead of granting a lump sum and paying it at once, the better plan will not be to give a small pension in some cases, and in others to spread the payment of the solatium over a number of years in corresponding installments. If this system be adopted, however, something very like consternation will be produced in the bosoms of the discharged officials, and as the Authorities are naturally anxious to avoid furnishing causes of discontent, the solution of the problem is giving some trouble.

According to the 52nd article of the proclamation recently made by the Resident-General of Chosen, Chinese labourers may be employed to work outside the limits of the settlements provided that the sanction of the local authorities be obtained. It is said that there are 6,346 Chinese subjects thus employed, and the question of competition with Japanese and Korean labourers is becoming serious. The Seoul correspondent of the Asahi Shimbun says that it is being considered whether the local authorities cannot contrive to make their measures more exclusive. Apparently this question inspires the Japanese with feelings similar to those entertained against Chinese and Japanese labour in the United States, Canada and Australasia.

On the 12th instant a general meeting of foreign missionaries in Chosen was held in Seoul. The greatest privacy was observed, not even Korean pastors being admitted. It is consequently impossible to make any detailed statement as to the nature of the subject discussed, though the Asahi's correspondent undertakes to give some information. A committee was appointed, and it waited upon the Resident-General on the 14th inst. Our Tokyo contemporary's correspondent refers to the abolition of consular jurisdiction as one of the subjects which occupied the attention of the meeting. That is probable enough, but we have little doubt that by no class of men will a heartier welcome be given to this change than by the missionaries. Practically all the misinterpretations to which they have hitherto been exposed in Korea may be traced to the extra-territorial system. Native converts have believed that by embracing Christianity they would pass under the aegis of consular authority and would thus secure a large measure of exemption from responsibility towards the laws of the land. Nothing seemed capable of dispelling this delusion, and therefore the total removal of its proximate cause should be regarded with satisfaction by the missionaries.

FORMOSA.

We read in Japanese papers that the junction of the two columns moving westward and eastward respectively from Gilan and Shinchiku, is practically completed. It remains, however, to finish the line of wire entanglements stretching along the whole of the Japanese front. When that is effected, the aborigines will be invited to surrender, and one of the conditions will be that they hand over the whole of their arms and ammunition.

On the 10th instant the Shinchiku column effected a junction with the Gilan column. It is now anticipated that, although a slight engagement may possibly take place on the Shinchiku side, no further difficulty of a serious nature will be encountered, and consequently the first stage of the campaign may be said to have been terminated.

CHINA.

There is talk of establishing a Chinese-American Bank in China, having its headquarters in Tientsin. The chief promoter is Mr. Liang Tung-yen.

It is now stated as beyond question that the Chinese Government has decided upon the course referred to in our last issue, namely, the raising of a foreign loan by the Treasury in its own name, and the subsequent distribution of the money among the provinces affected by the railway-construction scheme. This result is said to have been brought about by the keen canvassing of the representatives of the American and German syndicates. It is not, however, settled as yet by any means from what country the money shall be borrowed.

The telegraph says that on the 5th inst. another conference took place with regard to the question of the Fushun mine, but as no conclusion was reached, the plenipotentiaries decided to meet again. The problem at issue is not very important, as it concerns the title of a solitary Chinese subject.

An elementary school for the study of the Chinese and Japanese languages has been opened in Tiehling. The principal promoters are Mr. Marita, the Japanese Vice-Consul, and Mr. Hsu, the Chinese Chi-hsien.

The question of the Kaiping Coal-mine is said to have been settled by the Chinese agreeing to pay a sum of 150,000 pounds.

The Association of Chinese Editors, spoken of in a recent issue, has been definitely formed. Thus far there are 50 members, and it has been decided that they shall hold one general meeting annually. Only men genuinely engaged in journalistic enterprise will be admitted to membership.

The German coal-mines in Shantung are said to have contracted for supplying coal to the Hamburg-American and North-German Lloyd S.S. lines.

The new Minister of War, Mr. Ying, is reported to have recommended very drastic reforms in the organization and training of the Chinese troops, and in consequence the officials of the Board of War are alleged to be exceedingly busy. The public must be getting a little weary, by this time, of rumours about the Chinese army and navy. If China were really in earnest about these two branches of her polity, the world would sit up and watch her keenly. But there have been so many false alarms that the wolf may perhaps enter unobserved after all.

Although late in the day, the Hankow vernacular newspapers are said to have now commenced to discuss the annexation of Korea. The gist of their criticisms is that the impulse of expansion is not to be checked. Give a country an inch, and it will take an ell. Japan in Korea to-day means Japan in Manchuria to-morrow, and from the latter a further advance will be equally inevitable. As for the Russo-Japanese Convention, these journals are said to regard it as a document of partition.

Further news from Nanking shows that the Chinese Press Association has become an accomplished fact. It includes 62 members. It will have its head office in Shanghai, and will appoint united-press correspondent, in Peking, Shanghai, Hankow, Hongkong and Canton. It will also send special representatives to Lhasa, Kulung, Uriastai, Ili, St. Petersburg and Washington. The Association has decided that inasmuch as its main purpose is to deal with basic problems of the Chinese Empire, it will not admit any foreign associates.

The news is confirmed that the Kaiping coal-mine question has been settled, China agreeing to pay a sum of £150,000.

Rumour is again busy with the probable restoration of Yuan Shih-kai to power. There appears to be no doubt that Prince Tsai-tao, on his return from the West, strongly espoused Yuan's cause, and it is patent that many of the late Viceroy's most puissant partisans have been recalled to office, the obvious inference being that Yuan himself will presently receive a summons from the Throne. It is now said, however, that, as his removal from office was the act of the Prince Regent, his reappointment without any ostensible cause would reflect upon the judgment of the Prince. Consequently the present idea is that Yuan should be given some opportunity of making a coup sufficiently signal to warrant his return to office in the neighbourhood of the Throne. With that intent there is talk of appointing him Viceroy of Hupeh and Hunan, so that he may take in hand the question of the Yeh-Han Loan. If he succeeds in extricating his country from the difficulties into which she has fallen in connexion with that affair, there will be sufficient pretext for appointing him to a metropolitan office. The question remains, however, will Yuan himself be willing to undergo this test? Mr. Tei, the well known sinologue of the Foreign Office in Tokyo, is quoted by several journals as expressing great doubts whether Yuan will consent to be relegated to a position in Southern China, where he would be separated from all his old supporters, and where he would have to deal with a captious and critical body of local literati.

Reports from Liaoyang indicate that very little success has crowned the efforts of the Chinese troops in dealing with the body of bandits who have lately been raiding in the vicinity of Liaoyang. The troops came into actual contact with these Hungtusz on the 6th inst., and it is claimed that the bandits were driven from one of their camps. This effort, however, seems to have exhausted the strength of the Government troops, who are said to have been for several days without adequate food or rest. At all events, while the Chinese soldiers were passing the night in skirmishing order, the Hungtusz took advantage of the darkness to invade a neighbouring village, and to carry thence a number of hostages from under the very noses of the Government troops. Subsequently the bandits made their appearance in the neighbourhood of Fushun. The whole affair seems to have created a feeling of much alarm. It is even said that the bandits would raid the town of Liaoyang itself, as they formerly raided Newchwang, were not the Japanese in garrison there.

It is stated that the recent floods at Hsinmintun inflicted a loss of 5 million yen on the people of the district. The number of houses wholly or partially destroyed was 4,000; the people rendered homeless totalled 17,000, and the area devastated measures 6 million tsubo. An application for assistance has been made to the Peking Government.

News comes from Peking that the reappearance of Yuan Shih kai upon the political stage is not so imminent as has been hitherto supposed. His partisans are busily urging his return to office, but Yuan himself is not disposed to take a step which would involve him immediately in troublesome negotiations with foreign Powers, and which would be likely to bring discredit rather than renown. He would naturally prefer that his first work on returning to politics should be in connexion with some purely domestic problem. It is owing to this reluctance on Yuan's part and to the attendant uncertainty that Tang Shao-yi is abstaining from entering Peking or taking up the duties of the post to which he was recently appointed. There is also some talk of political interference by the Empress Dowager, but this rumour is vague.

A document is said to have been addressed to the Council of State in Peking by a number of men calling themselves "Korean students in Japan," but evidently employing that designation to hide their Chinese identity. The document recounts three features which China has in common with Korea, and which, if not corrected, will inevitably plunge China into the same morass as that into which Korea has fallen. Unfortunately the telegram does not particularize these features, so that the interest of the information is comparatively small.

Among the latest rumours from China we find one to the effect that the Japanese have materially increased their military forces in the vicinity of Mukden and Fushun. This story appears to have gained credit with the Viceroy of Manchuria, who is now on a visit to Peking. He is said to have telegraphed to the local officials in the regions concerned, desiring them to investigate and report with all possible celerity. The same telegram says that the Viceroy has spoken very strongly about the Hungtusz raids in Manchuria, and has declared that they are highly injurious to China's prestige. In so speaking, his Excellency is unquestionably correct. Nothing reflects more severely upon China's administrative competence than the fact that for many years her subjects in Manchuria have been perpetually exposed to outrages at the hands of these bandits.

We may mention here that the Viceroy has been persuaded by the Prince Regent to remain in office. His Excellency seems to have been quite in earnest in his efforts to relieve himself of the difficulties of his present post, but the Prince Regent would not hear of his retirement.

The Waiwupu, according to a Peking telegram to the Asahi Shimbun, has instructed the local authorities in Manchuria to the effect that the annexation of Korea having made the continental territories of Japan and China conterminous, greater care than ever must be exercised in dealing with international questions.

It is a curious fact in the history of the world that the neighbourhood of a civilized Power is much less welcome to modern States than the propinquity of a semi-barbaric country. A vivid illustration of this is furnished by the caution which Great Britain and Russia exercise to preserve Afghanistan as a buffer between them. It might be supposed that every internal commotion in Afghanistan, which is a country notoriously subject to such episodes, would cause anxiety to the neighbours and constitute a menace to their peace and friendship. From that point of view the propinquity of a civilized Power which knows how to maintain law and order should be infinitely preferable. But that is not so with England and Russia, and now we find China perturbed by the neighbourhood of Japan. After all, the elementary passions bulk very largely in the estimates that nations form of each other.

From the latest Chinese news it would appear that Yuan Shih-kai's return to power is associated in the minds of many politicians with the reality of progressive reforms. If Yuan be not reinstated, the apprehension is that the reform movement will receive a distinct set-back. It was because of his association with progress that a large part of the Chinese vernacular press and a group of earnest statesmen advocated Yuan's recall, and it is said that the Prince Regent himself was more or less affected by the strength of this sentiment. But apparently the public will have to be content with sentiment only on this occasion. The agitation for Yuan's re-appointment seems to be dying a natural death. The time has not come.

Another rumour is now started to the effect that the functions that would have been discharged by Yuan are to be entrusted to his able fellow-thinker and some-time co-adjutor, Tuan Fang, now Viceroy of Hu kwang.

A telegram from Hankow to the Jiji Shimpō says that the amount collected hitherto by the people of Hupeh for the purposes of the Chuan-Han Railway is only 150,000 taels. They expect, however, that this total will be raised to 700,000 taels before the end of the year, and their idea is to apply the money to the building of the Hangkow-Haitien Railway, a distance of only 13 miles. This sounds very like a fiasco, in consideration of the clamour hitherto made by the Hupeh folks about the railway-loan question.

The correspondent of the Mainichi Dempo sends some interesting news about the Pinhsiang coal mine, and the coöperative enterprise carried on there by Japanese and Chinese. We read that Messrs Okura & Co. have lent a sum of 2 million yen to the Chinese mine-owners, on condition that the Company receives 20,000 tons of coke annually and enjoys the monopoly of its sale. At the same time the Mitsui Firm has lent 300,000 yen to the mine-owners, but on what conditions we do not clearly decipher. A monopoly of the sale of ammonia and the sale of coke is mentioned, but that would obviously be in conflict with the Okura agreement. The main point, however, is that at this mine the Chinese are working cheerfully with Japanese capital and are credited with saying that their rights' recovery aspirations are not at all hampered by recourse to Japanese money. It appears that the 300,000 yen lent by the Mitsui Company is to go to Germany in payment of the price of machinery ordered there.

A Chinese newspaper published in Peking has just been convicted of a grave blunder. In connection with the recent arrival of Prince Tsai-Hsun at Nagasaki, en route for the Occident, the Peking journal complained of Japan's action in sending nobody of higher rank than a colonel to greet the Prince. Tokyo newspapers, referring to this complaint, point out that the error is entirely on the side of the Peking newspaper, which ignores the fact that the Prince was travelling incognito, and that consequently the Japanese Authorities were not required by strict etiquette to take any official notice whatever of his journey. Actuated, however, by motives of pure courtesy, they dispatched a chamberlain, a naval post-captain and two commanders to Nagasaki, in order to provide fully for all the Prince's wants. Thus, in point of fact, the Peking journal should have expressed appreciation and gratitude instead of complaint.

There is news of another audacious act on the part of the Hunghutsz. On the 9th inst., a small steamer owned by a Russian subject, set out from Harbin to Petona, having on board the owner and the captain together with some 60 passengers, whose nationality is not given. At a point some 7 or 8 miles from Harbin the steamer was boarded by a party of 14 Hunghutsz, who killed the owner and the captain, and held the passengers up, robbing them of a large quantity of money and goods which were carried to a junk anchored in the river for that purpose. News of the outrage reached Harbin the following day, and two gunboats were immediately despatched in pursuit of the Hunghutsz, but they failed to find any trace of them. One of the gunboats returned to Harbin on the following day, and the other remained to continue the quest.

MANCHURIA.

Rumour is again busy with the affairs of the Yalu Timber Company. The enterprise is now declared to be a total failure, and the Directors are said to be endeavouring to re-sell the rafts to the woodmen. The telegraphed accounts of the affair are too vague and confused to be clearly comprehended, but they amount to saying that in spite of strenuous efforts, no market whatever has been found for the timber, although the rafts floated down by purely private enterprise have been readily sold.

It is alleged that an agreement has been come to between the Chinese and the Japanese commissioners for regulating the traffic on the Kilin-Chanchun Railway, which is now in course of construction. The details of the compact resemble those relating to the junction of the East China Railway and the South-Manchuria Road. It is stated, further, that the Chinese commissioners have adopted a very friendly attitude throughout this negotiation.

The decision of the Peking Government that Shih Liang is to remain at his post as Viceroy of Manchuria is said to have been mainly due to the fact that no suitable remplaçant can be found. To say nothing of financial difficulties, there are quite enough complications to fully occupy the attention and to test the diplomacy of the Mukden authorities. For example, there is the problem of opening a port and constructing a harbour at Lienshan; there is the problem of the Korean settlers in the interior of Manchuria, and there is the problem of fortifying the Manchurian border. This last question seems to occupy a prominent place in the thoughts of Chinese statesmen, now that Japan has annexed Korea. But seeing that the Viceroy is perplexed to bring together the ends of the ordinary budget, one is puzzled to think where he can hope to find funds for a big and unproductive undertaking like the fortification of the Eastern frontier of Manchuria. Confronted by a problem of this kind, one is forcibly reminded of the indifference which China has shown for many centuries to the duty of equipping herself with adequate warlike defences. She may be said to have lived on the sufferance of the nations.

A NEW FRAUD.

Some excitement was caused a few days ago by the arrest of Mr. Chiba Teitaro, who represents Chiba prefecture in the Seiyū-kai interest in the Diet. For a moment some mystery attended the arrest, but the details now appear to be clear enough. It seems that Mr. Chiba took the lead sometime ago in forming a life insurance company called the Shinkaku Seimei Hoken-kaisha, the ideograph Shin (holy) being intended to indicate that the chief object of the Company was to insure the lives of the disciples of the Tenrikyō sect. The capital subscribed was 500,000 yen, and considerable success seems to have attended the Company's early operations, for it wrote no fewer than 20,000 policies in Tokyo alone. Here, however, the trouble begins. It is claimed that Mr. Chiba has expended upon his own election and upon other private purposes no less than 25,000 yen of the Company's capital, that the policies written total 11 million yen; that there are no reserves of any kind, and that 110,000 yen are now actually due and cannot be paid. Mr. Chiba recently resigned the Presidency of the Company in favour of Mr. Naito Roichi, another Seiyūkai representative in the Diet, who became famous 30 odd years ago on the occasion of the attack on Count Itagaki in Aichi, when he seized the would-be assassin.

THE "SOCHITSU-RYO."

One of the principal features of the newly organized Bureau of the Imperial Household Department is a council (Shingi-kai) which will be charged with the duty of investigating and pronouncing judgment upon all offences laid to the charge of peers of the realm. For this purpose the Council will assume the form of a judicial chamber, and will be empowered to summon to its presence and to examine any nobleman who is charged with committing an offence, or otherwise disgracing his order.

Commenting upon the above, the Asahi Shimbun remarks that the only moral quality which the nations are agreed in attributing to Japan is loyalty. So far as that element of character is concerned, the people have nothing to learn from the peers. But there is still ample margin for the exercise of pattern qualities by the nobles. One case specially may be instanced. The peers are little better than the people in the matter of resorting to corrupt measures in connexion with parliamentary and local elections. There it is that they might set a really useful example to their social inferiors. These thoughts are doubtless suggested to the Asahi by the political squabbles now going on in the ranks of the peers, and by the fact that a general election for the Upper House will take place next year.

On the 8th instant the steamer Anshin Maru plying between Niigata and Tsubame by the route of the Shinano River, accidentally struck against the supports of a bridge, so that the bridge fell down and the vessel sank. Twenty passengers were drowned and many others more or less seriously injured.

THE UNREST IN SEOUL.

With regard to the incidents recently reported in the case of the Normal School in Seoul, it appears that a circular has been found which bears the post-mark of the 4th instant, and which is believed to have emanated from some of the students. Our readers will remember that a large number of the students and teachers at this school are on strike, though they have not proclaimed any reason for abandoning their studies. The circular says that, in consideration of recent political events, this is not a time for Korean youths to devote themselves to the acquisition of academical learning; their country calls for their services in another field. It is believed that the document has been communicated to the students of the Industrial School and the High School in the Korean capital, for at these institutions also signs of unrest are apparent. The police are making strenuous efforts to trace the authorship of the circular. Meanwhile twelve students of the High School have been apprehended on a charge of sending to the ex-Emperor a document of an incendiary character.

A piece of news from northern Chholla-do falls aptly into this context. It is that a meeting attended by some 500 persons has just been held in that district for the purpose of reading the rescript issued by the Japanese Emperor announcing the annexation of Chosen.

Twenty-one students of the Normal School in Seoul, who are now under arrest, include their leader, Wang, who is said to have practised the familiar method of cutting off the little finger of his left hand, and writing an incendiary document with the blood. The excitement was intensified by a rumour appearing in some of the vernacular newspapers to the effect that it was in contemplation to remove from Seoul to Tokyo the Normal School and other important educational institutions. The original of the circular has been found, and it contains some traces which may serve for the discovery of other leaders of the strike. It is believed that the document has been widely circulated throughout the Peninsula.

The patriots in Korea appear also to have addressed themselves to their fellow-countrymen residing in Hawaii, and have incited them to form a Loyal League. In fact, it is evident that in spite of the calm which seems to prevail outwardly, there are considerable elements of unrest in Korea, and if the present state of watchfulness were relaxed, serious consequences might ensue.

It is scarcely necessary to add that the Koreans in San Francisco are taking a strong part in the agitation. In fact, Vladivostok, Hawaii, San Francisco and the Normal School in Seoul may be said to be the centres of disturbance. The students of the Preparatory School in Chong-jin have also gone on strike, but this is a matter of very minor importance.

In connexion with the above, it is interesting to consider the number of Koreans residing outside the borders of Chosen. According to an official statement published by the Asahi Shimbun, there are 30,000 in China, 10,000 in Vladivostok, and 20,000 in the United States and Hawaii. These figures must be mere approximations, and it is uncertain whether they include the Koreans settled in Chientao.

A curious telegram comes to the Jiji

Shimbun from Chemulpo. It is to the effect that a number of Christian converts have asked the missionaries to assist them in moving into the foreign settlements. Apparently they labour under the delusion that Consular jurisdiction still exists, and that it offers some kind of asylum against the evils of annexation.

On the other side of the account has to be placed the fact that there is a tendency among some Koreans to change their names into a Japanese form. This has had curious results at a place called Tokchong, in Pyongan-do. The Japanese sound of the Korean "Tokchong" is "Tokugawa," and it results that the followers of the new fashion in that region make their debut on the Japanese stage under a very illustrious name.

THE VLADIVOSTOCK KOREANS.

There is a curious telegram in the Jiji Shimpō from Seoul. It refers to the doings of Mr. Yi Pon-yung, the leader of the Korean agitators in Vladivostok and on the north-western border. He is represented as being in a position to employ assassins without limit, and there would be no difficulty in finding 700 or 800 students to engage in a campaign of bomb-throwing. But Mr. Yi is represented as fearing that, if the latter plan were resorted to, it would be attended with one great danger, namely, that an incautious or reckless student might be arrested at any moment, and the discovery of all his accomplices would inevitably follow. This news suggests two points. One is that many Koreans are still living in the atmosphere of the middle ages, when assassination was deemed a perfectly legitimate political weapon. The other is that Mr. Yi, and doubtless all his followers, believe that torture is still employed under Japanese auspices in Korea to elicit evidence in criminal cases. Otherwise such a contingency as the arrest of one student would not suggest inferences so disquieting.

The Russian gendarmes in Vladivostok seem to have found sufficient evidence of Yi Pong-yun's activity to warrant a search of his house. Forty or fifty men were accordingly detailed to visit his residence and, if possible, to arrest him, as well as two of his accomplices. But Yi had obtained information of what was pending, and he and his comrades made themselves scarce in good time. It appears to be certain that these men had matured a plot for invading North-Western Korea, and that they had obtained 500 stand of Russian rifles for the purposes of their enterprise. It is obvious that such an attempt must have proved a mere fiasco, and therefore we cannot sympathise with it.

Somewhat fuller details are telegraphed as to the action of the Russian Authorities at Vladivostok. We read that on the 12th inst. the Russian police entered the Korean quarter of the city and effected 13 or 14 arrests. Among these were two men having the very common name of Yi. One was the person sent by the ex-Emperor to the Hague Tribunal, the other was the politician who presented a memorial on the subject of annexation some time ago. On the 13th instant the police renewed their operations, and made a thorough search of the Korean quarter. Their direct object seems to have been the arrest of the insurgent leader, Yi Pong-yun, and the seizure of incriminating documents. In both respects the raid was unsuccessful.

ELECTRIC RAILWAYS IN TOKYO.

On the 12th instant at the ordinary meeting of the City Assembly the supporters of the elevated electric railway were conspicuous by their total absence, and the project was rejected unanimously. The business did not end there, however. A Representation was introduced by Mr. Yamaguchi reflecting very severely on the management of the Tokyo Railway. The representation claimed that although the length of the Company's lines has increased, the number of cars employed have diminished. The following figures are given in support of the statement:—

1910.
Month	Cars	Car-miles.
6th	20,756	2,334,000
7th	21,650	2,400,000
8th	19,150	2,070,000

1909.
Month	Cars	Car-miles.
6th	22,339	2,412,865
7th	23,244	2,461,720
8th	22,633	2,388,522

This diminution of the number of cars must not be taken literally in the case of last month, seeing that exceptional conditions existed in consequence of the floods. But the other figures certainly do seem to indicate that the Company has been economising. The Representation alleges that great discontent is caused among passengers by the paucity of cars: it leads to over-crowding, to long waits in the rain, and to the virtual impossibility of getting seats for children. Mr. Yamaguchi urges that the Municipal Authorities should take up this question; should insist upon sufficiency of cars; should impose a strict limit on the number of passengers carried, and should require that doors be placed in the middle of bogie-cars. The City Assembly adopted this resolution almost unanimously. No one suggested the obviously just view that so long as the Government and the city veto the levying of a reasonable fare, they cannot impose conditions as to the numbers of cars run or the number of passengers carried.

VISCOUNT TERAUCHI AND MR. BRAHAM.

On the 7th instant Mr. D. D. Braham, Assistant-Editor of the Foreign Department of The Times, lunched with the Resident-General in Seoul. Mr. Braham is said to have stated that whereas, in view of a military man having been appointed to the leading position in Korea, the public had looked for the adoption of military methods, it had been a great relief to find that events contradicted that forecast. With regard to Japan's action, Mr. Braham went on to say that the extension of the life of the present Customs' system for ten years would be deemed very satisfactory by the Powers, but he trusted that the Resident-General would give some assurance about the inviolability of foreign vested interests after the expiration of that period.

The Resident-General is quoted as having replied that the idea of the Japanese Government in extending the tariff period for ten years, was that in that time Korean institutions, both social and political, would be brought into comparatively close resemblance to Japanese. His Excellency did not undertake to say what might happen after the expiration of that period, but he did unhesitatingly assert that permanent respect would be paid to the vested interests of foreigners in the Peninsula.

THE IL CHING-HOI.

The Il Ching-hoi family seems to be divided against itself. Three of its members have been arrested on a charge of conspiring to force the hands of their leaders. The accusation sounds rather vague, but it appears to be gravely preferred. Altogether there is a possibility that the Il Ching hoi may prove troublesome to deal with. Several of them are said to claim that annexation was rendered possible mainly through their efforts. One would suppose that, if such were the case, their absorbing desire would be to conceal the fact, instead of parading it as a claim for compensation.

It may be here mentioned that the Chief of Police in Seoul has summoned the leaders of all the political parties and instructed them to dissolve their associations. Considering that these various coteries were formed when the country was independent, it is evident that their raison d'être must have disappeared in the sequel of annexation, and therefore their continued existence does not seem likely to conduce to any good purpose.

The latest news about the Il Ching-hoi is that it has been formally dissolved as a political party and that its nucleus has been formed into an agricultural company. The ceremony of dissolution took place in the presence of the founder of the party, its titular leader being prevented by illness from attending.

It is stated that the above leader, Mr. Yi Yong-kyu, who is now lying mortally sick, has presented a memorial to the Japanese Government, urging that the franchise shall be at once given to the people of Chosen on the same bases as those adopted in Japan. This is certainly a difficult question. The Japanese themselves underwent a course of preparation extending over more than 15 years before they were enfranchised, and it will scarcely be contended that their condition at the outset of that period was less advanced than is the condition of the Koreans to-day. It would seem to be a matter of the most ordinary prudence and commonsense that some probation should be undergone by the Koreans before they are permitted to enjoy a full measure of public rights.

PRISONS IN KOREA.

It is interesting to note that one of the many easily foreseeable difficulties which Japan will have to encounter in dealing with Chosen has already arisen. To push the new territory at once from its backward condition into line with Japanese progress would obviously be extravagant; but, on the other hand, to leave the interval conspicuously unbridged would be intolerable. What is to be done about jails, for example? The Korean prisons of to-day are about as bad as the prisons of Europe and Japan were in mediæval times. Some slight improvement has been effected in the past few years, but nothing even approximately radical has yet been done. It was proposed to insert in the budget for next year a grant of 250,000 yen for purposes of prison improvement, and out of this amount the idea was to spend 150,000 on a model jail. Objections were raised, however, that such a prison would only set up a standard as yet unattainable, and would therefore tend to create discontent. The Koreans know what they have, and are fairly reconciled to it; whereas, if they were suddenly confronted with what they might have, their minds would be likely to develop considerable dissatisfaction. These objections, though they are not without some validity, are said to have been set aside, and it has been decided to build a model prison as soon as possible, so that the country may be encouraged to live up to a new ideal in this respect as in all others.

THE "YANGPAN."

It has always been anticipated that a difficulty would be experienced in dealing with the Yangpan. Nobody, so far as we know, has ever advanced any plausible reasons for treating this section of the Korean people in an exceptional manner. The chief feature which recommends the Yangpan to official consideration is that their custom has been to lead a life of idleness and that any attempt to radically cure their parasitic habit would involve great suffering. If it be a paramount object in Japan's eyes that all causes of discontent should be removed from the path of the new regime, she may be disposed to accord special treatment to the Yangpan. The trouble is, however, that these idlers have become an object of aversion to other sections of the people, and if the former be munificently dealt with, the latter will be proportionately disgusted. Symptoms of this mood have shown themselves in the writings of the Il Ching-hoi organ. It is rumoured that the views there expressed are inspired by a knowledge of the Japanese Government's intentions, and that there is no intention of making any exception in the Yangpan's favour when distributing the fund set aside for rewarding distinguished public services. Meanwhile there are some symptoms that the Yangpan themselves include some malcontents in their ranks. Five of them have been arrested and examined on a charge of conspiracy, but the result of the examination tends to show that they have no accomplices.

RAILWAYS IN KOREA.

Some interesting particulars about the Korean railways are given in the columns of the Asahi Shinbun. The object of our contemporary's article is to incite the Authorities to a more rapid provision of facilities for communication. The only lines that can be said to be in working order are the Seoul-Chemulpo, which measures 25 miles, and the main trunk road from Seoul to Wiju, a distance of 587 miles. But on this trunk road some 80 miles have to be relaid or otherwise improved if a quick and efficient service of trains is to be organized. Then there is a line from Sanlanggin to Masampho, a distance of 25 miles. This is a branch of the Seoul-Fusan road, and very great engineering difficulties are said to have been encountered. Finally, we have the Pyongyang-Chinampho road, 34 miles, which will be open for traffic on the 3rd of next November. Our contemporary speaks also of the Antung-Mukden railway, work on which is progressing rapidly. We cannot discern, however, the exact time when this road is expected to be finished. All that is quite clear is that, on its completion, the distance between Mukden and Antung will be traversable in 13 hours.

THE KOREAN TARIFF.

An anonymous diplomat, who is now not in office but who is designated an illustrious man, is quoted by the Chuo Shinbun, which is the Seiyu-kai organ, as saying that the Japanese Foreign Office has shown great weakness with regard to the Korean tariff. He thinks that 10 years is altogether too long a period to leave the tariff in its present form. As a matter of fact, England was practically the only country which had to be considered in this matter. Out of every 1,000 yen worth of imports into the Peninsula, 596 yen worth go from Japan; 177 from Great Britain; 132 from China; 66 from America; 14 from Germany; 8 from Russia and 2 from France. These figures show that although some consideration may be due to America, Germany, France and Russia had no valid title to be consulted at all. England, however, showed herself thoroughly friendly in this matter. She gave it to be understood that a few months' law would have satisfied her. Therefore the Chuo's informant thinks that 2 or 3 years would have been ample for the continuance of the present tariff, and although he admits that there is no use in "counting the age of a dead child," he insists that the Diet should demand an explanation from the Government next session.

THE CHIENTAO QUESTION AGAIN.

The arrangement arrived at between China and Japan after their long dispute about the ownership of Chientao was that China's sovereignty should be recognized in the region, and the Korean subjects should be free to reside and carry on all kinds of enterprises outside treaty-limits, provided that they submitted to Chinese jurisdiction. This arrangement is somewhat disturbed by the annexation of Chosen. There are no longer any "Korean subjects." All those hitherto residing under that appellation in the interior of Chientao have become Japanese subjects, and are therefore exempted from Chinese jurisdiction. But if this latter condition be enforced, it would follow that all the Koreans now living outside treaty-limits in Chientao must remove forthwith to places within those limits. That would be highly inconvenient in many cases, it not disastrous. The Chinese Authorities are said to desire that such removal should be effected, but the Japanese are disposed to advocate a continuance of the existing order of things as fixed by the Chientao Convention. Here, then, we have the materials for another Chientao question, though not by any means so difficult of solution as its predecessor.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN TRADE.

The trade returns for the first ten days of the current month are as follow:—

	Yen.
Exports	12,642,000
Imports	9,853,000
Excess of Exports.....	2,181,000

The returns from the 1st of January to the 10th September are as follow:—

	Yen.	Compared with last year.
Exports	296,628,000	+31,606,000
Imports	322,597,000	+34,606,000
Excess of Imports.....	25,969,000

BARON OURA AND THE "JIJI SHIMPO."

Among the remarks elicited from Baron Oura as the outcome of his observations during his recent trip to the West, one is that the difference between Japan and Occidental countries in the matter of wealth is something enormous, and that the first business of the Japanese nation should be to correct this flagrant discrepancy. The Jiji Shimpō takes this as the text for a trenchant article, the gist of which is an attack upon Governmental interference in business. Our contemporary wants to know what remedy Baron Oura has in mind. If it is the remedy of official enterprise, the disease will only be aggravated. The Jiji goes back to the beginning of the Meiji era and declares that through all these years the Government has been unwisely thrusting itself into a sphere which ought to be reserved for private enterprise. The result, in the great majority of cases, has been disastrous. Not only has public money been squandered, but private enterprise has been intimidated. If this is what Baron Oura recommends, the Jiji denounces his idea in unmeasured terms. It draws a vivid picture of companies subsidized by the Government and managed by men who have no business experience, and who rely solely on the subsidy.

It is not to be denied that our contemporary's criticism embodies much truth. There is unquestionably at the present moment a feeling of hesitation on the part of private capitalists to engage in any Japanese enterprise, owing to a not altogether baseless fear that Government interference or competition may have to be reckoned with at any moment. But we should like very much to hear the Jiji Shimpō's frank opinion as to whether Government abstention from the field of business would have been a wise policy throughout. We ourselves are strongly disposed to answer in the negative. It has always seemed to us that, had not officialdom led the way, Japan's industrial development would be now far more backward than it actually is. The situation dictated a choice between two evils, and the Japanese statesmen unquestionably appear to have chosen the lesser. If anybody desires to study the subject exhaustively, we recommend for his perusal the Sengen Sensei Rokujunenshi and "Fifty years of Open Japan."

THE TOYO S.S. COMPANY.

After a protracted dispute, which, at one time, developed some acrimonious phases, the Toyo S.S. Company and the Hoden Oil Company are said to have decided to submit to arbitration the question of the latter's indebtedness to the former on account of tank-steamers ordered but not taken delivery of. It is understood that the Directors of the Hoden Company do not altogether repudiate their liability, but that they merely dispute the amount, namely, 3,450,000 yen. The names of the arbitrators are not yet announced.

The Mainichi Dempo, which has made itself conspicuous of late by its severe attitude towards the Toyo S.S. Company, now states that the question at issue between that Company and the Hoden Oil Company seems likely to end in a fiasco. The reason assigned by our contemporary is that if the former Company's claim for 3,400,000 yen he pressed to its legal limit, Mr. Asano will become criminally indictable. Consequently efforts are being made to compromise the problem, and the Mainichi Dempo predicts that, after all, it will be a case of the mountain bringing forth a mouse.

On the 13th instant the Directors of the Toyo S.S. Company adopted a statement of accounts which was circulated among the members on the following day, and which will be brought forward for discussion at the general meeting on the 28th instant. The figures are:—

	Yen.
Total income	3,010,914
Total expenditures.....	2,754,185
Net profit.....	256,729

It appears that the cargo carried by the Company's vessels was less by 175,000 yen than the quantity for the corresponding period of 1909, but was greater by 29,000 yen than the figure for the immediately preceding half-year. As for passengers, they show a marked increase; the income derived from this source has been greater than that for the corresponding period of 1909 by 302,000 yen. Our readers are aware that the Company entered the past half-year with a debt of 1,060,000 yen. The whole of the profits for the half-year will be applied to redeeming a portion of this debt, but there will still remain a sum of over 800,000 yen, which cannot possibly be paid back out of the earnings of the next half-year. It will be remembered, however, that Mr. Asano pledged himself publicly to the liquidation of the whole debt by means of the earnings of one year, and declared his willingness to make good out of his own pocket any deficiency that might occur. The Shogyo Shimpō predicts that there will be trouble at the approaching general meeting.

THE INUNDATIONS.

A committee of the Seiyu kai has called upon Prof. Ichiki, Vice-Minister of Home Affairs, to seek information about the Government's intention with regard to the recent inundations. The Vice-Minister went into the question at considerable length. He explained that for the purpose of temporary repairs of embankments and riparian works a sum of 1,700,000 yen was needed immediately, and the Government contemplated supplying this out of the deposits in the Posts Savings Banks. But for the purpose of restorations the money needed was at least 20 millions. Out of that total the idea was to lend 6 millions from the general budget, and to invite the people of the affected localities to subscribe the remaining 14 millions in the form of bonds. It was very doubtful, however, whether the people's financial ability would enable them to take up the bonds, and in that event there would be nothing for it except to lend the money from the Deposits Bureau of the Treasury. As to the reclamation of the devastated lands, funds for that purpose would probably have to be supplied by the Agricultural and Commercial Banks. Turning to the problem of taxation, Prof. Ichiki said that of course the national taxes would be remitted, but as to the local taxes, it would probably be difficult to remit them, as the land still exists in a practically arable condition. Meanwhile the Minister of the Department is on a tour of inspection, and nothing can be settled until his return.

JAPANESE IMMIGRANTS IN CHOSŌN.

Prof. Kambei, who has just returned from investigating the conditions of Japanese labour and agricultural enterprise in Chosen, does not give a very encouraging account. His view is that the Japanese farmer will not consent to work side by side with the Korean. The Japanese thinks that he belongs to a superior race and that he is humiliated by engaging in the same toil as a Korean. The result is that Japanese subjects who commence by taking employment as agricultural labourers in the Peninsula, very soon give up that pursuit, and take to drawing jinrikishas or to carrying on some petty trade, in which occupations they achieve success contrasting strongly with their failure as farmhands. From the point of view of pure manual labour the Korean is superior to the Japanese, but from the moment that intelligence has to be employed, the advantage is all on the side of the Japanese. It would seem therefore that for purposes of agricultural development the Japanese must be employed as overseers or as land-owners on however small a scale. Another point spoken of by Prof. Kambei is that the Japanese immigrant has not the same spirit of independent enterprise that distinguishes an Anglo-Saxon. The Japanese is very averse to settling down by himself in a solitary place and working out his own salvation. His gregarious instincts impel him to become a member of a community, and to overcome that defect the best plan appears to be the formation of small settlements consisting of at least 3 or 4 families.

All this is very interesting, especially coming from a Japanese source. We may fairly assume the correctness of Prof. Kambei's observations.

KOREANS OUTSIDE KOREA.

It will be remembered that sometime ago there was talk of a coterie of Korean insurgents establishing a habitat at Kiaochow, and the announcement created some interest at the time, as people were curious to see what kind of reception would be given by the German local authorities to these political agitators. Thereafter the matter passed out of the field of observation, and we now read that these malcontents, finding Kiaochow an uncomfortable base of operations, immigrated, first, to Chefoo and, subsequently to Vladivostok. At the last named place, however, they found it to be a case of out of the frying-pan into the fire, for the precautions adopted by the Russian police were so effective that hand or foot could not be raised. In fact, the N.Y.K.'s steamer Tategami Maru brings news that the action of the insurgent leader, Yi Pong-yun, in transferring himself from Russian territory to Chientao, was largely involuntary. So far from being a strategical move, it was an effort to escape the surveillance of the Russian Authorities. From the same source information is furnished that the Koreans in Vladivostok are engaged in agriculture or in manual labour. The greater part of those who follow the latter occupation are employed as cargo coolies, and these are pursuing their avocation peacefully, giving themselves no concern about political questions.

POLITICAL PARTIES IN KOREA.

It is reported from Seoul that the various political parties, or at any rate those of appreciable magnitude, have shown much celerity in obeying the order for their dissolution which was recently issued by the Resident-General. It had been announced that some ten days' grace would be given in order that the parties might have leisure to dispose of their administrative offices, but this period does not seem to have been required. There was some doubt about the Sokpok Hak-hoi. This association came into existence originally for educational purposes, and received its permit from the Minister of Education. It might therefore have claimed exemption from the order of dissolution on the ground of non-political character. But undoubtedly it had extended its programme into the region of politics, and its leaders appear to have recognized that fact, for they broke up the party without any hesitation. Meanwhile it is well understood that many Hak hois, that is to say, associations formed nominally for the promotion of knowledge, still exist throughout the country, and they certainly take more than academic interest in political affairs. Some way of dealing with them will have to be found.

On the other hand, although the organization of the parties has been broken up without difficulty, their finances constitute an embarrassment. Thus the Chosen Kyokai is said to owe 20,000 yen and the Seiyu-kai has liabilities totalling 10,000. For these debts the head office of each society is responsible, and it becomes a troublesome question to determine whence funds can be obtained to discharge the obligation.

THE QUESTION OF THE RAILWAY FACTORIES.

It will be remembered that, some time ago, there was much talk of a difficulty between the inhabitants of Oimachi and the Railway Authorities with regard to the purchase of land at the former place. The Railway Authorities needed the land for the purpose of transferring thither the Shimbashi factories. In ordinary circumstances the price of land at Oimachi would not exceed 4 or 4½ yen, but so soon as it became known that a large tract would be needed by the Railway Authorities, speculators entered the field and bought up all the available space in the district at prices varying from 4 to 7½ yen per tsubo. Meanwhile the Government purchased 10,000 at 9½ yen, and required 80,000 tsubo more. The speculators, however, would not part from their newly acquired property under 18 yen a tsubo, which was naturally regarded officially as an exorbitant price. There was some talk of applying the law of expropriation, and a committee was appointed by the Tokyo Municipal Council to examine into the question, but the floods appear to have interrupted the latter's work. Meanwhile a deus ex machina has presented itself. The people of Haneda have come forward and offered to furnish every possible facility if the Government will choose that region for the site of the factories. The land already purchased by the Railway Authorities at Oimachi will serve for the proposed quadrupling of the line of railway, and therefore the Authorities are free to choose whichever of the two sites they please.

DEMORALIZING LITERATURE.

Vice-Minister Ichiki, of the Home Department, referring to the Government's efforts to restrain demoralizing literature, explains that books of a shocking tendency are now compiled or translated in Japan. These books advocate what is called the philosophy of nature. They teach that human lusts are a part of man's nature and should no more be suppressed than is his instinct of ambition or his thirst for information. They moreover deny that a child is under any obligation whatever to its parents. These bring it into the world by a voluntary act of their own, and having begotten it, are responsible for its education. Up to that point the child owes no obligation to its father or its mother. Similarly it is laid down that younger brothers and sisters owe no duty to their elders, and in fact the tendency of this literature is to wholly upset the ethical and moral codes by which mankind has been guided from time immemorial. The Japanese Government is determined to employ every means in its power for the suppression of such literature.

On the 14th instant the Governor of Tokyo, acting under instructions from the Minister of Education, issued an order to all colleges and schools which are under Government supervision. The Order required that strict measures should be adopted to check the circulation of all literature calculated to educate socialistic doctrines.

BUSINESS NOTES.

The loan of 3½ million yen floated by the Osaka Shosen Kaisha is said to have been subscribed at least twice over. The lists closed on the 10th instant, but the reports from the provincial districts are not yet published.

The sum of £200,000 borrowed by the Toyo S.S. Company in 1908 falls due on the 10th of next month, and negotiations were therefore recently undertaken for renewing the loan. They have been successful. We read in Tokyo journals that the rate of interest is to be determined every four months in accordance with the state of the money market; that the commission is to be 2.625 per cent.; that the underwriting bank is the County and Westminster Bank; that the guaranteeing bank is the Dai-Ichi Ginko, and that the period of redemption is 2½ years.

All attempts to establish a kerosene-oil trust in Japan have failed. The Standard and the Asiatic Rising Sun Company are said to have been the first to contemplate this arrangement. This idea sought to include Japan in an American trust. But as things could not be arranged on their side, they announced to Japan their failure in the month of July. The Japanese then proposed that the arrangement should be limited to Japanese oil, but even this proposal has failed of realization.

The affairs of the Marine Products Company still remain unsettled. The Directors have been indicted criminally by the recalcitrant shareholders, and an agreement seems to be more distant than ever.

THE TOKYO RAILWAY.

Baron Sengen, President of the Tokyo Railway Company, says (Nichi Nichi Shinbun) that he does not care to discuss at any length the prospects of the much talked of elevated railway; but one thing is certain, namely, that even though the enterprise be undertaken, its completion must be many years distant, and therefore it is not likely to exercise any injurious effect on the Tokyo Railway, as the number of passengers attracted by it would be more than compensated by the increased population of the city. As for the Tokyo Railway, no one recognizes more clearly than the Directors do that various improvements and changes are necessary. But it must not be supposed that there is any reluctance or dilatoriness on the part of the Company with regard to these improvements. The public can have no idea of what is involved in obtaining an official consent to any proposition. Office after office has to be consulted, and by the time that the whole bundle of red tape has been unravelled, the original project may have become stale. Concerning the question of extending its lines, the Company has been severely criticised. Of course the Directors are just as anxious as anyone can be to effect the necessary extensions. But the work is compelled to await the completion of the city-improvement programme, and thus the question of time is entirely beyond the Company's control.

JAPANESE NOBLEMEN.

Our readers are probably aware that the office called Shakui kyoku (Bureau of Ranks and Titles) was recently changed into the Sōchitsu-ryō (Bureau of Fundamental Ranks), the approximate cause of the change being the inclusion of a number of newly created Korean peers in the Japanese nobility. This occasion has been seized by the coterie of noblemen who call themselves the Danwa-kai, and who are under the leadership of Viscount Akimoto. They have issued a manifesto, which, though couched in general terms, is evidently aimed at the opponent section of the Upper House, known as the Kenkyu kai. The manifesto declares that any one fortunate enough to be the recipient of a title ought to recognize the responsibilities correspondingly devolving upon him, and, instead of indulging in a life of ease and pleasure, should work for the benefit of the State. So far is this from being the case that a certain party of noblemen,—the reference is obviously to the Kenkyu-kai—seem to think of nothing except the augmentation of their own following, and to that end encourage social abuses instead of seeking to correct them. The manifesto further attacks the political parties, but its criticisms do not take any new line. They are a general condemnation of the want of backbone and the compromising tendency shown by politicians in general at present.

According to a Manila contemporary fifty-two sacks of the richest gold ore ever seen in Manila reached that city last week from the Tumbaga mines in the Camarines. The shipment will be exhibited for some time before being sent to the United States for smelting at the Selby smelter in San Francisco. Mr. Cavender reports prospects of the mine as very encouraging indeed.

THE NIPPON SAVINGS BANK.

The death of Mr. Tanaka Ichibei in July has led to the closing of the doors of the Nippon Chochiku Ginko. This is not a question of failure or liquidation, but merely one of difficulty in finding any person able to take over the unlimited liability of an institution which has deposits amounting to over 13 million yen. All the capitalists whose shoulders are broad enough to carry such a burden are already engaged in banking business, and it is therefore thought wisest to close the Chochiku Bank with as little delay as possible. The Bank's shares, 25 yen paid up, are now quoted at 100 yen in the open market, and, when the reserves are added, each share will represent 180 yen. It is proposed to hand over the deposits to the Post Office Savings Banks, and the Government is not unwilling to sanction that arrangement. Among the assets are 33 million yen worth of Government bonds, which will of course be taken over by the Treasury, and there are 7 millions of Treasury bonds forming the legal reserve. The only difficulty is in connection with the various shares held by the Bank. These total 2½ million yen, face value, and they cannot, of course, be disposed of at once. Their sale will have to be gradual.

THE ORIENTAL COLONIZATION COMPANY.

In our last issue we quoted the Jiji Shimpō as animadverting severely upon official incursions into the realm of trade and industry. This subject is now said to have been taken up strongly by both the Seiyū-kai and the Kokumin-to. Their attention is specially concentrated on the Oriental Colonization Company. While Korea remained independent, the virtual monopoly granted to this Company was not extravagant. But now that the Peninsula has become an integral part of the Japanese Empire, it is intolerable, in the eyes of the above political parties, that the right to develop its material resources should be virtually limited to one private company. So long as the Oriental Colonization Company is operating under official auspices no private capitalist, or group of capitalists, will venture to enter the field. Hence the leaders of the Seiyū-kai and the Kokumin-to are said to insist either that the Company's charter must be radically modified, or that the association must be dissolved. It is predicted that this question will excite sharp discussion in the next session of the Diet.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

In the Jiji Shimpō we find an interesting account of the tapestries which Japan is contributing for the adornment of the walls of the Hague Tribunal. There are six pictures in all, two of them being 15 feet square, while the dimensions of the remaining four are 15 feet by 5. The commission for the weavers' work was given last year to Mr. Kawashima Junr., the drawing of the design being entrusted to the well known artist, Mr. Kikuchi Hobun. It was feared at one time that Mr. Kawashima's death would interrupt the work, but that apprehension has fortunately not been justified. The artist is said to have decided that, as the decoration of a hall of peace is in question, the most appropriate design would be composed of spring and summer flowers. He is therefore adopting that motif. The price paid for the tapestries is to be 80,000 yen; they are expected to be finished by 1913, and it is stated that 10,000 different kinds of silk will be used in the weaving. It appears that Mr. Kawashima was obliged to set up a special building for the accommodation of the large loom required.

The sum that is to be expended on the State railways during the next fiscal year, according to the continuing budget, is 40,984,109 yen, to which has to be added some 400,000 yen on account of certain new constructions. Against this has to be set the net income derived from the lines, which is expected to be something less than 10 million yen, and the final result is that it will be necessary to raise a sum of 32 million in all. The Asahi Shimbun considers these figures too optimistic, its conviction being that the losses resulting from the floods will exceed the official estimates.

We read in Japanese journals that there exists a league of Japanese life insurance companies, the members of which pledge themselves, among other things, to keep each other fully informed as to the names of persons to whom policies have been granted, or whose applications have been rejected, together with a statement of the amounts involved. This system was found to work very conveniently, and presently an application was received from the Equitable, The Sun and the Manufacturers' Companies, all of which were desirous of exchanging the same information. It appeared, however, to the Japanese companies that the foreign insurers would be the principal gainers by such an arrangement, and they therefore declined to entertain the proposal, unless the foreign companies agreed to work in all respects on the same footing as the Japanese. It appears to be difficult to carry out this arrangement unconditionally. There can be no doubt that the presence of strong foreign companies in the still comparatively undeveloped field of Japanese life insurance makes materially for the benefit of the Japanese nation, though it may not be altogether agreeable to Japanese insurers.

Japanese newspapers state that in view of the high rates imposed by the new tariff on certain manufactured articles, farseeing American capitalists are already thinking of establishing factories in Japan. Among the projectors of such enterprises, special mention is made of Messrs. Babcock and Wilcox, who think of setting up a factory for manufacturing boilers; the Locomotive Company, who propose to build steam engines; and the Diamond Company, who will turn their attention to matches. These companies are said to have already placed themselves in communication with the Mitsubishi and the Mitsui Banks.

Immediately after the announcement of the annexation, the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce addressed to the Seoul Chamber a telegram saying that, as the Japanese and the Koreans had now become one people, it seemed desirable that the two Chambers should consult with a view to the development of their countries material resources. To this communication the members of the Seoul Chamber made a sympathetic and confirmative reply, and it has now been decided by the Tokyo Chamber to invite a party of Korean men of affairs to the Japanese metropolis for the purpose of cementing friendly and practically useful relations. It is said that the Japanese Authorities have expressed warm approval of this project.

We read in Tokyo journals that the Tokyo Electric Light Company recently invited tenders for the supply of a large quantity of machinery in connexion with the scheme for harnessing the Katsura river. Several foreign companies competed, and the successful tender was put in by Messrs. Okura and Co., representing the German firm, Allgemeine Company. The amount of the successful tender was 900,000 yen, and the next bid was for 1,200,000. This is regarded as a signal triumph for the German manufacturers.

The Jiji Shimpō is of opinion that the estimate made by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce as to the rice crop for this year will be found to have been contradicted by subsequent events. The Department's idea was that the yield would be only 1,300,000 koku below the average, but our contemporary believes that the recent floods in the Kwansei regions will involve a further loss of about 1,500,000 koku, so that the total yield will not exceed 46 million koku, whereas the average crop is 49 millions.

It has been decided that the launch of the battleship Kawachi shall take place at Yokosuka on the 10th of next month. The keel was laid in April 1909, so that the time of building amounts to exactly a year and a half. The Kawachi is a sister-ship of the Settsu. Her displacement is 20,800 tons; her draft 28 feet, her horse-power 26,500; and her speed 20 knots. Her armament will consist of twelve 12-inch guns; ten 6-inch; twelve 4-inch and five torpedo tubes.

In the Asahi Shimbun we find a paragraph headed "Temporary Failure of the Seikoshō's Foreign Loan." Items of news published by Tokyo papers on such subjects are generally very untrustworthy, and we have reason to think that even the Asahi is not accurately posted in this case. However, the gist of the story may be true enough, that owing to commissions to underwriters and banks, the terms obtainable in London are not quite as good as those that could be obtained in Japan. Whether the difference would compensate for the advantage of getting foreign money is problematical. The whole matter is now said to be under the consideration of the Directors.

It now appears that the alleged suicides have dwindled down in reality to one, namely the local headman of Kinsaku. The seven others who were said to have perpetrated felo de se in an access of patriotic chagrin are still safe and sound in the land of the living. Whoever circulated the original rumour was either a man of high inventive faculties or a subtle moulder of public sentiment. The reaction produced by discovering that the sad story was false is likely to prove much more influential than the story itself was.

Mr. Hiraoka, Governor of Karafuto (Saghalien), is now on a visit to Tokyo in connexion with budgetary arrangements for next year. He speaks in an optimistic strain of the prospects of the island. The fishery this year has been markedly successful; so successful that the catch for the first half-year has equalled the total catch for 1909. Specially signal success attended the operations in the Odomari waters. Moreover, there has been a great influx of immigrants, largely temp'ed by the progress of the railway, 70 miles of which are under construction and will be nearly concluded by October. As to the measures which ought to be taken to encourage colonization, the Governor thinks that the best plan would be to reduce the tax on fishing. He speaks also in a very hopeful strain of the turpentine industry, in which he is endeavouring to induce the Government to invest a sum of 15 million yen, spread over 5 years. His Excellency is persuaded that if that amount of capital be sunk, great results will be obtained.

The terms of the Berne Convention for the mutual protection of copy-right have been published. Japan adheres to the Convention with two exceptions; namely, translations of books, and musical compositions. She reserves to herself full freedom in each of these matters.

According to the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, negotiations for the new conventional tariffs have been commenced with all the Powers which are in position to make bilateral arrangements. Our contemporary includes England among the number, which is very satisfactory to learn, as it was feared that the British system did not leave room for many concessions which might form the bases of a reciprocal agreement. But is the Nichi Nichi correct?

The favourable weather on the 220th day, namely the 12th inst., assumed something of the character of a farce, for the interval between the Nihyaku toka and the Nihyaku hatsuka had been so inclement that it really mattered little what happened on the latter day. It is not a question of one particular day with the rice farmers. It is a question of a whole fortnight.

There is a journalistic campaign going on at present in Japan against the Government's policy of suppressing Socialist literature in every shape or form. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun and the Yomiuri Shimbun head the attack. They say in effect that the best safety-valve in these cases is publicity, and that recourse to force and appeals to law tend only to infuriate the people and to develop their obstinacy. It is an old, old story; and, while admitting that circumstances have to be taken fully into account, we cannot forget that Socialism has hitherto been proved most powerless in countries where freedom of thought and expression is least restricted. At present the policy of the Japanese Authorities is to seize every book, pamphlet or journal which discusses Socialism in any of its phases, and by this process of treating jewels and pebbles without distinction, many law-abiding and quiet people who hold a modified form of Socialist views are hounded into becoming extremists.

Some time ago the telegraph reported that Baron Uchida, Japanese Representative in Washington, had behaved with marked prudence in the matter of the Mexican Centenary. The story was that the Mexican Government had invited Baron Uchida to precede the other Representatives in his visit to Mexico, in order that exceptional honour might be paid to him and that he might be given the premier place at the ceremony. Baron Uchida, however, was doubtful as to the expediency of accepting this proposal. He refused it on the ground of pressure of official business. Nevertheless a recent telegram to the Asahi from New York says that certain newspapers of that city have discovered cause to be dissatisfied, not only with the Mexican Government, but also with Baron Uchida.

A member of the California Senate, whose transliterated name is undecipherable, is reported (Asahi's telegrams) to have introduced a resolution to the effect that public opinion in California is opposed to the contention that Japanese, or other similar, labour is necessary for the development of the State. This resolution is said to have been adapted with unanimity. It is not altogether easy to reconcile such legislation with the American theory of personal freedom. One is inclined to think that individual employers should be at liberty to engage whatever kind of labour suits their convenience or their resources.

The Asahi Shimbun and the Nichi Nichi Shimbun publish news of very contradictory nature. The former journal which, from some cause not easily discernible, has always been opposed to the Anglo-Japanese Hydro-Electric Water Company, says that it is on the verge of dissolution. It explains that the Kinugawa and the Katsuragawa enterprises have obtained practically the whole business of supplying Tokyo's present wants, since they have severed the contracts of Tokyo Railway and of the Tokyo Electric Light Company. Meanwhile the Anglo-Japanese syndicate has expended a large sum of money without any tangible results, and advantage is to be taken of the return of Mr. Schultz to London to submit to the principal shareholders on the other side a statement of the advisability of winding up the syndicate's affairs. The Nichi Nichi, however, explains that what is in contemplation is not the dissolution of the syndicate but only a reduction of its dimensions, so as to meet the situation which has arisen out of the Kinugawa and Katsuragawa schemes. We suspect that both stories are inaccurate.

It is stated that the total amount of subsidies granted by the Japanese Treasury to Shipping Companies next year will be one million yen larger than the amount now paid. This increase will be due to two factors. One is that the Toyo S.S. Company, which has now on its San Francisco line three steamers, namely the Tenyo, the Chivō and the Nippon, will substitute for the last-named vessel the Shunjo, which is nearly completed at the Mitsubishi Building yard. The Nippon has a displacement of only 6,178 tons, whereas the Shunjo's displacement is 17,000 tons; so that there is here a considerable difference in the amount of subsidy. The second point is that the Osaka Shosen Kaisha will place two additional vessels on its Tacoma line. It already has four steamers on that service, namely, the Seattle, the Panama, the Tacoma and the Chicago, and it will presently add the Mexico and the Canada, both of which are now being equipped at the Mitsubishi Works.

There seems to be quite an excitement growing up about the action of the Department of Education in vetoing the circulation of all Japanese books on socialism, while granting absolute freedom to foreign works of the same tendency. The Department directly responsible for the action taken in this matter is the Home Department, but the policy pursued is understood to be inspired by the Department of Education. It is alleged that the Authorities take the view that people who are sufficiently educated to read books in foreign languages are capable of discriminating between true and false doctrines, and therefore the books they read need not be legislatively limited. But Tokyo newspapers point out that this cannot possibly apply to immoral publications, which the booksellers are allowed to, dispose of without the slightest restraint, provided that they are printed in a foreign language. Some of the works which thus reach the hands of the student class, male and female alike, are too abominable to be spoken of in detail, yet the police take no steps to prohibit their sale.

It is alleged by the Chuo Shimbun that the volcano recently so active at the Board of Directors of the Tanko S.S. Company is again on the eve of an eruption. Some particulars are given by our contemporary, which predicts a speedy renewal of the contest. We sincerely hope that there may be no truth in this rumour. The Tanko S.S. Company is one of the most important enterprises in this country, and the failure of its Directors to place their affairs on a working basis reflects discredit on the whole business world of Japan.

Viscount Soné expired at 11.05 p.m. on the 13th instant. His death must be regarded as a release from a long and hopeless period of suffering. The Viscount was a member of the Choshu clan. He was born in 1849 and was originally destined for a military career, with which object he proceeded to France and studied there during five years. But he subsequently entered the civil service and filled many important posts, the last being that of Resident-General in Korea.

The Yokohama Specie Bank seems to have taken a leaf out of the books of the Hongkong-Shanghai Banking Corporation and the Russo-Chinese Bank. It has arranged to lend a considerable sum of money to an association calling itself the Hangyaping Company, which is composed of the iron foundry at Hankow, the iron mine at Taiya and the coal mine at Pinghsing. The sum lent by the Japanese Bank is 3½ million yen; the rate of interest is 7-per-cent., and the unredeemed period five years; but as to the period of redemption the telegram is perplexing, since it mentions 3 years, which is obviously an error.

We read in the Mainichi Dempo that Prince Ito's villa at Oiso has been sold for a sum of 2,000 yen. The purchaser is said to be Mr. Kurusu Sobei, a merchant of Yokohama, and our Tokyo contemporary naturally expresses indignation that the villa of a national hero should be sold for such a price. For our own part we strongly suspect a mistake in the figures.

On the 12th instant a goods train from Maizuru was about to reach Sonobe Station, when owing to the carelessness of a pointsman the train struck a car standing in the compound. The engine was seriously damaged and one car derailed. No casualties are reported.

THE ROMANCE OF MARITIME PROGRESS.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 10.)

EVENTS move rapidly in the world of maritime development, and this truth is fully borne out in the annals of the past few weeks. Several monster warships, each marking some new advance in naval construction, have taken the water; a new gun has been evolved completely outclassing the 50-calibre 12-inch gun which has constituted the main weapon of the battleship for twenty years; and there is talk of a new engine of destruction, driven by other means than steam, which is to render even the super-Dreadnought a thing of obsolescence. Last month, within a fortnight of one another, there were launched, at Portsmouth and Devonport respectively, the two largest warships as yet afloat. The greater of these two, curiously enough, is a cruiser (so-called), and not a battleship, and represents a greater advance on any previous ship of her class than has yet been recorded in the not unromantic history of naval design. It was little more than a decade ago that the late Lord GOSCHEN, in his capacity as First Lord of the Admiralty, spoke with bated breath of the "giant cruisers" of the Leviathan and Powerful types, with their displacement of 14,000 tons—a notable enough advance on their predecessors of the Blake class, displacing 9,000 tons. But vastly different from these is the Dreadnought-cruiser Lion, which recently found her element in the waters of that very Sound over which DRAKE and his sea-captains strained their eyes for the first glimpse of the Spanish Armada. The Lion is practically double the size of the Terrible, the Powerful's sister-ship, and could with the greatest ease destroy either of those "giant" cruisers at a range of six miles, using but an eighth of her total gun-power. When the vast experiment of the all-big-gun ship was brought to light in the first Dreadnought, and cruisers to match grew into being on the stocks, the term "giant cruiser" was felt to be inadequate, and that of "monster cruiser" was invented to describe, in a fitting manner, a vessel which combined the strength of the Dreadnought with the speed of a torpedo-boat. So the Invincible became the first "monster-cruiser," and it cannot be denied that she deserves the name. But what are we to say about the Lion, that "super-Dreadnought-cruiser"? What sufficiently magniloquent expression can be conceived that connotes her immensity by comparison with the "monster-cruiser" which she has outstripped by nine thousand tons? Even the mighty Mauretania has to look to her laurels, in that a gun-platform is now afloat which approximates in dimensions to that floating palace. Let the cold facts speak for themselves, in feet and tons and engine-power:—

	Invincible.	Lion.	Mauretania.
Length, feet	530	700	790
Breadth	78	88½	88
Displacement, tons...	17,350	26,000	45,000
Speed, knots.....	25	30	26
Engines, h.p.	41,000	70,000	70,000

But the Lion's wonders do not cease with her dimensions: they are continued in her guns. For she is the first warship to mount the new 13.5-inch gun, a weapon which makes the hitherto formidable 50-ton breech-loader a toy. For there is an increase of forty per cent. in the mass of the gun, and of fifty per cent. in the weight of the projectile, so that a shell from a Lion's gun weighs 1250 pounds, as against the 850 of the older weapon. Moreover, for the first time in the all-big-gun type of ship, as in the new super-Dreadnought Orion, the disposition of the guns of the main armament is such that they can all be fired on either broadside.

Of course England is by no means alone in these substantial advances towards maritime perfection—if, indeed, such a state is attainable on this side of Armageddon. Battleships of 26,000 tons—3,500 tons heavier than the Orion—have been ordered for the United States; monster-Dreadnoughts of 30,000–32,000 tons have been ordered for certain South American republics who, under the lash of rivalry, are clearly emulating the "lick-creation" spirit of their big northern neighbour. The world's naval progress, however, is in guns as well as tons. Thus we learn from the impressive headlines of an American journal—albeit it is of saffron hue—America Evolves Most Terrible Gun. It is a gun, naturally, that "knocks spots" out of every other gun. Indeed, an American General "guesses" that the "rumours" of a wonderful new 14-inch gun by Krupps, and all similar rumours, are the merest "war-scares." Nevertheless these rumours are correct, and the great German rivals of Elswick and Barrow have succeeded in evolving a weapon which is believed to leave even the new British 13.5-inch a considerable distance in the rear. It is therefore more than doubtful whether the American general's claim that "the American gun is the most perfect in the world this minute" held good for the next.

But a development more remarkable than all was heralded from the premier dockyard of Great Britain a fortnight ago. The slip vacated by the Orion is to be occupied by "an experimental battleship with motor engines" which will "render obsolete the Dreadnoughts of all Powers." This is probably the design of which the Observer of a few days previously spoke with an air of anxious mystery:—

"We do not know, but the air is once more full of rumours of a strange grim, enormous sea-thing of the future—leviathan with a vengeance—which will have no funnels and will be driven by huge motor engines. . . . The idea has already been applied to the merchant marine. A few weeks ago it was announced that the Hamburg-American Company had ordered from the shipbuilding firm of Blohm and Voss an Atlantic liner of 9,000 tons, to be driven by petrol and motor engines. . . . What does this mean? It means a sweeping economy of space. Boilers, stokers, and smokestacks disappear. This experiment and the process of thought it must set up among naval architects everywhere may be of vast importance. A battleship is a gun platform. The platform has hitherto been encumbered above and heavily dragged upon below. The funnelless battleship would be a perfect platform by comparison. There the question must be left until expert opinion pronounces upon it."

So the weird romance goes on, with one strange development following hard on the heels of another. That it possesses a grave significance for the kindreds and peoples of the earth it is impossible to deny. The potentialities of maritime power which the future has yet to unroll before an astonished world are well-nigh illimitable, as their influence on mankind must be beyond compute. We can not do better, in conclusion, than supply our readers with some pregnant reflections on this aspect of this question from General HOMER LEA's recently published and remarkable work "The Valor of Ignorance":—

"Within a given time a single vessel of the Mauretania or Deutschland class could transport more troops from Europe to America than could all the fleets of England have done at the time of the Revolution or War of 1812. Vessels of this class will carry a brigade, together with all of its equipment, from Europe to the United States in six days. The entire merchant marine of Germany and Japan can be converted into transports immediately upon declaration of war and land within a month more than a quarter of a million men on either shore.

"The great rampart of ocean has utterly vanished, only the delusion of it still remains. Its illusory defence and the dreams of peace born out of it must give way to that which belongs to man in his combats, the blood and iron of military preparation."

"A knot added to the speed of a transatlantic steamer and the width of the sea grows less and the armed frontiers of Europe are brought closer to these shores. When the vessel's size or carrying capacity is increased, the ocean shrinks again and the armies of distant nations draw nearer.

That the shrinkage of ocean should increase the possibilities of armed conflict is a possibility too palpable to ignore; but we may nevertheless hope that the romance of maritime progress may know a more peaceful termination than a tragedy of "blood and iron."

THE ANNEXATION AND THE NATIONS.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 16.)

IT is not uninteresting to note that, so far as we now know, the only two English journals which have insisted that in annexing Korea, Japan must take over all the latter's international obligations, are a Yokohama and a Kobe newspaper. The Yokohama journal's judgment is, perhaps, a little swayed by its wishes. It desires to find some basis upon which England may found a claim for tariff concessions by Japan, and it thinks that such a basis is ready to hand in the form of a declaration that unless Japan consents to modify her customs dues in Great Britain's favour, Downing Street will refuse to absolve Japan from the responsibility of implementing all Korea's treaty engagements. We have shown that no such theory can be maintained—though in the interests of British commerce we would welcome it,—inasmuch as it is fully recognised that no compact entered into by a State continues to have validity after that State has, by force majeure, been deprived of competence to execute such compact. The Kobe journal, however, is even more dogmatic and less reasonable than its Yokohama fellow-thinker. It writes—Japan Weekly Chronicle, September 1st:—

It will have been observed that the Japanese papers coolly announce that with the annexation the treaties with foreign Powers cease and determine and extra-territoriality is abolished. Evidently these journals are fully under the impression that a treaty is a unilateral obligation binding only on the other party. Japan in annexing Korea must clearly take over the obligations of Korea exactly as an individual would do in succeeding to property. As Mr. Provand points out, it has been announced on behalf of the Residency-General that "in assuming the charge of the foreign relations of Korea, and undertaking the duty of watching over the execution of the existing treaties of that country, they will see that those treaties are maintained and respected." There can be no question that in international law the annexation of Korea does not give Japan the right to abolish Consular jurisdiction or enclose the country within the Japanese tariff wall.

Now as to this talk of "a unilateral obligation binding only on the other party," it is quite irrelevant, inasmuch as Japan was never a party to the treaties in question, and has never pretended that their provisions are unilateral. The problem is simply whether or not the international engagements assumed by an independent country continue to be binding upon the country after it has been incorporated in the dominions of another country. A moment's thought shows that the answer must be in the negative. The case of Korea herself furnishes an instructive example. Korea was pledged vis-à-vis Occidental States to allow Consular jurisdiction within her borders, and the Japan Chronicle denounces the "coolness" of Japanese journals in claiming that extra-territoriality is abolished de facto simultaneously with the annexation of the Peninsula. Now suppose that Russia and Turkey were in the positions of Japan and Korea, respectively. Is it conceivable for a moment that if Russia annexed Turkey, the Capitulations would continue in force? Of course not. No European Government would think of approaching St. Petersburg with such a contention. Or suppose that Germany annexed Korea, and that between the latter and France there already existed a convention entrusting the management of Korea's foreign affairs to the French Government. Would France think of insisting that such a convention must survive annexation? Not for an instant. It thus becomes evident that there are treaties and conventions which, from their very nature, are incapable of being observed after one of their signatories has lost its independence. Not, therefore, until international law has undertaken to discriminate between treaties that survive and treaties that perish can any claim such as that so confidently formulated by the Japan Chronicle be admitted. It looks very much as though the Kobe journal had unwittingly reverted to the mediæval doctrine "one law for me, another for thee;" the doctrine so often obeyed by strong Occidental States in dealing with weak Oriental. And what are we to say about the Japan Chronicle's action in quoting Mr. PROVAND in this context? What Mr. PROVAND wrote had reference solely to the engagement voluntarily given by Japan to Occidental Governments when she assumed charge of the foreign relations of independent Korea. That engagement was given long before annexation took place and had no binding force whatever with regard to the situation following on the loss of Korea's independence. We have no right to assume, nor we do assume, that the Japan Chronicle, in quoting Mr. PROVAND's wholly irrelevant utterance, intended to mislead its readers, but the alternative conclusion is that it shows radical carelessness in dealing with important topics. Meanwhile we wait vainly for any Western Power to assert the rights which the Japan Chronicle declares to be unquestionable.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Wednesday, September 14.

There was a slight recovery of prices during the afternoon session on the 14th instant, owing to news that the centre of depression which had made its appearance on the 13th inst. westward of Kyushu, passed at 6 a.m. on the 14th in the direction of Hachiojima. The weather is therefore expected to mend.

Thursday, September 15.

The debacle in the Stock Market continues. Holders hasten to unload in the face of the inclement weather. Rice has now risen to over 15 yen per koku. We append the quotations for November delivery:—

BIBLE STUDY MEETINGS AT KARUIZAWA.

(CONTRIBUTED.)

Rev. Dr. W. W. White, President of the Bible Teachers' Training school of New York, came to Karuizawa by an arrangement of the Young Men's Christian Association, for a series of Bible studies. From Wednesday Aug. 31st to and including Sunday Sept. 4th meetings were held twice daily in the Auditorium.

Although it was rather late in the vacation season, and several were obliged to return to their work, all who could do so remained, and several came from a distance solely for the purpose of hearing Dr. White, so that the audiences were very large, filling the auditorium. The interest did not abate but increased from day to day. Dr. White, like his brother, J. Campbell White, leader of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in America, is a remarkable leader of men. He is also considered one of the best of the teachers of the Bible so that all felt it to be a great privilege to listen to him as he opened unto us the Scriptures. Most of his time was given to teaching the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel of the Old Testament, and the Epistles of St. Paul to the Romans and to the Hebrews, of the New Testament. He also gave an outline of the history of the Bible Teachers' Training School in New York. He believes that too much attention is given to the question of higher criticism and not enough actual study of the Book itself.

That all Christians, and especially all clergymen, ministers and Bible teachers should have a thorough knowledge of the Bible before they begin the study of theology, homeletics, church history, psychology, &c., &c., and much more is this essential before any critical study of the text of the Bible is undertaken.

Among the missionaries at Karuizawa were several who had been students at Dr. White's school, and a "reunion" was held at the home of one of the number. A reception was given for Dr. White at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Heicher, which was largely attended. Very many would be glad if Dr. White would visit Karuizawa again next year. J. & S.

DEATH OF MRS. BELLAMY BROWN.

The Hongkong Daily Press of the 5th inst. announces with profound regret the death of Mrs. Bellamy Brown, wife of the editor of the China Mail. The sad event, which took place on the morning of the 4th at her residence, No. 2, Ormsby Villas, Kowloon, was quite unexpected, and the news came as a painful shock to her many friends. It is believed that Mrs. Bellamy Brown caught a chill while bathing some ten or twelve days ago. Acute dysentery ensued, but as she was a lady of more than ordinary vitality, her condition, though causing anxiety, was not regarded as critical until Saturday evening. Then it was seen that the end was not far off, and she passed peacefully away at 5.30 a.m. yesterday in the presence of her grief-stricken husband and father.

The deceased, who was nearly forty years of age, had lived a considerable portion of her life in the Far East. She came to Hongkong with her father, Mr. J. I. Plummer, about nineteen years ago, and after seven years here she left for Yokohama as the bride of Mr. A. Bellamy Brown. They returned to Hongkong two years ago, and were contemplating leaving in April next for England, where it was Mrs. Brown's intention to remain for a time to see to the education of her three children.

A large circle of friends will mourn her loss, and extend their deep sympathy to the bereaved husband and father, as well as to her sister, Mrs. Frank Smyth, who is in England, and her brother, Mr. J. A. Plummer, and to the three motherless children.

Mrs. Brown had many sincere friends in Yokohama who will be deeply shocked and grieved to learn of her early demise. Mr. Brown was for many years on the staff of this paper in the capacity of Manager, and the Japan Mail extends to him its sincerest sympathy in his bereavement.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

Among the numerous bodies whose duty it is to give advice to Departments of State the Kōtō Kyōiku Kwaigi undoubtedly ranks high and in educational circles great attention is paid to its recommendations. The questions discussed by the Council this year are fully stated and commented on by Mr. Kiba Teichō, LL.D. and Member of the House of Peers, in the pages of the Kyōiku-kai. On the reform of the educational system Dr. Kiba says that the Department of Education was unreasonable in expecting the Council to reach a decision as to the lines to be followed in effecting changes prior to a more thorough investigation of the subject. The Minister of Education evidently fails to realize how great are the difficulties attending the shortening of the School and College course with things situated as they are now. That the whole question needs to be more thoroughly investigated Dr. Kiba makes quite clear. What has been proposed by the Mombushō and to a certain extent endorsed by the Council is, for reasons given by Dr. Kiba, incapable of being put into practice. Here is what he has to say on this subject under five headings. (1) The shortening of the school course. Though it is proposed to reduce the time spent at school by one year, this can only be done in the case of a student who is fortunate enough to enter a High School soon after graduating at a Middle School. The majority of the applicants for admission to High Schools are rejected, some failing to pass year after year. (2) The deplorable mental condition of plucked students. For a student to fail at an examination repeatedly is most demoralizing. The country is pestered with hundreds of loafing students (rōjin shosetsu), who after several failures to reach the required standard for entrance to a High School find themselves too old and too fond of idleness to succeed in business of any kind. They have missed the flood of that tide in the affairs of men which leads on to fortune and so "all the voyage of their life is bound in shallows and in miseries." The wrecking of so many lives, for want of proper educational facilities for giving young men the training they desire, is something for which the State is responsible, and from which the State is the chief sufferer. Owing to the number of applicants which come pouring out of State Schools and Private Schools the difficulty of entering a High School is yearly increasing and the Department of Education now proposes to erect another barrier to rapid progress in the form of a competitive entrance examination for the Imperial Universities. (3) The preference shown for the Tōkyō Imperial University by all students tends to increase the difficulty of the present situation. Where thousands of students are all desirous of entering an institution which for various reasons is not expanding, the competition is bound to be very keen. At present all the best students regard the provincial Universities as inferior and prefer to wait a year or two in order to enter the Tōkyō Imperial University rather than try to enter what they consider second-class institutions. It is incumbent on the Department to find a remedy for this state of things. (4) Though the graduates of the Imperial University are older than is desirable, in efficiency the standard they reach is low. It is but reasonable to expect that what we consider to be our chief seat of learning should turn out men who in linguistic ability and technical knowledge of all sorts display unmistakable superiority to the graduates of all other institutions; that among the graduates there should be many who are competent to act as a medium between Japan and foreign countries on the one hand, making their fellow-countrymen acquainted with the most advanced Western knowledge, and on the other explaining things Japanese to Europeans and Americans in their own languages. But it is in vain that we hope for such things from the present class of students. Their knowledge of foreign languages is most imperfect. (5) Not one out of every ten Middle School students enters a University, yet the whole curriculum at the Middle School is rendered subservient to University needs. It comes to this that those who do not go to Universities are sacrificed for the sake of those who do. They are taught things that are quite useless to them in after-life and brought up in an inconsiderate manner (Muyō no gakkwa wo manabi, fushin-setsu no kyōiku wo uke oru koto wa jissai no jijitsu de aru). The long and short of it is that, as has been repeatedly pointed out, the Middle Schools are trying in vain to realize two incompatible objects. Hence the universal dissatisfaction with which they are regarded.

Now for the rectification of any of the five evils we have mentioned the Department of Education has nothing to propose. No reform worthy of the name can be effected while these obstacles to progress remain unremoved. As a remedy for the above-mentioned drawbacks, Dr. Kiba recommends the establishment of schools all over the country which shall be exclusively devoted to preparing students for the Universities. He proposes a five year course and insists on the importance of a good knowledge of the English language by those who enter these schools. Year after year elaborate plans for improving the system of education are discussed in educational magazines, but nothing practical follows.

Dr. S. Terano writes in the Kyōiku-kai on the rapidity with which naval architecture has developed in Japan during the past ten years. From constructing cruisers of some 3,000 tons each, Japan advanced suddenly to the building of a battleship of over 10,000 tons. This rapid progress Dr. Terano attributes to the training of experts in foreign countries and to the increased attention paid to shipbuilding in Japan itself. It is now twenty-seven years only since naval architecture began to be taught at the Imperial University. During this time 250 students have graduated in this subject. In the first years of this period there were only one or two graduates each year, but in 1896 two laws were passed which gave an enormous impetus to shipbuilding and navigation and thus increasing the number of the Naval architecture students at the University. During the past few years the number of graduates has been very large, somewhat exceeding the demand. The fact that many of these are still unemployed has led some people to take rather a gloomy view of the outlook for these students. But the fact is that those who are thoroughly proficient get employment at once. Selection is going on and the fittest will survive. This was to be anticipated as one of the conditions of progress in the art of shipbuilding. One thing is certain: the future of the industry in respect of both men and material is assured. Henceforth we can compete with the world's great shipbuilding nations without fear of being put to shame.

* * *

The following remarks on the Japanese language and the Koreans are taken from a recent issue of the Tōkyō Nichi Nichi Shimbun. How long it will take to unite Korea and Japan and what precisely are the measures to be deemed necessary for the realization of this object it is perhaps too early to determine. One measure which ought to be pushed is the teaching of Japanese to all Koreans. We can not but hope that eventually the Japanese language will entirely replace Korean. It ought to be so, seeing that we are far more numerous than the Koreans and are the governing race. It is reported that General Terauchi holds that our officials ought to study Korean. To this plan we are opposed, on the ground that it will tend to diminish the zeal now shown by the Koreans in the study of Japanese. The inconvenience of not knowing Korean should be put up with by our officials for the sake of insuring the universal adoption of our language in the Peninsula. The Koreans as a race display considerable linguistic ability. Boys in school, after studying Japanese only 6 hours a week, in four years become so proficient in Japanese that they can converse fluently in the language on all ordinary subjects. Up to the present great eagerness to acquire Japanese has been displayed throughout the country, but if it is given out that our officials are expected to learn Korean the necessity for the study of Japanese will not be felt by the majority of Koreans.*

* * *

By most Japanese writers on the subject the term "literature" is used in a narrow sense, as including only fiction, poetry, the drama and reviews of books on the above subjects. This fact is noted by Dr. Kuwagi in an article which recently appeared in the Taiyō entitled Waga mitaru Bunden (The Literary world as it appears to me). In this essay Dr. Kuwagi draws attention to certain characteristics of Japanese current literature somewhat as follows:—In this Meiji era the tendency to centralization in everything has been very manifest. In literature what is published in Tōkyō, Kyōto or Ōsaka only counts. The best writers are found in these big cities and in the provinces generally there is little or no literary progress. But the literary progress in the great centres has been something phenomenal, certainly not falling behind that made by medicine or science. The progress to which I refer consists of the rapid introduction of foreign thought. Our literary men are large readers of Western magazines and new books, and the new ideas which they derive from these sources are at once handed on to Japanese perusers of the leading magazines and newspapers of this country. As a consequence of this Japanese current literature has been largely cosmopolitanized. The questions which are attracting most attention in the outside world are fully explained and discussed here. (Sekai no shisōka mina Nihon ni iri-kitarite oru). But while we are keeping ourselves abreast of Western thought, Occidentals know little about Japanese thought or Japanese literature. There are of course foreigners who write much about Japan and Japanese who undertake to make plain to foreign readers what the Japanese actually think. But as for most of the foreigners, what interests them most is old Japan. They are in search of the old and the fantastic, for life and manners that are totally different from anything to be found in the West. The age that has already passed away has more charm for them than the age in which we live. Japanese writers in foreign magazines give no adequate account of modern Japan. So it happens that the real Japan of to-day as known to us is not known to foreigners (Sore ga tame ni gojin no kangaete oru makoto no Nihon ga tsui ni gwaikokujin ni mitomerarenai yō ni natte kuru no de).

There are those who deplore the tendency of our modern literature to take its models from Western countries, who preach exclusiveness and narrow nationalism. They are for resorting to repressive measures. All that can be said on this topic is that if the bigoted conservative school carry the day it will end in the cessation of all literary development. There are a great many foreigners who hold that though we have explorers in the fields of science and industry and men who have become proficient in these subjects, in literature and learning we are all behind. A Berlin Professor a short time ago expressed this opinion. In this country, speaking generally, criticism and reviewing are both in a backward condition. It may be caused by the antipathy of the Japanese mind to pushing arguments to their logical conclusion, to its love of compromise in dealing with various questions. The contest that is now going on between the Naturalists and the Intuitionists and Romanticists displays a lack of philosophic perception. Neither school of fiction has a monopoly of wisdom or truth, yet they despise each other's writings and treat each other as irreconcilable foes. Whatever merits a book may have, if perused by a writer of the opposite school, it is sure to be condemned in this country. Another peculiarity about our literary productions is this: Writers rather pride themselves in perusing works that few people can comprehend. Formerly the opposite used to be the case. (Konnichi wa rikai serarenu hō ga jōtō no bungaku de aru to iu keikō ga miyuru). Of course literature being a special subject, a certain amount of literary culture is required in order to enable readers to appreciate high class books. But this culture is not lacking by any means among the reading public. It is no good sign to find writers ignoring the general public and penning works that only a select few will ever care to peruse.

* The policy advocated by the Nichi Nichi is exactly the opposite of that pursued in India. It appears to be quite unreasonable to demand that the Koreans as a nation should abandon the language of their forefathers, which is as highly developed as Japanese in many particulars.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

The Jitsugyō no Nihon is an earnest advocate of the reform of the Japanese business world and a fearless exposé of existing evils. In an article entitled "New demands of the age made on Joint-Stock Companies" penned by Mr. G. Masuda, we find the following observations. Faith in the stability of big companies has been greatly shaken during the past 12 months and the public earnestly desires to devise measures for restoring confidence. What is the cause of the ruin which has overtaken or is threatening so many companies? Principally the dishonesty or carelessness of the Directors of these companies. In a few cases only other causes have been revealed. The Directors are usually chosen by the shareholders on account of the large amount of capital they possess, with the expectation that they will act honestly. It may be said that all shareholders are free to examine the books of a company to see that its business is being carried on in a proper manner, but accounts are complicated and they can be cooked so as to deceive uninitiated people. Directors have only to resign in order to escape responsibility. In former times they would have been obliged to commit suicide. The present commercial law lets such defaulters off with a fine of 500 yen at the utmost. This is the penalty for not reporting losses exceeding half of the capital possessed by a company. Adequate punishment for losses caused by Directors would be the reimbursement of the money lost out of their own pockets or a long term of imprisonment. But the Directors are not the only defaulters in existing companies. The business managers known as hira-torishimari-yaku act in a perfunctory manner and possess little authority. The shareholders ought to see that their interests are looked after by these paid officers of the company. It is true that every company has its inspectors, who are supposed to superintend the work of the under-officials, but they seldom put in an appearance at the companies' offices. They show no sense of responsibility whatever, nor do they ever undertake a minute examination of the documents bearing on a company's business. Responsibility then is escaped on every hand by the transactors of a company's business, so that it is no wonder that serious abuses occur. The reason why such firms as the Mitsui and the Mitsubishi have escaped the rocks on which other companies have struck is just this. The business of these companies is wholly controlled by men who have been long connected with the firms and who have practical knowledge of their businesses and, moreover, who are men of integrity and honour.

Old men in Japan are said to be very particular as to letter writing. They insist on occupying many lines with formal salutations and the up-to-date epistle that begins 前略陳者, Zenryaku nobureba, or Haikei nobureba appears to them to be an unpardonable breach of good manners. So particular are some fathers as to the proper wording of their sons' letters that a highly educated High School teacher once remarked that he perspired freely whenever he had to write a letter to his father, never feeling sure that his words were sufficiently respectful. In an article on this subject published in the Taiheiyo Baron Shibusawa is represented as insisting that all letters written for him shall follow the old sōrō bunshō style. "To omit the ordinary salutations in a letter is as bad as going into a man's house and commencing to talk business without greeting the person called on," says Baron Shibusawa. The Baron, we are told, usually pens his own letters, but when compelled to employ an amanuensis, in his own handwriting he gives the reason for doing so. His use of honorifics is profuse to all persons alike without respect to rank or social position. His contention is that a man should be as polite when writing a letter as when greeting people face to face.

Mr. T. Takashima, Sub-Manager of the Ōkura Firm, who has recently paid repeated visits to Formosa, Korea and Manchuria, in the pages of the Taiheiyo in substance gives the following advice to his fellow-countrymen. The time for which business men in this country have long waited has at last arrived. Money has become cheap. Interest has been forced down to between 4 and 5 per cent. Now is the time for investing capital in big enterprises in Formosa, Manchuria and Korea. The opportunities for the profitable investment of capital in these countries are unique. But if we are to succeed, capitalists must combine and form big companies as foreigners are doing. But prior to embarking on any enterprise we must be prepared to spend money on investigation. Past failures have almost invariably been traceable to imperfect information respecting the conditions which prevail or the formidableness of the competition to be overcome. Business men in this country can not be persuaded to put up capital until they are satisfied that there is nothing speculative in the industry it is proposed to start. There is one thing against which I desire to warn my fellow-countrymen, and that is resort to extravagant ways in the carrying on of business. The way here in Japan is for the officers of a company to launch out into all kinds of expenses directly the company has been formed and capital is available for use. Fine buildings, and an excessive number of employees swallow up much money and reduce the amount of the dividends that ought to be paid to shareholders. In this matter Europeans and Americans are very different. Though they themselves live in fine houses, offices which have to be bought or rented with a company's money are usually plain unpretentious buildings. In Japan we have come to think that a company can exist by itself apart from the business which it is organized to carry on. Most of the officers of our companies think little of the industry by means of which alone a company can fill its chequers. They are puffed up with the idea of the importance of their offices and use the company's money as freely as they are allowed to do. Under these circumstances it is hardly surprising that so many of our companies should fail. (Seiseki no agaranu no wa tōzen de, jigyō no shippai no rekishi wo ōku wa kore de aru).

In the September Taiyō the editor-in-chief, Dr. K. Ukita, writes at great length on racial improvement, taking for his text a very learned work that has recently been published by the Fuzambo, written by Mr. Unno Kōtoku, entitled Nihon Jinshu Kaizōron (Improvement of the Japanese Race). We now proceed to epitomize Dr. Ukita's review of Mr. Unno's work. The subject of Eugenics has hitherto attracted little attention in this country. We have been so absorbed in modelling our institutions after the pattern set us by Western nations that we have neglected to take into consideration what measures ought to be adopted for our physical improvement as a race. To Mr. Unno the nation owes a debt of gratitude for introducing to its notice the views of the most advanced English, German and French writers on racial reform. While not agreeing with many of the opinions held by Mr. Unno, we can not but admire the thoroughness with which he has treated the subject in hand. After taking for granted that the life of plants and animals has one origin and after tracing the effects of natural selection in the vegetable and animal kingdoms, he shows that the human race can only be improved by the working of the laws which have accomplished such wonders among plants and the lower animals. He attacks both philosophy and religion on what appears to us to be a false supposition, namely that they are opposed to scientific conclusions. As regards philosophy its aim is only to harmonize and unify the laws or principles which science has shown to exist. Beyond the ken of science and experimental knowledge there are fields of inquiry which philosophy and religion can explore. What Mr. Unno attacks is only pseudo-philosophy and superstitious religious belief. Mr. Unno discusses the various forms of selection which have combined to determine what races shall survive. Some of these can not be regarded as benefactors of the human race. I. War.—In time of war it is not the weak who are killed off or maimed, but the strong, the men who are best qualified to become the fathers of healthy children. A nation is weakened by a series of wars. It was because we had enjoyed two and a half centuries of peace that we showed up so well in our two recent wars. II. Physical Weakness in its effect on races. This is beneficial to a race, in that it helps to get rid of inferior specimens of humanity. The ability to resist the different microbes that destroy human life varies greatly according to race. The less civilised a race is the more easily does it resist certain microbes, while falling a victim to others. III. Alcohol. On the effect of alcohol on races, Mr. Unno differs greatly from the conclusions reached by some writers on this subject. He says that the advocates of teetotalism have greatly exaggerated the harm done by drinking and he asserts that no hereditary evils are to be traced to alcohol. Though he admits that individuals have been physically and morally injured by the use of alcohol, he is of opinion that races have been improved thereby. Though we can not endorse this view, we admire the courage which the author shows in stating of it, says Dr. Ukita. Mr. Unno holds with Weissmann and other German writers on heredity that no parent can reproduce himself or herself in a child, that hence there is no real heredity in physical or mental qualities or peculiarities. IV.—The relation of the sexes to each other. Among divers races the laws which govern sexual relations have constantly tended to improve or to lower the character of the people concerned. It is for this reason that in some countries the marriage laws have become so strict. Into the whole subject of marriage Dr. Ukita goes somewhat minutely, contending that in all cases the State and Society should take steps to prevent the union of persons who are suffering from diseases or ailments that unfit them for the procreation of healthy children, and pointing out that charitable societies, with the best intentions, have done much towards promoting race deterioration by helping the sick and the feeble and enabling them to increase and multiply. Dr. Ukita is of opinion that though Mr. Unno's attack on the dispensers of charity may apply to those working in the cause of charity in Western lands, it is not applicable to Japan, where charity has yet to undergo full development (Mokka waga kuni ni oite jizenshin (♂) aru no heigai yori wa jizenshin naki no heigai haruka ni ōinari to su). Dr. Ukita says that the indifference shown to the spread of leprosy in past years is disgraceful. Lepers have intermarried with other people and have been free to go where they pleased. Were charity better organized and more intelligently carried on in this country than it now is, leprosy would long since have ceased to be the scourge it now is. What we need in this country is charity that is conducted on scientific principles, that recognizes the harm as well as the good that it may do. We are in favour of official control of the dispensing of charity. There are not wanting persons to-day who in the name of charity are collecting money for their own use. Mr. Unno is to be congratulated on having succeeded in giving his fellow-countrymen a full statement of up-to-date opinions on the most effectual methods of improving the Japanese race.

In the September Taiyō Dr. S. Tsubouchi, the greatest living authority on the Japanese drama, discusses the subject of the education of Japanese actresses. He says that the time has past for men's taking women's parts on the stage. In recent times female actors have shown so much proficiency that there is no chance of their being replaced by men. Comparing men and women actors, Dr. Tsubouchi says that girls are much cleverer in imitation and in giving expression to emotions and moods than young men, but that in originality and contrivance men are far ahead of women. As an illustration of the power of mimicry possessed by some living actresses, Dr. Tsubouchi cites the case of Kumehachi, who when a very young girl showed such power of mimicry that she went by the name of the mimic (maneyo). After she had grown up there was no actor's manner that she could not reproduce on the stage. Her gestures were now those of Danjurō, now those of Kikugorō and now those of Hanshirō. That which was essentially her own specialty was her way of dancing. Another instance of remarkable imitative talent is being displayed by Katayama Shunji, teacher of what is known as the "noue style" of dancing. Her performances are deservedly attracting great attention and eliciting much applause. Our actresses, says Dr. Tsubouchi, have shown more talent in imitating bodily gestures of all kinds than in any other line. It is quite plain that there is great need for an entirely new kind of training for our actresses. The first desideratum is good teachers—persons who are not content with theorizing, but who can give practical guidance to young girls in gesture, elocution, facial expression, and the like. The first obstacle a teacher has to overcome is a certain lifelessness and woodenness in the wonted attitude of young women. They have not the free use of their limbs. Their eyes are usually downcast and their movements awkward. This is largely the result of the inactive lives passed by women of the better classes in this country for centuries. The remedy is to resort to callisthenics of all kinds, sword exercise, jūjutsu, dancing in the Japanese fashion (buyō [踊]) and in the western fashion (butō), and other bodily movements. Next to bodily attributes more attention must be paid to enunciation and accentuation by our actresses. Their delivery must be pronounced slovenly. Their voices are usually pitched in too high a key and never lowered no matter what the subject may be. Then they usually speak too fast and too indistinctly. When imitating country dialects they often become quite unintelligible for this reason. Where a play deals with a series of mental phenomena, when striking changes of sentiment and emotion have to be represented, the effect of the language used by the play-writer is entirely spoiled by a monotonous delivery. Another difficulty which has to be encountered in the education of actresses is the provincial pronunciation of some of the most talented of the young women who are candidates for training. This is hard to cure, but it has to be got rid of if efficient actresses are to be produced. For the production of the deeper psychological plays provincial actresses show more ability than the Tōkyō women, who excel in melodrama most of all. But country brogue on the stage excites ridicule and often spoils the effect of really good acting. More brain development is required among both our actors and actresses. The mental power to thoroughly comprehend the various characters impersonated, their relations to each other, the influence of the incidents which occur in the play on their actions—this has to be developed in each case, before a play can be made a thorough success. Of course it is true to say that our audiences are anything but critical and that women often succeed in captivating people by their looks and gestures, but actresses should not be content with such a low ideal as this. Dr. Tsubouchi recommends actresses to make a point of pursuing some special study or practising some art that has a bearing on histrionics, be it music, poetry or what not. To depend on acting alone for a reputation he deems inadvisable at the present time. His opinion is that the training which the members of what are known as the new school of actors have undergone does not qualify them to represent plays of the Ibsen or the Saō-geki type effectually. He says that the success which has attended the production of plays of the above class has been greatly exaggerated. Companies like the Sadanji have succeeded only in a few externals. Considered psychologically their acting has signally failed (Boku ga ima made ni mita kyūha shimpā no Saō-geki nazo wa hanashi ni naranu mono de atta.)

TOKYO NOTES.

Summer in the Capital, from which many are accustomed to flee in terror, has this year been much more pleasantly cool than usual, chiefly on account of the extraordinary degree of rain and consequent cloudy weather; and even now at the middle of September, when there is usually a hot spell, the air is as agreeable as in some of the retreats where some of our friends are remaining to escape it. Still we feel that old Sol is behind the scenes, and if the prevailing cloudiness should disappear, the heat would doubtless be sufficient to create a desire for the approaching autumn.

The timely question of foreign land-leases is settling itself to a certain extent in Tokyo without the necessity of diplomatic interference. Within the past few months property to a considerable value has passed from foreign into Japanese hands, extinguishing the foreign lease-hold rights so far as the property alluded to is concerned, for ever. Most of the property thus disposed of was formerly held by missionary societies. The large brick building, once a Roman Catholic convent in Tsukiji, has been sold to the Government, it is said, and the Sisters have removed their school to Yotsuya; while the Government, according to report, intends using its purchase for military purposes. The large block containing four dwelling houses next the Hotel Metropole in Tsukiji, has been sold by the Methodist Mission to Mr. Mitsushita, a prominent newspaper man of Tokyo, who, it is said, intends erecting a fine residence on the ground. As the houses have been since offered for rent it is to be presumed that their demolition has been deferred for an indefinite period. With these changes old-time residents would hardly know Tsukiji. The old neighbours that for so long a time occupied the houses along the bund, or more correctly, fronting the Sumida river, have now all departed to various parts of the city. Professor Swift has moved to Azabu where he is building for himself a house; and Dr. Seymour has done the same, though in his case, the house was found already erected and was bought as it stood. The Chilean Minister is now occupying the residence formerly owned by Mr. R. J. Kirby. A few years ago Tsukiji was for the most part, so far as concerned the foreign population, an English-speaking community. But to-day it is no longer so, most of the new comers being Japanese and Germans. The large block owned by the Church Missionary Society is also offered for sale, and no doubt will soon pass into Japanese hands and settle the question of one more perpetual lease. The Dai-Gakko department of St. Paul's College in Tsukiji has, we hear, bought a site out in western Koshikawa and will in time remove thither, together with the present Theological College of the American Episcopal Church in Tsukiji. Most of the houses vacated are still awaiting tenants, and will probable continue to do so, for the rents asked are far beyond what any one would care to pay except in case of sheer necessity. It is indeed most remarkable that so many landlords would sooner have their buildings vacant to fall into delapidation than have them occupied except at the figure demanded. It may be said that rents in Tokyo, for foreign-style houses at least, have, if we remember rightly, doubled in the last ten years; but it would be contrary to the principles of economics generally to expect that these exorbitant figures will continue to be demanded; for most of the foreign houses now vacant will remain so unless the rents go down to what they were a decade ago when the houses were newer and better.

The Tsukiji house owned by the American Episcopal mission and formerly occupied by the Rev. Geo. Wallace, is being pulled down to make way for enlargement of St. Mararet's girls' school; while the house in Kojimachi owned by the same mission and formerly occupied by Mr. Gardner, has been sold to Mr. F. G. Sale, who is erecting on the site a fine residence for himself. With the funds of the sale, the American Mission intends building a house somewhere in Kojimachi for Dr. Bliss, the recently arrived assistant to Dr. Teusler at St. Luke's Hospital. At present Dr. Bliss is occupying Bishop McKim's house during the absence of the latter in America. Another change involving large transactions in property was the sale of the Methodist school property in Torizaka-cho, Azabu, to Dr. Baron Takagi last year.

The extent of new building going on in Tokyo for the past two or three years has been indeed enormous. Perhaps one of the most prominent of the buildings recently erected is the new Imperial Theatre now fast approaching completion. A full description of the unique and magnificent appointments of this fine structure would make a lengthy document, but its peculiar excellences may well prove worth our attention at some future time. The new union station too is getting well under way, and will form an imposing ornament as well as a great convenience to the city. The new Mitsui building in the vicinity of the firm's main edifice in Nihon-bashi also promises to be a structure worthy of that firm's reputation for fine buildings. Mention must, moreover, be made of the new library building for the Keiogijuku University, the walls of which are now more than half way up, and which, when completed, will form a fine architectural addition to the institution. The new library is of brick with grey stone trimmings, in partly Gothic style, and will be capable of housing the great number of books for which the old building was far too small. The popularity of the Keiogijuku appears to be ever on the increase. The number of students now in attendance must be in the vicinity of 5,000, as many as 1,500 coming into the preparatory year alone, and if this rate of increase continues the university will soon have outgrown its present buildings.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

St. Petersburg, August 25.

The Emperor has appointed three officials, namely Engineer-General Rerberg, General-of-Infantry Kediger and Privy Councillor Dmitriev, all members of the Upper House, as a special commission of inquiry into the economic and administrative functions of the Naval Department of Shipbuilding and Equipment, with orders to present in the shortest period possible a report on the subject direct to His Majesty. The inquiry is not by any means on all fours with the now customary "revisions" in progress throughout the Empire, as the order appointing this inquiry does not expressly give to its members any particular rights. At the same time the measure is welcomed as the first step towards that full and faithful investigation into the proceedings of the Naval Department for which the country has been clamouring ever since the collapse of the naval forces in the Japanese War. The object of the commission is "to take measures for the better organisation of the naval building department with a view to restoring the fighting power of the Russian Fleet at the earliest possible moment."

The Special Embassy to announce to the Emperor of Russia the accession of King George V. arrived here by the Nord Express yesterday afternoon. They were met by the Prefect of St. Petersburg, Major-General Drachevsky, and the members of the British Embassy, with Mr. O. Beirne, Charge d'affaires, at the head. The British colony, with the exception of one Leicester gentleman whose brother served in the Boer War, was somewhat conspicuous by its absence. Lord Roberts, wearing a soft grey felt hat and light tweed overcoat, took his place in the first of the carriages of the Imperial Stables Department drawn by a magnificent pair of greys; with him was the Prefect. The other carriages were occupied by Admiral Sir Gerard Noel with Mr. O'Boirne; General Sir Ian Hamilton with Col. Wyndham, the Military Attache to the Embassy at St. Petersburg; The Earl of March with Col. Walter, the Russian officer of the General Staff who had accompanied the Special Embassy from the frontier and will be in attendance during their stay; Mr. Synnot and the remaining members of the St. Petersburg Embassy present. The party drove to the Winter Palace, where apartments have been prepared for them. To-day the Special Embassy headed by Lord Roberts went to Peterhof to have audience of His Majesty. Several papers publish to-day snap-shots of the famous general in whom the Russian public take considerable interest, while others print a brief biography.

The British Special Embassy headed by Lord Roberts was received by the Emperor and Empress at Peterhof on Saturday for the purpose of announcing the accession of King George V. Lord Roberts afterwards paid a visit to the Empress-Mother. In the evening the Emperor gave a banquet in honour of the Special Embassy at which were present, besides the Court Officers, the Ministers, Stolipin, the War Minister General Sukhomlinov, Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs Sazonov. Mr. O'Beirne, who is in charge of the St. Petersburg Embassy and all the staff of the Embassy now here were likewise honoured with an invitation to the banquet. The Emperor proposed the health of King George V.

After a couple of days spent in visiting persons and places of importance in St. Petersburg the Special Embassy left last night for Moscow where a day or two will be taken up with sight-seeing in Russia's "Premier Capital," whence a return by rail direct to London will be made probably to-morrow.

The Minister of Commerce and Industry, M. Timashev, is exhibiting an amount of energy which is by no means generally appreciated. Apart from the obnoxious action taken on his initiative in connection with the Maikoh naphtha claims and English capital, he is being attacked on the question of commercial agents of Russia in foreign countries. A little time ago particulars of the status and appointments etc. of the British Commercial Agents (attachés) were obtained, and it was expected that something on the same lines would be inaugurated by the Russian Government. According to the Novoe Vremja, however, M. Timashev proposes to establish abroad commercial agents dependent solely upon the Ministry which he rules. There will thus be in most civilised countries three Russian representatives, working independently of and, as not infrequently has happened before, in opposition to one other, namely the Embassy, the Financial Agent, who is subordinate to the Minister of Finance, and the newly proposed Commercial Agent who will be subordinate to the Minister of Commerce and Industry only. This is a return to the "good old times" when the Emperor-Autocrat was the Government of Russia and all Ministers were equally his servants, acting independently of one another and usually engaged in fighting one another for first place at the ear of His Majesty. Nowadays with a Council of Ministers which it is intended should develop into a Cabinet, as understood in other countries, the proposals of M. Timashev are recognised as reactionary. There have not been wanting even in recent days cases where the antagonistic activity of the accredited agents of various Ministers abroad and that of the accredited Embassy of Russia have brought the Government of Russia into serious complications. It is incredible that any further multiplication of rival representatives of Russia abroad should meet with the sanction of the powers that be in Russia to-day.

The Novoe Vremja devotes a leader to the task of persuading Serbia that it would be foolish to take umbrage at the choice of titles by the ruler of Montenegro, who will shortly be declared "King of the Servians in Montenegro," while his grandson Mirko is to be created "Duke of Raskovy." The titles have been selected, it appears, on historical grounds, and mark the fact that the Montenegrins consider themselves strictly speaking Serbs, therefore the title "King of the Serbs in Montenegro" is a correct parallel to that of King Ferdinand, who is "King of the Bulgars." As to the title "Duke of Raskovy" it refers to territory now actually a part of Serbia. The Novoe Vremja ridicules the idea that such a title indicates any hidden ambitions and points out that the Almanach de Gotha is full of territorial titles which have no real significance. Nothing whatever is intended, thinks the paper, against others Slav rulers or their territory, and all statements to the contrary are the work of ill-wishers to Slavdom. At the same time it seems to the ordinary reader that the new fashion of selecting titles over peoples without reference to defined territories is ominous of the future, whether friendly or hostile means are in mind to make the territory fit the people—the problem which is really at the bottom of all the endless quarrels in the Balkans.

A party of 300 British tourists on board the P. & O. steamship the Mantua, left Kronstadt yesterday evening after a five days' stay in Russian waters. The fear of cholera prevented all but about ninety from venturing to Moscow, which is singularly free from cholera, being provided with both pure water supply and adequate sewers, both of which are lacking in St. Petersburg. No provisions were taken on board from St. Petersburg, nor was communication allowed beyond the coming and going of the passengers; even the decks were not permitted to be washed nor were any baths allowed during the stay in the Neva. Notwithstanding the precautions the tourists thoroughly enjoyed the visit and saw as much as on ordinary occasions, many staying in hotels in the town and daily visiting restaurants without any ill results. The death-rate in St. Petersburg from cholera has, in fact, fallen to under a score a day according to the official figures.

The harvest in Russia this year, according to the official returns, may now be confidently estimated to be well above the average all round, but of course is not to be compared to the magnificent production of last year which sufficed to raise Russia almost to affluence all of a sudden. Nevertheless the present harvest should be a source of wealth to Russia out of proportion to its positive value inasmuch as outside circumstances favour this country. The wheat harvests of the world in general are not good this year, so that Russia may still maintain her recently regained preëminence as a grain-exporting country. Perhaps the worst feature of the present harvest is not its smaller quantity as compared with last year's bumper yield, but the considerable fall in quality. The climatic conditions, practically throughout Russia have been unfavourable for the production of the finest quality of grain. Beginning with an abnormally early hot season the weather speedily changed to cold, rain, hail, with occasional interludes of exceptional cold and here and there even frost. Well-grown wheat laid by hail and wind naturally failed to answer early expectations, and the quality of other bread-stuffs is believed to have suffered still more. On the whole, however, the Russian harvest will fully enable Russia to hold the place she formerly held as the granary of Europe, and in a few years' time the effects of the change in progress from communal ownership of land to the more strenuous farming of the individual proprietor should begin to make itself felt, while vast tracts of new arable land are continually being opened up in inner Asia by the labours of the Commission of Emigration, which is transferring hundreds of thousands of agricultural labourers annually from the overcrowded central provinces of European Russia to the virgin soil of Russia's Asiatic possessions.

A trial at law which resulted in a verdict of not guilty on a Mussulman in the Province of Krasnoufinsk, Perm, reveals a curious bit of folk-lore. In the above-named district dysentery had been carrying off a number of the Mussulman population, being especially fatal to children. The disease was traced by some village wiseacre to a dead and gone "wizard" who was supposed to leave his grave by night and poison the children or "suck their blood," leaving the dysentery poison in them. The villagers started out to the local burying ground to find the grave. It was to be known by the following experiment. A stick, shap-pointed, was thrust down into suspected graves, and if it came up dry the crowd passed on to another, if it came up wet at the end possibly the wizard might be there but when at one plunge of the stick it was seen to come up bloody at the end there could be no mistake. The corpse below was disinterred and it was found that the head was "all bloody." (Query, had the people stumbled upon a hidden crime, a violent death smuggled out of sight?) It was decided to behead the corpse and cut off its hands. The man told off to do this grisly deed eventually appeared before the court of law, but was acquitted as being under compulsion of the crowd. As the dysentery was not visibly affected by this curious measure the crowd later returned to the grave, once more dug up the supposed wizard and burned his remains utterly—a serious step for a Mussulman crowd to take.

M. Stolypin has called for a report on the sanitary condition of St. Petersburg, and it is anticipated that the Government will ere long actively intervene in the municipal policy of allowing the cholera to take its course without attempting anything more than palliative measures. Official figures show that the cholera this year has appeared in a more deadly form than in last year's epidemic, when the percentage of deaths was only 30, whereas now it is 37 per cent. Throughout Russia in the week ending last Saturday there were registered 23,944 cases and 10,733 deaths from cholera, which is a much higher percentage than that of St. Petersburg, but may be accounted for by the relative incompleteness of the registration of "cases." Since the beginning of the epidemic this year there have been 50,387 deaths from cholera in 12,085 cases registered. The supply of Russian medical men not being nearly adequate, facilities are being offered to foreign doctors who hold a degree and have worked in a hospital for a certain period.

A curious murder case is being investigated at Radom. A large sofa, or divan, was discovered in a neighbouring lake and when examined was found to contain the body of a man evidently a victim of murderous violence. The divan was traced to an hotel, but the proprietor and his chief assistants at first succeeded in misleading the police. After a third domiciliary perquisition, however, a lot of bloodstained linen belonging to the hotel was discovered in the box of a servant. As the victim is believed to have been a guest in the hotel the proprietor is held guilty in any case of failing to inform the police of his disappearance, and measures are being taken to extract a confession.

A SHIZUOKA despatch reports that the Tenryu, Oi, Fuji, and other rivers in Shizuoka prefecture, have again risen to such considerable height that neighbouring localities are in danger of inundation. A severe storm is reported to have raged on Mt. Fuji on the 9th instant, and later a heavy snowfall was experienced.

COUNT HAYASHI'S RE-MINISCENCES.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMPO.")

(CONCLUDED FROM LAST ISSUE).

XXV.—HOW THE DUTCHMAN DISMOUNTED AND TOOK OFF HIS HAT.

There was once a Dutchman who rode his horse past the Bugyō (Governor) of Nagasaki. The Bugyō was much incensed at the man's rudeness, and sent his interpreter after him to remonstrate. When the interpreter had overtaken the Dutchman, he said: "My master has been much impressed with your excellent riding, and has sent me to ask your name. Please go and thank him." The Dutchman was delighted with the compliment, and, knowing nothing of the real circumstances of the case, at once rode up to the Bugyō, dismounted, and made a profound bow, where-with the Bugyō, who thought the man was apologizing, was fully satisfied. The interpreter was much praised by his comrades for his rare skill in diplomacy.

XXVI.—DR. HEPBURN CONVERSES WITH MY FATHER.

Dr. Hepburn was a Christian missionary who was engaged in the compilation of a Japanese English Dictionary. He was also a medical man and devoted his forenoons to the exercise of his medical skill. My father, being also a physician, often visited Dr. Hepburn and watched his methods of treating his patients. One day a woman came to Hepburn's for treatment: she was suffering from a disease involving a serious operation. Doctor Hepburn told her that her case was hopeless; she must be patient, he said, and wait for God's call to release her from her pain. My father suggested an operation, but Dr. H. said that an operation was sure to be fatal, and that there was nothing to be done but to wait. Then my father told him of two cases in which he had operated for the same disease with complete success: but Dr. H. only smiled incredulously, and refused to undertake the risk. Our doctors in those days had very little knowledge of anatomy and no anatomical charts, but their patients trusted them implicitly and their operations were frequently successful. Western books on surgery showed them the danger of these almost blindfolded operations, but science has progressed since then and these diseases are now generally found to be curable. The same may be said of a good many of the troubles of human life.

XXVII.—OMAE NDD GOZEN.

When the Gwaikoku Bugyō of the Shogun's Government spoke to Sir Harry Parkes he used to address him as omae. Sir Harry's interpreter, a young man of 18 or 19, Alexander Siebold by name, expostulated with the Gaikokubugyō for using such a disrespectful pronoun to so exalted a personage as the British Minister. The Bugyō replied that the same characters were used for writing omae as for writing gozen, which is a very honourable form of address, and that consequently omae and gozen might be treated as equivalents. "Then," said Siebold, "perhaps you will not mind in future addressing the British Minister as gozen." And to this the Bugyō had no reply to make.

XXVII.—OLD SHIPS.

After the close of the Bunkyo and Genji eras (1860-3) it became the fashion among the Daimyos of the provinces to send officers to Yokohama to buy steamers for their various little navies. These steamers were mostly old and useless but the daimyos had to pay long prices for them. The first steamer I ever took a trip in was one that had been bought of a foreigner in Yokohama for the Tosa clan. It was a trial trip, and it took us about four hours to get from Yokohama to Uraga. This will illustrate the kind of ships that were palmed off on the Daimyos.

XXVIII.—THE GWAIKOKUBUGYŌ IN A DILEMMA.

In every part of the country loud cries were going up for the expulsion of the foreigners, and the Government of the Shogun was being much blamed for not acceding to the popular demands. At the same time things were being made more and more difficult for the cabinet by the high-handed manner in which the Foreign Legations pressed on them all sorts of claims and requisitions. Thus, between these two fires, the responsible Japanese Minister found himself in a most awkward position. This enable us to appreciate the difficulties which beset our friends in Korea and China.

XXIX.—COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN YEDO AND YOKOHAMA.

In the first year of Keiō (1864) it took a whole day to get from Yokohama to Yedo. If one started from Yokohama early in the morning one could reach Ryōgoku in the evening. Shortly after this, steamers began to run between the two towns. The boat started from Honchō Ichome, in Yokohama, and reached Eitaibashi in 3 hours. There were also coaches which took the same number of hours to cover the distance. For my own part, when business took me to Yedo, I always walked.

XXX.—SUPPOSITIOUS CRIMINALS.

A major in the British army was assassinated at Tsurugaoka near Kamakura. A man named Shimizu Seiji was arrested for the crime, and after having been drawn through the streets of Yokohama, was beheaded in the presence of British military officers and members of the Legation. The executioner somewhat bungled his work, and it is said that the Englishmen present covered their faces so as not to witness the painful scene. I have always had a suspicion that the man was not the real assassin.

Shimizu was a professional robber, and had been caught in the act of assaulting a woman in the neighbourhood of Kanazawa. He was evidently not a person likely to be actuated by motives of patriotism. But the Government officials were being pressed by Sir Harry Parkes to produce the assassin, and it would seem that they persuaded Shimizu that as he had to die anyhow it would be to his advantage to die as a patriot who had killed a foreigner rather than as a common thief. The same trick was played by the Koreans in the 18th year of Meiji (1882) when the Japanese Government insisted on the execution of certain persons concerned in the assassination of a party of Japanese. On that occasion, the alleged rioters, whom the Korean Government had brought forward as the assassins, protested to the Japanese officers who were present at the execution that they were quite innocent of the charges brought against them. The Korean Government, finding themselves obliged to produce the assassins, had made scapegoats of them. But they were quite innocent of the charges and they implored the Japanese to have mercy. I heard this from a friend of mine who was present.

Just at the time of the Restoration, a party of Japanese made an attack on a French vessel lying at anchor at Sakai, and killed twelve officers and men. When a demand was made for the production of the criminals a number of samurai connected with the Toro clau immediately committed suicide, giving out that they had done the deed. It was perfectly impossible for many reasons that those men had had anything to do with this outrage; but they had sacrificed their lives to save their clan from trouble.

When a stronger Power makes a demand upon a weaker one, however justifiable that demand may be in itself, it should not be made without due consideration for the circumstances in which the weaker Power is situated. Otherwise, it is almost impossible to avoid some unexpected exhibition of futile cruelty.

XXXI.—DANDIES AND "TAMESHIGIRI."*

Towards the end of the Tokugawa period, young men who were studying western languages or science fell so much in love with foreign manners and customs that they had their hakama made tight so as to look as much like trousers as

* i.e. a swash-buckler—a "an who will wantonly wounded people just to try the edge of his sword.

possible, and their haori short, and with tight sleeves, so as to bear some resemblance to coats. The jingasa was made with made a narrow rim in imitation of the tall hat, and their horses carried foreign saddles. When these dandies took their walks abroad and were challenged by some "patriot," they would answer to the challenge by producing a pistol—a plan which sometimes answered very well, as it sent their assailants flying in terror. But it was not always successful, for a swashbuckling patriot would sometimes stand his ground, and then it would be their turn to take to their heels.

No order was kept in the city, and scarcely a night passed without some wanton outrage by tameshigiri swash-bucklers. In the suburbs things were almost worse, for the "patriots" there did not wait for nightfall to commence their depredations and riots.

XXXII.—HORSE HIRE.

Every nobleman's mansion in those days kept its own horses for the use of the lord and his retainers. But these horses were not in constant requisition, and a word in private to the "master of the horse" would always procure the loan of a steed for the charge of one bu (25 sen) for the day.

XXXIII.—THE PUBLICATION OF THE FIRST POLITICAL CARTOON.

There was an English artist in Yokohama just before the Restoration who is said to have published the first cartoon. The picture represented Sir Harry Parkes as a mosquito flying across the sea from China to Japan. The mosquito had just bitten the Emperor of China, who was busily rubbing the sore spot: the Shōgun was fast asleep under a net, and quite unconscious of coming danger.

Another cartoon represented a Japanese, clad half in native costume and half in foreign dress. He held a glass of beer in one hand, and a cigarette in the other, and was exclaiming, "I do so love civilization!"

XXXIV.—WESTERN CUISINE AND RAW "DAIKON."

One of my friends—a tip-top swell—once sent out invitations to dinner. I was myself one of the invited guests, and I remember that the menu consisted of hosone daikon in a glass dish, some slices of bread, and a little rancid butter. We asked for more, but after waiting for, some time were told that no more was coming. The dinner was supposed to be in Western style, for as vegetables such as foreigners eat were not procurable in Japan in those days, the poor foreigners were in the habit of making shift with hosone daikon as a humble substitute. It was also the custom—a child of necessity—to eat mulberries with condensed milk and sugar, and think it was strawberries and cream.

A midday meal used to cost 50 mon (5 rin). Travellers by road between Yokohama and Yedo used to lunch at a restaurant kept by a man named Yamamoto at Omori. Lunch consisted of rice, dried fish, and various pickled vegetables. The restaurant keeper put up his prices after a while, but when the railway was made he was ruined.

XXXV.—THE FERRY.

In pre-restoration days there was no bridge over the Rokugo river at Kawasaki, and people had to cross in ferryboats. A heavy rain would sometimes stop the ferry, and then the hotels on either side of the river would make a fine harvest from travellers unable to proceed on their journeys. This evil practice prevailed all along the Tōkaidō to the great inconvenience of travellers. It was a very noticeable fact, however, that rice-speculators were never hindered by the rains. They had means at their command to tempt the cupidity of the boatmen.

XXXVI.—SHAMELESS SCANDALS.

During the Bunkyo and Bunji eras (A.D. 1860-4) there was a large export of silkworms eggs to Italy, where the silk business at the moment was in a state of decline. One of the exporters was a shameless scoundrel who put poppy-seeds on the cards instead of silk-worms eggs. He was, however, caught. Another rascal used to put copper coins into his bundles of silk-yarn so as to give them weight, and still a third used to fill his oil cans half full of water. Their one thought was how to cheat foreigners, but the latter soon found them out, and gave them as good as they got. Mutual suspicions were thus engendered, and foreigners came to mistrust every Japanese merchant, to the great loss of our country. The rascals who began the cheating in the early days of foreign intercourse are the real persons to be blamed for the bad name that Japan has received.

XXXVII.—STUDENTS SENT TO ENGLAND.

In the second year of Keiō (1865)—I was then seventeen years of age—the Shogun's Government announced its intention of sending students to England. There were about eighty candidates, the examination being held at the Government School for Foreign Languages (Bansho tori-shirabu sho, afterwards changed to Keijo Gakko). The subjects for examination were translations, Japanese into English, and vice versa, and the questions were very easy. Fourteen candidates were chosen. Their names were 1. Kawaji Taro, 2. Nakamura Keisuke (later Nakamura Kein), Tōyama Sutehachi (Shōichi), 4. Mitsukuri Keigo, Mitsukuri Dairoku (now Baron Kikuchi Dairoku), 6. Naruse Jogoro, 7. Iiō Shonosuke (afterwards Oka Yasuyoshi), 8. Ichikawa Morisaburō (later Hiraoka Morisaburō, 9. Yuasa Genji, 10. Yasui Shimpachirō, 11. Sugi Tokusaburō, 12. Fukuzawa Hidenosuke, 13. Okukawa Ichirō, and 14. myself. Kawaji and Nakamura were appointed as the pickets of one little band. We set sail from Yokohama early in October. A great fire was raging in the town: seven or eight foreign houses and a large number of Japanese ones were reduced to ashes.

XXXVIII.—STUDENTS SENT TO HOLLAND.

Some six or seven years before this, a number of students had been sent to Holland. Among these were Inomoto Kamajiro (afterwards Viscount Inomoto Buyo), Akamatsu Daisaburō (afterwards Noriyoshi), Sawa Tarozaemon, Hayashi Kenkai, Ito Gempaku and others.

XXXIX.—MR. FUKUZAWA'S HAND IN THE MATTER.

I was told at some later time that the sending of students to England had been done at the suggestion of the late Mr. Fukuzawa Yukichi. The Government wanted Mr. F. to nominate students himself; but he contented himself with nominating one only, Fukuzawa Hidenosuke. This I was told by Mr. Fukuzawa himself.

XL.—THE MAN IN CHARGE OF THE BAND OF STUDENTS.

We were put under the charge of a Mr. William Lloyd who had at one time been a chaplain in the British Navy, and had been recommended to the Government by Sir Harry Parkes. We sailed in the P. & O. steamer Nepaul, which was afterwards purchased by the Japanese, and, by a strange coincidence, it was in this ship that I was transported from Hakodate to Aomori, as a prisoner, after the defeat of the Shogun's troops in their last stand against the loyalist forces in the second year of Meiji (1869). The name of the ship was subsequently changed to the Osaka Maru, and she was sunk some years later in a collision off Suwō.

XVI.—THE OVERLAND ROUTE.

The Suez canal was not yet finished and we had to go overland from Suez to Alexandria, where we took ship again. The Khedive of Egypt at the time was a very rash and indiscreet man who introduced a great many radical and ill-considered reforms into the administration of the country. His reform-movements were at the moment in full swing, and everybody was talking about the splendid future awaiting the country; but within ten years from that time Egypt was practically bankrupt as the consequence of his seekless expenditure.

XLII.—GENERAL GRANT'S ADVICE.

Somewhere about the 12th year of Meiji (1879) General Grant, who was then ex-President of the United States, had an audience with His Majesty the Emperor, and earnestly warned him of the dangers of incurring a foreign debt, illustrating his words by citing the example of Egypt in being entirely taken up with projects of domestic reform and the good-hearted General spoke from the abundance of his good will towards us. But there was one great difference between Japan and Egypt. The Egyptians were crazy after superficial and showy reforms, and a great portion of the money raised by loans was lavished on decorative improvements. I was told that after General Grant, who was then staying at the temporary palace at Akasaka, had had ocular demonstration of the frugal ways of Japan, he exclaimed that now at last he understood how it was that a single dynasty had retained its sway over the nation for so long a period of years.

XLIII.—THE STUDENTS CUT OFF THEIR TOP-KNOTS

When we got to Shanghai we cut off our top-knots. At Hongkong I saw Dr. Legge engaged in the printing of his English version of the Chinese classics. The harbour at Colombo was not yet completed, and our steamer anchored at Point de Galle, where she lay very uneasily in a rough sea.

XLIV.—OUR ARRIVAL IN ENGLAND.

We reached Southampton sixty-five days after leaving Yokohama. Our first lodging was at 5. North Lancaster Gate, Hyde Park, where we engaged a teacher, and set ourselves to the acquirement of English. After a few weeks here, we parted, some to schools others to hospitals &c. for our various special studies. The Japanese students had already preceded us to London, Mori Yūrei (the late Viscount Mori), Voshida Kiyonari, and Inouye Katsu (late Viscount.)

XLV.—THE VIEWS OF THE TENGU.

In the 3rd year of Keiō (1866), there was an international exhibition at Paris, in which Japan took part. Among the visitors to the Exhibition was Lord Tokugawa Harutake, younger brother of the Shōgun Tokugawa Keiki, with a suite composed mostly of uncouth Mito samurai of the "Tengo" type. These men wore kimono and hakama, and the customary pair of swords,—also topknots and waraji. When their master was at his hotel, they stood sentinels at the entrance: When they had leisure they swaggered up and down the streets of Paris. In their London Hotel, they piled the table and chairs in a corner of the room and seated themselves comfortably on the floor.

One day after my return to Japan I met one of these gentlemen. He said to me in tones of great superiority: "When were in Paris we saw Napoleon III carrying out great public works without plan or design (this referred to the beautifying of the city), making strange collections of animals and birds (the Zoological Gardens), and living in luxury (concerts, theatres etc.), we were afraid that he was going to lose his Empire. You see how he was defeated by Germany."

He was very proud of his wonderful political foresight. I found it very hard to keep a straight face. And yet, how many globe-trotters there are who take just the same narrow view of the things they hear and see.

LVI.—THE "KAIYO MARU."

It was at Ceylon, on our way back to Japan, that we heard of the defeat of the Shōgun's troops at Ueno. We arrived—the students from England, France and Holland—at Yokohama in June 1876, the first year of Meiji, and found Enomoto Buyo, on the Koiyo Maru, with his squadron, lying off Shinagawa. The Kaiyo Maru, and Dutch-built vessel was the flagship of the Shogunate fleet.

I at once made an application to the Admiral, and was permitted to join the flagship. We waited until the Shogun's power was reduced, by defection and other circumstances, to the three provinces which were directly under his rule, Suruga, Mikawa, and Tōtōmi, and then, on August 20, 1867, the whole Shogunal Fleet under Enomoto Buyo weighed anchor and sailed for the North. The day before leaving we wrote to Sir Harry Parkes stating that it was our intention to develop the Island of Yezo, and to provide there a place of refuge and a home for such officers of the Shogunate as had been deprived of their incomes. This letter was drawn up by Admiral (later Viscount) Enomoto and Captain Nagai, and translated into English by myself. Many years later, when I was in London as Japanese Minister, I was shown Sir Harry Parkes' report to his Government on the subject of our letter. He stated that judging from the tone of the letter, the course of policy pursued, and the tactics of the squadron, he suspected the presence amongst us of some foreign advisers or counsellors. As a matter of fact, the Emperor of the French was giving secret assistance to the Shōgun, and we had several French naval officers on board. Sir Harry Parkes had probably heard of this.

LVII.—FRENCH NAVAL OFFICERS.

The leader of these French Naval officers was a man named Luné, who held a lieutenant's commission in the French Navy. He resigned from the French Navy (but with a secret understanding that he was still to be entitled to a pension), and put his sword at the disposal of the allied daimyos of Northern Japan. I heard this story from a personal friend who had served under this French officer.

LVIII.—PETRIFIED WARSHIPS.

Whilst Enomoto's fleet was lying at Shinagawa, great numbers of men who had fought for the Shogunate, and had, since the defeat, been hiding in farm-houses and cottages, made their way on board the ships, so that we had a large number on board when we sailed for the North. The Squadron consisted of eight ships, of which I will mention but one,—the Chiyoda. She was the first steamer ever built at Nagasaki, and her hull was of camphor-wood, a material that is very easily petrified. I was told that it was the intention of the Shogun's Government to have one hundred of these small camphor-wood gunboats constructed. It was hoped that they would become petrified in course of time, and that then they would form excellent defences for Tokyo Bay.

LIX.—THE "KAIYO MARU" IN A GALE.

About midnight on the 21st of August, about two days after the Squadron had decamped from Shinagawa, a sudden gale came on which caused the ships to lose sight of one another. The flagship Kaiyo Maru, on which I was, was driven about 80 miles out of her course towards the coast off Chōshi. She had her rudder broken, and was in jeopardy for some time.

We had on board an infantry regiment, which had been raised by Lord Shingaku when he was in the Cabinet. These men, being unaccustomed to the perils of the sea, were much alarmed by the gale, and in their terror cut off their top-knots and offered them to Kompira-daigongen as a propitiatory sacrifice. Thus the gale incidentally helped the cause of civilization by making these men give up the practice of wearing a top-knot.

LX.—HOW WE KEPT HAKODATE

I have said that our fleet was dispersed by the gale off Chōshi. One of our ships, the Kourin Maru was driven to the harbour of Shimidzu in Suruga, where it was sunk by an Imperialist vessel. Another, the Mikaho, struck on a rock and went down.

The Kaiyo Maru made Matsushima (near Sendai) on the 27th, where she was presently joined by the remnants of the Squadron. By this time the allied Daimyos of Northern Japan had been defeated by the Imperialist troops, and there were numbers of fugitive troops from the northern provinces to be taken on board. This delayed our movements a little, and it was not until the 20th of October that we reached Washiki in Yezo, where we landed our infantry. With these we captured the strongholds of the Matsumai clan, and took possession of the whole island.

LXI.—BRITISH CONSUL PROMISES NEUTRALITY.

We found at Hakodate, besides French and British consulates, several British and French vessels of war. With considerable difficulty, and after much negotiation, we succeeded in obtaining from the British Consul a promise of neutrality. We also put into the hands of the commanding officer of the British Squadron a petition to the new Government asking for permission to colonize the Island of Yezo with the quondam officers and retainers of the Tokugawa Shogunate.

LXII.—YOUNG PEOPLE AND "BUSHIDO."

Among the Tokugawa soldiers, who fought in Northern Japan, there was a band of seventy or eighty lads of fifteen or sixteen years of age (I am reckoning in the Japanese way, so that some of them cannot have been in reality more than thirteen or fourteen years old). All but three or four of these young soldiers either died on the field of battle, or committed suicide. So keen were they in following the principles of bushido.

LXIII.—THE SHAME OF A SAMURAI.

Among the high officials of the Sendai class there was a samurai named Matsumoto. Like the rest of his class he was much opposed to the loyalists and was a supporter of the Shogunate. When the Imperialist troops reached his house, his servant advanced to the door and, announcing that he was Matsumoto, cut himself open. Meanwhile his master, the real Matsumoto, fled from the back door.

Making his way to Shiogama, he applied for permission to be taken on board one of the vessels of Enomoto's fleet. Some days elapsed before he succeeded in his object: in the mean time he had told his pitiful tale to a geisha of his acquaintance, and had so worked upon her feelings that she sold everything she possessed, raised a sum of 200 ryo in gold, which she gave to Matsumoto, and then shaved her head and became a nun.

At Hakodate, Matsumoto squandered the whole of the money which this faithful woman had given him in the vilest of debaucheries. And the next year, when the Imperialist troops arrived before Hakodate, he deserted from the Shogunate army, and disappeared, no one knew whither. The self-sacrifice of the faithful retainer, the devotion of a generous woman, were all wasted on this worthless rascal.

LXIV.—HOSHI JINTARO.

In the old Sendai army there was an infantry corps that wore a red uniform. Its commander was a young man of the name of Hoshi Jintarō. When the Sendai clan surrendered to the Imperialist troops, Hoshi was very anxious to make his escape and to join the fugitive army. But he was confronted with a difficulty. He had an aged mother, ill and bed-ridden, whom it was his duty to nurse. A girl in the clan, hearing of his trouble, made the suggestion that if he would marry her she would do the nursing. Hoshi jumped at the proposal, married the girl without delay, and set off to join Enomoto, leaving his mother in good hands. After the defeat at Hakodate he was taken prisoner, but was released very soon, and returned to his wife. In due time a son was born, but the father died not very long afterwards, and the mother was for some time in great distress. Enomoto, however, and other persons who knew her story, came to her assistance, and helped her out of her trouble. But this is now an old story.

LXV.—KIDO KOIN (MARQUIS) AND NAKAJIMA SABURONOSUKE

The story of Nakajima Saburonosuke is well known to the Japanese public. He was a yoriki (a police officer) at Uraga and was well acquainted with Kido Koin before the Restoration. When he died, Kido wanted to bring up his children, but hearing that Enomoto and Otori (afterwards Viscount and Minister to Korea during the China Japan war) had provided for the sons, he contented himself with taking Nakajima's daughter into his family. The action was very creditable to Kido, for Nakajima was a staunch Shogun's man, whilst Kido became one of the early leaders of the Restoration Government. Kido told me that Nakajima was an extremely pleasant person to converse with, and one might sit for hours with him without growing tired of his talk. He said that had he been able to see Nakajima during the course of the Civil War, and to explain to him the true aim of the Restoration leaders, he might have been able to save the worthy man from death.

I very much doubt it. Nakamura was a very faithful man, with very clear views and a strong grasp of principles, and I very much doubt whether he could have been easily converted. Nakamura was a well known poet, and after his death, which took place during a night skirmish at Tsugaru, his body was discovered in a ditch. On his person was found a MS. volume of his own poems.

LXVI.—THE MATSUMAI CLAN AND THE FUGITIVE ARMY.

When the officers of the Matsumai clan heard of the coming of the Fugitive Army, their first thought was to earn the thanks of the Imperial Government by a sturdy defence. "Who can tell," they said, "if we may not get the whole island of Yezo, as a reward for our services?" But when they heard that our men had cut off their top-knots and were quite determined, they began to sing to a different tune. It is said that they put Buddhist priests in the front rank of their army, hoping that we should not be hard on them. The story seems too childish to be true, and yet, when we consider how bravely Buddhist priests like Mikami Chojin fought at the siege of Matsumai Castle, we can see that there may be a grain of truth in it.

LXVII.—THE EXPENSES OF THE FUGITIVE ARMY.

The Shōgun's army was defeated at Fushimi during January in the first year of Meiji (1876). The Shōgun himself escaped to Tempozan-oki whence he was conveyed back to Tokyo on the Kriyo Maru. Enomoto however made his way back to Osaka, where, in the Castle, he found a large quantity of gold (several hundred thousand ryo) which he conveyed on board the Fuji and brought with him to Yedo. It was out of this fund that the expenses of the Fugitive Army were paid. The Fugitives also levied taxes on the inhabitants of Yezo, and minted coin of their own.

LXVIII.—THE COINS IN USE AT THE RESTORATION.

As the feudal lords had the right to coin money, there were 28 different kinds of nibukin (gold coins valued at two bu). There was forty per cent of gold in the coins minted by the Shogunate itself, but the percentage was less in coins minted by the daimyates. There were also some forged coins, of copper gilt. In the money issued by the Fugitives there was about 20 per cent. of gold.

LXIX.—TWO SAD BLOWS FOR THE FUGITIVES.

Everything in the way of stores of guns, ammunition, telegraphic apparatus, &c., was on board the Mikaho which foundered off Chōshi during the gale. Sometime later the Kaijo struck on a rock off Egashi and went down. Thus the Fugitives lost not only their military stores but also their most valuable ship. These were the two greatest disasters that befell them.

LXX.—THE BATTLE AT PORT MIYAKO.

On the 25th of March in the second year of Meiji (1869), the Fugitives attempted a surprise attack on the Imperial fleet anchored off Port Miyako. This was a very bold scheme, but unfortunately it was not successful. The first plan was for the Kaiten, Banryu, and Takao to make a dash for the middle of the Imperialist fleet as it lay anchor. One of our ships was to get into action with the Azuma (the only armoured vessel in the Imperialist squadron) and send in boarders, whilst the two remaining vessels engaged the remainder of the Imperialist squadron. But alas! on the very day that the Fugitive fleet started (21st March) a severe gale began to blow, which forced the ships to divide, and the Kaiten was the only one that kept its tryst at Miyako. She managed to tackle the Azuma and to get boarders on her as arranged, but the other ships came to her assistance, and the Kaiten was obliged to return without having effected anything, and with some loss. Miura Ko, who was later a Rear-Admiral, and who was serving as a gunner on board the Kaiten, told me that he thought he might have succeeded, had they made it their object to disable rather than to capture. The disabling of a rudder or a hole in the side below the watermark would have put the enemy effectually hors de combat and have allowed us to go on to engage the other ships in their squadron. But we had made no provision for a change of programme, and it was impossible at the last moment to swerve from our original plan. I was at the time on the Banryū, and we met the Kaiten at Bambu as she was steaming back to Hakodate after her unsuccessful engagement.

LXXI.—A PARDON FOR THE FRENCH OFFICERS.

There were in the Fugitive Fleet eight French officers who had joined at Shinagawa, and two others who joined them subsequently. They were all taken prisoners when the port of Hakodate was taken by the Imperialist forces, but were speedily released after a merely nominal trial. There are reasons for suspecting that these officers had a secret understanding with their Government when they volunteered to join the Fugitive Fleet. Napoleon III lost his throne not many years later, and, whatever ambitions he may have had in the direction of Japan, he failed to carry them out. Their commander, returning to France, served on the General Staff during the war with Germany. After the war he became a member of the Congress, and when I met him in the 34th year of Meiji (A.D. 1901) he was much interested in the proposed shortening of the terms of military service in France.

LXXII.—THE BOOK THAT HELPED TO SAVE ENOMOTO'S LIFE.

When Hakodate fell, Enomoto presented Kuroda Kiyotaka (later Count Kuroda), who was in command of the Imperialist forces, with a book. It was a Dutch version of a work on International Maritime Law by a French scholar named Oleron (?), the third edition of which was published in 1856. It was by no means a rare book, but Enomoto had had it translated into Dutch whilst in Holland, and for this reason set much store by the MS. translation. It was popularly rumoured that the book was one of untold value, and that it treated exhaustively of military and naval science. This was not the case: yet it was partly through this book, and partly through the good offices of Mr. Fukuzawa, that Enomoto saved his life. The details will be found in Enomoto's autobiography.

LXXIII.—A MATSUMAI HEIRLOOM.

When the Fugitives captured the Castle of Matsumai, they found there a tea-kettle of very great antiquity. It had belonged to Minamoto Yoshitomo, who had used it during his campaigns in Ōshū (N. Japan), and was known by the name of Shinobuyama. It was also known as Fujiyama, in memory of the fact that it had accompanied its owner on the historical hunting trip known as Fuji no makigari. I was not told how it came into the hands of the Matsumai family. At any rate, when Enomoto discovered the nature and value of the heirloom he at once had it returned to its owners. It is still in the possession of the family.

LXXIV.—OLD KAKEMONOS FOR SALE.

One day, while I was walking through the streets of Hakodate, I came across a man who had a number of Kakemono exposed for sale by the side of the street. I looked them over, and to my surprise found one which bore the signature of Dai toku en. The man wanted 25 sen (a shu) for it. I made pretence of knowing nothing about such subjects, and asked the man if he could tell me who the artist was. "Oh, some old Priest, I suppose," was all the answer he gave me. I very much wanted to buy that Kakemono, but I had not the twenty-five sen.

LXXV.—I ASK A MAN TO CUT OFF MY HEAD.

When Goryokaku, the last stronghold of the Fugitives, was surrounded, when provisions and ammunition were running short, and it was evident that we could not hold out many more days, our little band was being constantly diminished by desertions of men and officers, and our leaders, the men who deemed themselves irretrievably compromised, began to think of suicide.

I said to myself: "Desertion and surrender are disgraceful in a samurai. I will do neither, I will kill myself as a samurai should." Then I remembered that I had had no experience of the thing (men with experience of suicide are always rare), and that I should not know how to set about it. So to avoid the disgrace of bungling my own execution, I determined to ask a friend to be so kind as to cut off my head some day suddenly when I was not looking. The friend I selected was a man named Imai Noboru, who was said to have been the murderer of Sakamoto Ryōma. Imai readily consented: but there came a second thought. I might as well live, I thought, to see the end of the game. So I went to Imai and asked him to defer my execution until we saw what the result would be of our defence. I have often thought with shame of my lack of courage in this matter.

LXXVI.—THE DEFENCE OF GORYOKAKU.

The 24-pounders installed in the Goryokaku Fort at Hakodate were the identical guns that had been on board the Russian man-of-war that sank in the harbour of Shimoda. They had been salvaged and presented to the Shogun's Government. During the siege one of our ships, the Choyo, was sunk by the Imperialists, and many boxes containing shot were washed ashore. The Choyo was a ship purchased from the Dutch, who had also set her up with ammunition. They had not been quite honest in their dealings, for, when the boxes that drifted ashore were opened, it was found that whilst the top layers were shot, the lower ones were chunks of wood.

The Fugitives also made submarine mines out of soy casks, which they filled with explosives and placed at the entrance of Hakodate harbour. The casks leaked and the explosives got wet: but the mines did their work all the same, for the Imperialists heard of them and were afraid to enter the port.

LXXVII.—CRUELITIES.

In the earlier part of the Civil War, and notably in Aizu and Kuwana, many atrocities were committed on both sides. But during the siege of Goryokaku there were no cruelties. The hospitals were respected, and persons who surrendered to the Imperial forces were kindly treated. This fact caused many desertions from our army. Men would just swim across the moat and go over to the Imperial Army.

It is only this year (1910) that we have discovered that it was a Satsuma man who protected the Fugitives' Hospitals during the siege and provided them with medicines and necessities. Mr. Ikeda Jirobei, the gentleman to whom I refer, has not prospered in life, and is at present in great destitution, from which his friends are now taking steps to relieve him. It was he also, and not Kurodo, that performed the feat of climbing up the steep cliff at Hakodate.

THE YOKOHAMA SPECIE BANK LTD.

HALF-YEARLY GENERAL MEETING.

The half-yearly general meeting of the shareholders of the above Bank was held on the premises on Saturday, when the President, Baron Takahashi, delivered the following speech:—

GENTLEMEN,—I have the pleasure of presenting to you the report and accounts of this Bank for the first half-year at this Sixty-First ordinary general meeting of the share-holders, and in open meeting to make a brief review of the Bank's business and of the general state of economic conditions of the country.

The economic state during the period under review has shown generally an improvement, and a gradual recovery to the normal level of activities after the prolonged stagnation of the money market since the autumn of the year before last; but still, as people are generally exercising great caution, some considerable time must elapse before we may see any industrial activities. However, our foreign trade, both import and export, has pursued a satisfactory course since last spring, along with the recovery of the economic conditions at home and abroad, the market prices of the sound securities rose gradually, and the amount of bills passed through the clearing houses increased as the months advanced. In short, the circumstances prevailing all round give indication that the financial world is developing in a right direction. Consequent upon the abundant supply of money, the rate of interest was on the side of continual decline. The Government, availing itself of the opportunity, twice issued 4 per cent. loan bonds to the extent of yen 200,000,000 for the conversion of the 5 per cent. internal bonds; and the various companies commercial and industrial organized by the people either made calls on the shares or issued debentures to meet their increased requirements, or to replace their old loans bearing higher rate of interest; and thus although a considerable amount of cash was withdrawn from the market, yet on the other hand the increase in the peoples' savings, coupled with the cash redemption of the national loans kept the tide of the money market as easy as ever. This being the case, the banks have lowered the rate of interest on the deposits, but notwithstanding this they still found themselves to carry large unemployed funds, and this Bank had likewise to pass the period under review with more or less money unemployed.

Turning to our foreign trade during the first half of the year, we find that the merchandise exported amounted to yen 21,200,000 and that imported to yen 239,900,000. These figures, compared with those for the corresponding period of the year preceding, show respectively an increase of yen 21,200,000 in exports and yen 25,400,000 in imports, resulting in a total increase of yen 46,600,000 for imports and exports combined.

This is doubtless the outcome of the improved financial state at home and abroad, but such a large increase of exports is to be attributed in one way to the price of bar silver having been favourable to the China trade, and to the great increase of our cotton goods exported to China, caused by the high prices ruling with the American productions on the similar goods, while increase in the import appears principally to be due to a large increase in the import of cotton from India. The amounts of the exchange sold and bought in Japan on foreign countries by this Bank during the period under review total in round sums yen 29,400,000 and yen 83,700,000 respectively, and if we compare these figures with those of the corresponding period of the preceding year it will be found that there is a decrease amounting to yen 1,100,000 in exchange sold and yen 7,800,000 in exchange bought: but as the exchange bought and sold abroad on Japan amounted to yen 30,400,000 and yen 105,100,000 respectively, showing an increase of yen 1,070,000 in exchange sold and yen 25,500,000 in exchange bought, the net result is the increase of yen 17,600,000 in the total of the Bank's exchange business at home and abroad.

As I have already mentioned, notwithstanding the improvement in the general state of economic affairs, the money market having continued to be in a state of stagnation, the business of this Bank during the period under review has, like that of most other banks, shared the effect of the disadvantage, and the result obtained fell in some measure below the mark of the corresponding part of the last year. Fortunately however, there having been such extra business as the floating of the Government Loans, we have, after making the provision for the doubtful assets, been enabled to reap a net profit not differing much from that of the last account, viz: yen 1,795,769.58. The distribution of this amount I beg you to approve and adopt in the manner stated in the proposition. In conclusion I have much pleasure to report that this Bank has participated during March last in underwriting the issue of the second 4 per cent. internal loan of yen 100,000,000 as in the case of the first issue, and further, during May last, in joining the issuing banks for the flotation of the yen 1,000,000 loan raised by the Government in London.

In May last this Bank received from the Minister of Finance a special order relating to the extension of our business in Manchuria and accordingly have drawn up special regulations to meet the new business, which have been made to operate from the 1st July of this year.

THE YOKOHAMA SPECIE BANK, LIMITED. DIRECTORS' STATEMENT.

The Directors statement to the shareholders, presented at the above meeting, was as follows:—

GENTLEMEN,—The Directors submit to you the annexed Statement of the Liabilities and Assets of the Bank, and of the Profit and Loss Account for the Half-year ended 30th June, 1910.

The Gross Profits of the Bank for the past Half-year, including yen 1,167,407.69 brought forward from last account, amount to yen 13,664,236.11, of which yen 10,101,058.89 have been deducted for Interests, Taxes, Current Expenses, Rebate on Bills Current, Bad and Doubtful Debts, Bonus for Officers and Clerks, &c, leaving a balance of yen 2,963,177.22 for appropriation.

The Directors now propose that yen 350,000.00 be added to the Reserve Fund, and recommend a Dividend at the rate of Twelve per cent., per annum, which will absorb yen 1,440,000.00.

The Balance, yen 1,173,177.22, will be carried forward to the credit of next account.

BARON KOREKIYO TAKAHASHI, Chairman.

Yokohama, 10th September, 1910.

THE THORNLESS CACTUS.

"Notwithstanding the recent drift of criticism, it is being conceded that Mr. Burbank's thornless cactus is going to be a plant of immense value, both for forage and as a food plant. This new plant will come true from graft, and is being reproduced in that way, as well as by leaves broken off and planted. When the young plant is three years old it stands 6 feet high, as much in circumference, and weighs 500 pounds. There will be 500,000 plants distributed during the current year, and these will be distributed through the Gulf States and California. Four tons of the fodder is said to be equal to one ton of alfalfa, and one acre of land will produce as much as four acres of alfalfa.

But we have to take into account that this cactus will grow where the alfalfa will not, on the most unproductive soil, while it needs no irrigation whatever. Then we have 10 to 20 tons of fruit per acre, and this also has a commercial value. It can be used for making syrup, boiled or canned. The leaves are said to be very similar to egg plant, as a salad, or fried.

Mr. Burbank does not claim and never has claimed that this is the only thornless cactus in the world, but he has developed a variety superior to anything before known. An acre of this plant will support five to ten dairy cows, while hogs and sheep do admirably feeding on it. It serves for drink as well as for food, as it contains such a large percentage of water.

It looks now as if we should see this plant as popular as the cow pea and the velvet bean in the Southern States, at least in California, Colorado, Florida and around the Gulf. If the cacti can redeem some hundreds of millions of arid acres, while the legumes more than double the productivity of our better soils, the door is opening much wider to an enormously increased and at the same time better fed population."

CONTRIBUTIONS TO RELIEF FUND.

OPINION ON THE ANNEXATION.

We published in our issue of the 13th inst. a leading article from The Times on the subject of the Annexation. We now supplement that expression of opinion by others from the principal London journals. Under the heading of "Korean Affairs" the Standard of the 26th ult. writes as follows:—

It is unlikely that an opportunity will be afforded, before Parliament reassembles, for an ampler statement than that we published yesterday as to the views of his Majesty's Government respecting the Japanese annexation of Korea. Referring a few days ago to the announcement, telegraphed from Tokio, that the Japanese had resolved to venture on this step without further delay, we took it for granted that notice of their intention would be given to the Powers; and it was natural that the English Foreign Office should be among the first to be apprised of the impending event. Whether, in acknowledging the communication, Sir Edward Grey made more than a formal if friendly comment on the position may be divulged later on. It is obvious, however, that the attitude of Japan's Western ally will be determined by circumstances fairly well known and recited in these columns on Tuesday. On broad political grounds, no objection can be raised in this country to the annexation. Possibly the fanatical persons who hold that the subjection of one people to another is in every case a rank offence against humanity may be ready to espouse the cause of the Koreans; but practical politicians will be content to believe that the Japanese did their best to avoid the troublesome, and perhaps expensive, task of obliterating the last vestiges of Korean independence, and may be content to hope that the country is more likely than not to prosper under direct administration. As regards British commercial interests, it has still to be seen how our commerce in Korea, of which something is said elsewhere, will be affected. In Article III. of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty of 1905 it was recognised that Japan's interests in this part of Asia, political, military, and economic, were paramount. While, however, we admitted her right to take such measures of guidance, control, and protection as she might deem proper for their safeguard and advancement, it was provided that nothing should be done contrary to the principle of equal opportunities for the commerce and industry of all nations. When communicating the text of the treaty to Russia, Lord Lansdowne remarked that it was evident that Korea must fall under the control and tutelage of Japan.

When the Convention by which the Hermit Kingdom becomes an integral part of the Mikado's empire is published, we may doubtless expect a summary of the arguments that made the prolongation of the status quo no longer possible. It may not be altogether easy, however, to find a plausible explanation of the fact that not long ago an official report was issued by the Japanese Resident-General in Korea, the tendency of which was to prove that under the existing system things were going on admirably. The improvements and progress made—it was hinted, if not expressly claimed—were all that could be wished. Difficulties, indeed, had arisen in the past. Korean officials paid little respect to the advice given to them so long as they were free to reject it. Evils and abuses had taken deep root. The incapacity of the same officials and their habitually defective governmental organisation handicapped the success of the Japanese programme. But a remedy had been found in the appointment of Japanese officials to the number of over two thousand. It was confidently expected, according to the Resident-General, that they would serve as models of official routine and moral integrity, and that under their tuition the Koreans, "habitually degenerate," would rapidly become useful servants of the State. The insurrection, which had constituted a grave obstacle to progress, was yielding to treatment. Organised insurgents, the report said, are to-day almost extinct, nothing remaining except bands of the highway robber class. But the most hopeful sign was that the friendship of the two nations was now closely cemented, and required no official stimulant. Both parties, we are told, were coming to appreciate their mutual usefulness. There was a special reference to the visit of the Korean Crown Prince to Japan. This interesting youth is a boy of eleven, whose retentive memory and brightness in making practical application of what he learns astonish his instructors. He excels in arithmetic, and his linguistic ability is remarkable. A good word is also said for the Emperor, whose willing acceptance of the last reform scheme is warmly applauded. All this and more is gravely recorded in the second annual report on Reforms and Progress in Korea, published at Seoul only last December.

But there is no particular mystery about the change of front that has taken place. A Resident-General, appointed to carry on what, after all, was rather a pretence of respecting native institutions, made the best of things. Unprejudiced observers have borne witness to the failure of an attempt to treat Korea as some of the feudatory States in our Indian Empire are treated. The Koreans were incapable of ruling themselves, and equally incapable of administering their own affairs under the tutelage of Japanese political agents. The best thing that can happen to them is the gradual and cautious introduction of an administrative system in which competent Japanese officials will hold all the higher posts, but to which natives of the country will be admitted so far as they prove their fitness and intelligence. The rare is not incapable of improvement; and Koreans who have settled in Russian territory are said to have shown unexpected virtues as citizens and settlers. The Japanese now have the chance of winning the good opinion of the world as a people who can rule over others as well as over themselves; and by their English allies the experiment will be watched with friendly interest.

The Daily Mail of the 25th ult. has the following under the caption of "The Annexation of Korea."

The annexation of Korea will be proclaimed by Japan at the end of the month. Upon political grounds no objection can be raised by Great Britain, though it will be necessary to make certain that the convention gives complete protection to our commercial interests. Until the text of the convention is published we must reserve our judgment on this point, which is the only one that seriously concerns us. It is, however, of the utmost importance that his Majesty's Ministers should satisfy themselves and the country that the commercial convention gives no opening for any of those misunderstandings that have added to the difficulties of the Japanese in Manchuria.

The step which the Japanese have taken is the logical sequence of events that go back into centuries here has always been in Japan a popular belief that Korea by the conquests of the third and the sixteenth centuries was an integral part of the Japanese Empire. The attempt of China to revive its suzerainty over the Hermit Kingdom was the cause of the Sino-Japanese war in 1894, and the fear that Russia had designs on Korea was responsible for the war in Manchuria. Having once more asserted her claim by force of arms, Japan has not unwisely determined that the position of Korea shall not again be questioned. The annexation, apart from its effect on international commerce, can change nothing in the situation, seeing that it has existed in all save name since the Manchurian war. With the deposition of the Emperor of Korea in 1905 and the nomination of a successor who was content to obey his masters in Tokyo, vanished the last obstacle to permanent occupation and control by the Japanese. How ever much the Koreans may resent the domination of a Power which they accused of slavish trucking to "foreign devils," they cannot ignore the material benefits which the Japanese protectorate has conferred upon their country. The corruption, incompetency, and greed that reduced Korea to a state of squalid poverty and made progress in any form impossible were checked, if they did not disappear, under the firm and experienced rule of the late Prince Ito. Railways, which were practically unknown until the war with Russia, have made Korea a highway for trade between Japan and China. Important harbours and large reclamations of land have added to the wealth of the country. Scientific methods of agriculture have replaced primitive methods, and the great natural resources in forests and fisheries have been developed.

It was impossible that so vast a social and economic revolution could be made without protest and perhaps without injustice to individuals. The temptation offered at the end of the war to undesirable immigrants from Japan was irresistible, and Koreans were undoubtedly made to suffer for the sins of their fathers. Prince Ito did his best to mitigate these evils of conquest. His successor has followed his example, and now that the Japanese Government is about to assume absolute control and responsibility, Korea is assured of a future worthy of her natural resources and of the undoubted capacities of her people.

While the perpetrator of the recent tragedy at Fujisawa is still at large, a similar crime was committed on Monday night at Namazu. A fishmonger and his family consisting of his wife and a daughter, were all murdered in their house.

CHINA NEWS AND NOTES.

The prevailing news from China, to-day and all the time, is the way in which China, following the lead of Japan, is studying other lands. Now it is the army, next the navy, finance, religion, home life, everything. The following item will probably be followed soon by notice of internal improvements at home in the police department.

CHINA'S POLICE SYSTEM

Mr. Lien Chia, formerly Treasurer of the Province of Anhui, in China, and now a highly placed official in the Chinese Police Department, has been in England for some days, the object of his visit being to study the police methods of Scotland Yard, says The L. & C. Express of August 12. He is proceeding to various European capitals on the same mission. A prominent official of the Chinese Embassy stated that it is proposed to remodel the police system in China. The British system will be taken as a model, having regard to local conditions.

Lien Chia has already paid a visit to Japan and the United States of America, where, among other institutions, he made a study of the police systems. On his arrival in England, a visit to Scotland Yard was arranged for him through the Chinese Minister, and this was paid on the 9th instant, when he was shown over some of principal departments of the "Yard," and witnessed some of the administrative methods in actual operation. One of the departments which interested him greatly was that in which the identification of criminals is assisted by means of the finger-print test. Lien Chia was also accompanied to some of the most congested points of London, and was shown that which always evokes the wonder of the stranger—the regulation of the traffic by the constables on point duty. He was likewise made acquainted with the system of street patrol. On August 12 Lien Chia left London for Paris, where he was to continue his investigations.

FLOODS IN CHINA.

In the following item taken from a native paper it is pitiful to note that while it describes "the distress of the poorer element of the surviving victims as beyond description," no mention is made of relief measures except on the part of Japanese officials.

HSIMINTUN FLOODED.

Hsimintun has been visited by a sudden and disastrous flood. 60 per cent. of the Chinese houses in that town have been destroyed mostly completely. 300-400 casualties have resulted. The distress of the poorer element of the surviving victims is beyond description. The Peking-Mukden Railway service which was interrupted since the general flooding of the town on Monday, the 22nd, that rose to the height of 7 ft. on the following day has been resumed and a supply of rice and charcoal was shipped from Mukden for the relief of principally the Japanese residents there who had all taken refuge in the Branch Consulate, the Post Office and elsewhere and whose property losses are put at about yen 50,000. The Japanese Post Office was also flooded, but no harm was done to the postal matters in its custody. The Chinese Court there is reported to have lost all its papers.

Mr. C. Koike, the Japanese Consul-General, Mukden, took the first train after the deluge for the scene of disaster and is looking after the comfort of the Japanese sufferers.

Viceroy Hsi-liang has given orders to the Board of Administration to take measures for prompt relief.

The havoc wrought at Hsimintun by the recent flood appears graver than previously reported. About 75 per cent. of the houses have collapsed. A large number of the Chinese victims are being starved to death, but the relief measures applied are quite inadequate.

16 out of the 17 houses of Japanese residents are wholly or seriously destroyed beyond hope of restoration. Consul-General Koike and Vice-Consul Hojo have selected for the place of common lodging accommodation a building considered as exposed least to molestations by brigands who infest the locality, and are in sundry other ways ministering to the immediate needs of the sufferers.

The Consul-General, on his return to Mukden on Thursday night, sent a second supply of provisions, lime and other disinfectants.

H. E. TANG SHAO-YI.

A Chinese newspaper referring to the appointment of Tang Shao-yi, prints the following appreciation:—

The appointment of His Excellency Tang Shao-yi as Acting President of the Yuchuan Pu cannot but be hailed with the highest satisfaction by all who wish to see China advance along the path of the reform. Of the few foreign educated men who are holding positions of honour and responsibility in the Government service, it may be said without fear of contradiction that His Excellency is one of the ablest and most straightforward. H.E. Tang carried out successfully many measures of reform the credit for which was mistakenly given to other officials. But the work for which H.E. Tang will be remembered long after his other works shall have been forgotten is that of opium reform. Should China carry through successfully the present anti-opium movement, and we have no reason to doubt her ultimate success, the chief credit must belong to H.E. Tang, and posterity will ever remember him as the liberator of millions of sufferers from a most harmful and degrading vice.

RICE CROP FAILURE

The Canton correspondent of The Hongkong Telegraph, writing on the 5th instant, states that on account of the failure of the first rice crop this year the committees of the various charitable institutions in Canton promptly adopted the proposal for distributing cheap rice to supply the wants of the people with a view to prevent occurrences similar to the riots in Changsha. With the kind co-operation and pecuniary assistance of the committee of the Tung Wah Hospital in Hongkong and others at different ports, they have been successful in carrying out the relief measures. It is remarkable that in a very short period of time these gentlemen were able to raise a large sum of money sufficient to meet urgent requirements. H.E. Viceroy Yuan also realizing the serious condition of the situation, owing to the scarcity of rice, gave orders to appropriate a sum of 40,000 taels from the Government treasury towards the funds for the purpose.

Cheap rice was accordingly distributed from four sheds erected at different points in the city, and hundreds of people thronged round these depôts every day to obtain their supply of the staple commodity. The distribution commenced on the 18th June 1st, and it was determined that the sale of cheap rice was to be continued for two months. Now the time limit of two months is about to expire and the sheds have to be closed and the sale of cheap rice will be discontinued on the 16th instant. The committees of the charitable institutions therefore arranged a meeting to take place on the 9th instant for the purpose of discussing the advisability of closing the sheds and discontinuing the distribution of cheap rice on the date as originally fixed.

A RECENT TRAVELLER'S IMPRESSIONS.

The following very interesting interview with a traveller who has carefully studied China, both in the past and recently, presents a new phase of, and reason for, the revolutionary spirit abroad in the land:—

Dr. Geil, the American traveller, has just completed a twelve months' journey through China, in which he has visited the capitals of nearly all the provinces of the Empire. In giving his impressions he said:

"One of the things that remain uppermost in my mind is the general spirit of revolution which I met with. By this I do not mean an anti-dynastic or anti-foreign feeling so much as what I would call an 'anti-baby' movement. Particularly among the scholars and thinking men the opinion prevails that China is passing through a critical period of her history, and there is a feeling of resentment that a baby should be on the throne at such a juncture. I did not find a display of antagonism to the Regent, but these Chinese thinkers hold that China can never be properly modernised under an infant ruler. They refered to the fact that all China's troubles in modern times have occurred during the reign of the last three Emperors, all of whom were children. Elsewhere I found an anti-dynastic movement. Yet I saw no reason for revolution in China. Quite the contrary; it seems to me that the Government is doing all that is possible. Even to one who knows China well, the changes are nothing short of marvellous."

"I have attended sittings of various provincial parliaments, I have visited schools and other modern institutions all through China, and am surprised at the reality of the desire to bring China up to date. In Kwang-si, the great copper centre of China, I found a large school being erected and a widespread desire on the part of the young men to take the full modern curriculum. There I found the youngest governor of China himself attending classes on international law. His private secretary is a graduate of Cambridge, and two of his secretaries wear no pig-tails. Only those who know China can realise what this means. At Kwe-Lin I found in process of construction a large model up-to-date prison. In the remote province of Kwei-Chau I found that the prefect was erecting a great block of almshouses capable of accommodating hundreds of persons, and he had established a school for the study of silkworms."

Referring to the spread of militarism in China, Dr. Geil says: "Throughout China there is constant military preparations have been a source of wonder to me. Wherever I went I saw evidence of a general plan for the preparation of an enormous army. Not only in the provincial capitals but in the smaller towns, drilling is in constant progress."

THE WARWICK MAJOR COMEDY COMPANY.

It is so long since we had a theatrical company in Yokohama that the news of the impending visit, in November next, of the Warwick Major Comedy Company will be received with pleasurable anticipation by our readers.

From the reports of our contemporaries to hand we read that this organisation of 8 London artists, under the sole direction of Mr. Warwick Major, has created a furore and drawn record houses in Bombay, Calcutta, Rangoon, Penang, Singapore and Hongkong.

The Major, who is so well-known to our readers as the General Manager and musical director of the Bandmann Companies that he needs no introduction, is to be congratulated on his special effort to give the theatre-going public of the East a series of performances of unparalleled brilliance. As is only to be expected from a man of his attainments and experience, the company has been selected with the utmost care, with a view to the various plays being performed exactly as produced in London, and he is to be complimented on having brought together a combination such as has never before toured the East.

Miss Georgie Corlass, who, as leading lady for several years with the Bandmann Opera Company, won hosts of admirers in the East, is playing title rôles in most of the pieces. She has just returned from a two-year's holiday in England, and the rest and change have had such a beneficial effect that her work is more winsome and sparkling than ever. She has been the recipient of enthusiastic ovations in each of the towns visited, and the public have evinced their appreciation of her charm and vivacity in a manner that leaves no doubt as to her being an artiste of the highest standing and accomplishments.

Mr. Major, who is an actor of great power, sustains the leading characters in most of the plays with a force and distinction that has earned for him the eulogistic comments of the press and the hearty support of the public.

Among such a galaxy of talent as the Major presents it is difficult to specialise, so we will content ourselves with a short synopsis of those articles whose achievements and experience call for special notice.

Miss Maude Stewart Drewry is an artiste with a long list of successes to her credit and a future full of promise before her. Her most recent engagements include leading roles in Shakespearean plays in which she has played Desdemona, Ophelia, Lady Anne, Calpurnia, etc., and leading parts under most of the better known London managements.

Miss Minnie Rayner will be remembered by our readers as the charming and versatile actress who has already established herself as a popular favorite in the East in connection with the Bandmann Opera and Comedy companies.

Mr. Kenneth Brampton is a "Juvenile Lead" of the first order and his position as an artist of high ability and varied experience is proved by his having been selected by Mr. H. B. Irving to play Lieut. van Howen in "Lights Out," by Mr. Edward Terry as "Juvenile Lead" in "Sweet Lavender," Liberty Hall, "The Magistrate" and "Kander's Widow;" and by the Lyceum management for a season in "Pete."

Mr. Reginald Rivington has a London reputation to which he more than does credit. His many important engagements include seasons with Sir Charles Wyndham, Mr. Fred Terry, Mr. George Alexander, Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker at the Court Theatre, the La Scala and in Paris.

The other members of this brilliant company are all artistes of renown in the West-End, and their visit to Yokohama promises to be an event to be remembered. Mr. Major, who has made a special study of the requirements of the theatre-going public of the East, has spared no expense to ensure that his performances shall be of the very best. In addition to the 18 London artists forming the company the Major tours his own orchestra—a combination of clever musicians whose playing adds to the brightness of the musical numbers, introduced by Miss Georgie Corlass and other members of the company, which are a special feature of the performances.

The plays to be presented include the following London successes:—

"Jane," "Are you a Mason," "You never can tell," "Niobe," "Charley's Aunt," "Old Heidelberg," "The Private Secretary," "The case of Rebellious Susan," "The Importance of being Earnest" and "The Dandy Doctor."

Most of these will be played for the first time in the East.

THE INTERNATIONAL MOVEMENT AGAINST ALCOHOL.

(CONTRIBUTED)

One of the things which soon strikes the attention of the student of the Continental movement against alcohol is the way in which its leaders make straight for the logical conclusion—abstinence and prohibition. This last cannot yet, of course, save in Scandinavia, be placed on the immediate programme, but it is clearly at the back of most minds as the ultimate ideal. These clear-cut thinkers brush aside the sophistries, the casuistries, the paradoxes which have been served up in America this weary time by certain dilettante advisers. With halfway measures they have little patience; with halfway men even less. The following quotation is from the pen of the gifted Italian alienist (insanity specialist), Prof. Dr. Paolo Amaldi:—

"It is," says he, "no spirit of dogmatism which makes me judge anti-alcohol propaganda of the moderate type to be contradictory, useless and harmful. Rather the plainest logic. Alcohol is a poison, the prototype of narcotics, charged with passing seductions and permanent disasters. In the true and precise sense of the word, no dose is harmless. In fact the 'harmless glass' is a myth without scientific justification. From no point of view is it a food. The most minute quantity diminishes the system's power of resistance, as Laitinen's beautiful experiments have proved."

"Now, the logical conclusion from these facts is abstinence—a conclusion corroborated by personal experience. For thirty years I was a moderate drinker of wine. For fourteen I have lived abstinent, and the result is I commend abstinence to all who are dear to me. As a physician, too, and not merely in my work as an alienist, my most important successes are due to indicated prohibition of alcohol, including wine."

"I must explain how and why I consider a temperance agitation in the moderate sense as an evil thing. First, it must be remembered that moderation has been fruitlessly preached for centuries by moralists and philanthropists. Further, in Italy it is not the alcoholism of the few who land in prisons and madhouses which is the danger, but the widespread moderate alcoholism, which, affecting all strata of society, soils and discolors the whole nation; which under the disguise of the 'harmless glass' weakens the whole national organism's power of resistance, increases disease of all kinds, makes the bed for all forms of tuberculosis, prepares the moral and physical decline of coming generations and filches a fourth—perhaps a third—of our people's wages spent in 'moderate drinking.' The alcoholism of the insane, the criminal, the drunkard, is but the visible and irremediable exponent of the fundamental, the true pathological phenomenon—the social alcoholism, against which we must and can struggle.

“In this sense the maxim that moderate drinkers are the real cause of alcoholism is true. It is a pity that we, in Italy, cannot take advantage of the experiences of other peoples in this fight. For if we should advance now to the radical positions we could blot out the twenty to forty years which separates us from other nations.”

AN ADDITION TO THE Y.Y.C. FLEET.

We learn that the Yokohama Yacht Club has just got another addition to the fleet, viz:—Mr. C. B. Clausen's Viking. The dimensions are the same as those of his former yacht, the Valkyrien—35 ft. over all, 8 ft. beam, 20 ft. 6 in. waterline and 5 ft. draught, but her lines especially forward are quite different.

The yacht is fitted with a fine cabin most comfortably arranged to seat 6 persons, with tables, also all necessary lockers for accommodation of provisions and clothes, as well as two settee bunks. The forward part of the house is fitted with two air ports to open up and act as ventilators to the cabin. The forward deck is fitted with a small hatchway to serve as entrance to the sailors' accommodation and sail lockers, and the vessel is also equipped with a comfortable cockpit with seats and lockers.

Altogether the Viking is a most comfortable little cruiser and yachtsmen are all interested to see what the new craft will do, as this will be third new addition to the 22 rater class for this season. We wish the Viking every success and feel confident that she will give a good account of herself.

CORRESPONDENCE.

INOUE'S DICTIONARY.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE “JAPAN MAIL.”)

SIR,—Referring to the inquiry of your correspondent “ex-okohamian” in your issue of the 3rd inst., I would say that the class of words referred to are found in Inouye's Dictionary under Ga (gaik-ku, &c.). By the same rule Inouye romanizes Ka (kaijo, &c.), a class of words that most lexicographers represent by Kwa.

Yours, &c., GEORGE M. ROWLAND.

COUNT HAYASHI'S REMINISCENCES: SOME QUESTIONS OF FACT.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE “JAPAN MAIL.”)

CHER MONSIEUR,—Re les Reminiscences—C'est avec beaucoup d'intérêt que j'ai lu les articles parus ces jours derniers dans les colonnes de votre si estimé journal, intitulés “Count Hayashi's Reminiscences” que j'ai connu assez particulièrement dans les sixties (1863 etc 64):—

Je regrette cependant de ne pas être d'accord avec lui sur la partie intitulée, XX Toy-Guns: paru ce jour, comme suit:

“In the first year of Genji—A.D. 1864—the combined fleet of ‘Great Britain—America (?) France and Holland bombarded Shimonoseki (5th of September 1864) and captured some guns. These guns afterwards landed ‘on an open space by the side of Dr. Hepburn's house etc. (actuellement N. 39) they were all wooden guns, bound with bamboo hoops and looked for all the world like the cannons that are used for discharging fire works.”

Monsieur le Comte Hayashi n'aura pas eu connaissance—sans doute des photographies prises par le célèbre photographe Beato—embarqué à bord de la flotte anglaise comme photographie attirée de la flotte—sinon il se serait rendu compte que ces prétendus canons en bois étaient de vrais canons coulés en bronze, portant les armoiries du Prince de Nagato, et dont qq uns du calibre de 12 pouces et pesant plusieurs tonnes, suivant les rapports de cette époque.

Si nous nous reportons aux rapports de cette époque, nous lisons: “bluejackets parties we shortly after landed to destroy the batteries and embark the guns—his was a work of much labour and difficulty, and efficiently performed under direction of Captain Dowel of the Barossa?—The guns were not all put on board the fleet as trophies of victory until the 10th”—soit trois jours (pour des canons en bois ce serait un peu?) Puis nous lisons: “In all there were sixty-two pieces of ordnance put on board the ships of European nationalities, in proportion to the force each employed during the engagements afloat and ashore. They were mostly brass “pieces, about 32 pounders and manufactured at the Shimonoseki arsenal, showing excellent work and metal.

Comme les E.U. n'avaient sur rade que l'as James-town the only American man-of-war on the station was a sailing ship and could not accompany the expedition the Minister chartered the Takiang for $10,000 per month and placing an officer and a few sailors and an swivel gun, the Takiang flying the U.S. Flag."

D'après une autre version voici comment et où les guns were captured.

Ce n'est point pour critiquer l'article de M. le Comte Hayashi—mais pour que les faits soient exacts—et connus des deux côtés. Je présume que vous aurez déjà relevé cette erreur—et vous prie d'excuser la présente.

Veuillez agréer, Monsieur le Capitaine, mes salutations distinguées mes remerciements anticipés pour l'accueil réservé à la présente.

J. FAVRE BRANDT.

Yokohama, September 9, 1910.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

RE-REMINISCENCES DU COMTE HAYASHI-(suite). XXVI.—Dr Hepburn. C'est lui qui le premier fit une amputation avec l'autorisation des autorités de Yedo, à un soldat du fort de Kanagawa. Ce fort devant rendre un salut, un des canons sauta, et un des servants fut tellement mal arrangé, que le Dr Hepburn déclara qu'il n'y avait qu'une amputation, pour sauver la vie du servant, et elle réussit pleinement.

Old Ships.—Si quelques-uns étaient comme l'indique le Comte Hayashi, par centre les daimios, et en tête Satsuma achetaient les meilleurs, c'est ainsi que la Maison Dent par l'entremise de M. Glover, vendit ses bateaux, greyhound de ces époques.

Suppositions Criminales.—Le fait relaté a toujours passé quelques parmi étrangers bien informés de cette époque, comme indiqué par le Comte—seulement le fait ci-après il a omis ou ne l'a pas connu : —Shimizu en récompense de son action (d'après les relations des samourais et yakounins de ces temps—aurait eu le soir avant son exécution un repas vrai go-chiso puis le matin il fut réveillé—pour se rendre au lieu du supplicene voyant point ses zoris il les réclama parait-il—mais sur l'observation de ses geoliers, que cela ne se pouvait pas, il aurait déclaré nettement, je ne m'y rendrai pas, autrement, et pour éviter des révélations, on lui aurait donné gain de cause? Ce n'est pas un, mais officiers anglais, le Major Baldwin et le Lieutenant Bird, qui ont été assassinés à Kaniakoura.

Ce n'est point Sir H. Parkes, mais bien Sir R. Alcock, qui était alors Ministre d'Angleterre au Japon. S.R.A. quitta le Japon le 24 Décembre à bord du H.B.M.S. Barossa.

1864, l'exécution de Shimizu eut lieu le 27 XII. 1864. Et S. H. Parkes arriva à Yokohama le 20 Juin, 1865.

XXXIII.—l'Artiste mentionné n'était autre que M. Virgmann—dont les caricatures si pleines de vérités font encore l'admiration de ceux qui les ont conservées—Son fils, l'artiste lui-même, habite Yokohama.

Je suis surpris des lignes concernant les docteurs de cette époque—(XXVI)—car à Nagasaki en 1863—nous étions tous surpris des planches d'anatomie y exposées et copiées de celles des docteurs Holla (Si bold-Baldwin et autres).

Oserai-je vous demander si vous approuvez, que les omissions ou les erreurs dues sans doute à la mémoire soient relevées, autant que faire se pourra, sans froisser les susceptibilités de personne, mais pour ne pas les laisser accréditer et main enir les faits aussi exactement que possible avant qu'ils ne deviennent des légendes? et ils en tiennent le chemin.

Veuillez, cher Monsieur, excuser ma témérité, et accepter avec mes remerciements, les salutations distinguées de votre dévoué et fervent lecteur,

JAMES FAVRE BRANDT.

The Pope has taken new measures against modernism. The young clergy are forbidden to read the newspapers, in order not to be distracted while pursuing their studies.

A NEW AVIATION RECORD.

At Issy les Moulineaux, near the fortifications of Paris, the aviator Chavez attained an altitude in a monoplane of 8790 feet, which is a record.

THE DALAI LAMA.

Taotai Li Changchi arrived at Daijeeling on Monday from Lhasa, having been ordered by the Chinese Government to visit the Dalai Lama.

GERMAN MANOEUVRES.

FAILURE OF THE AIRSHIPS.

The feature of the German manoeuvres has been the complete failure of the aerial scout service. A rainstorm compelled the invaders' dirigible to descend in the enemy's territory, where it was captured. On the other hand, the defenders' dirigible made misleading reports of the action, by which the whole position was changed in favour of the invaders.

AMERICAN TEXTILE REGULATIONS.

Washington.—The modifications of the Consular textile regulations have been partially drafted. All the points to which England and France have objected have been taken up, and it is believed that the objections have been met, although the principle requiring samples of all standard textiles to be deposited at the Consulates will be rigidly enforced.

EXPLOSION ON THE "NORTH DAKOTA."

London, September 10.

An explosion and fire occurred on the battleship North Dakota near Ocean City, as the result of a test of oil fuel. Three men were killed and seven injured.

Later.

The men who lost their lives in the accident on the U.S. battleship North Dakota were drowned by the flooding of the stokehold, which was the only means of preventing a catastrophe, as the powder magazine was close to the oil-tanks.

THE CRETAN QUESTION.

THE GERMAN CROWN PRINCE.

ITINERARY OF FAR EASTERN TOUR.

London, September 11.

Reuter's correspondent at Berlin wires that the arrangements for the Crown Prince's tour, so far as at present known, are, after leaving Ceylon:—Arrives Bombay Dec. 14th; travels through India, leaving Calcutta on Feb. 14th, at the latest, for Singapore and Bangkok. An excursion to Java is also under consideration, and, if this is undertaken, the Prince will reach Hongkong about the middle of March, proceeding thence to Canton and Shanghai. After several days at Kiaochow he will reach Peking on the 10th of April, and Tokyo about the 24th idem, starting homeward via Siberia in the commencement of May.

The list of the German Crown Prince's suite for his Eastern tour has been published. It includes General von Schenk, aide-de-camp to the Emperor, and six others.

THE "IKOMA."

The Ikoma has arrived at Port Said.

FRENCH NAVY.

London, September 12.

Paris.—M. Lanessan, ex-Minister of Marine, has written an article protesting against the redistribution of the French Naval forces. He contends that in view of the German preparations, it is in the North and not the Mediterranean that the most powerful fleets should be concentrated. And moreover states that such a policy is dictated by the understanding with Britain.

GERMANY MANOEUVRES.

The Mayor of Tokyo Mr. Ozaki has arrived at Berlin.

The German army manoeuvres are concluded, observers praise the stamina and training of the men.

AIRSHIP IN ENGLISH ARMY MANŒUVRES.

In the manœuvres at Hampshire Saturday the Army airship did splendid work. Constant accurate reports were sent by wireless telegraph to headquarters as to the disposition and movements of troops.

WRECK ON FRENCH RAILWAY.

A train from Cherbourg was derailed at Bernay, seven being killed and 50 injured.

BRITISH MISSION TO AUSTRO-HUNGARY.

London, September 12.

The Emperor Francis Joseph received Lord Rosebery's mission, announcing the accession of King George, in the most jovial manner and afterwards visited Lord Rosebery in the latter's apartments at the Hofburg. This is an unprecedented mark of favour. Other unusual attentions were bestowed upon the mission.

TURKEY AND THE GREEKS.

The Turkish Government has officially communicated with the Greek Patriarch at Constantinople its prohibition, under pains and penalties, of the proposed national assembly, as contrary to the law of the state, the patriarchal privileges also being likely to provoke disturbance.

CHOLERA IN RUSSIA.

London, September 13.

The Times has a telegram from St. Petersburg stating that the official statistics of the Cholera are appalling. There have been 154,445 cases and 75,752 deaths in the whole empire.

DEFENSE AGAINST AIR SHIPS.

Howitzers, at a range of about 2 miles, shattered a dummy air ship towed over Whitsand bay by a scout.

ELECTIONS IN THE U. S.

The Democrat Plaisted has been elected Governor of Maine, where the Democrats are carrying the election for the legislature.

LABOUR TROUBLES END IN MURDER.

Strikers have murdered a working docker at Havre. They battered his head in with stones. The outrage was deliberately planned by the Union whose Secretary and two others have been arrested.

TRUST OFFICIALS ARRESTED.

Chicago.—The Federal Grand Jury has indicted ten high officials of the Swift, Armour and Morris Beef Packing Companies who are charged with Combination and Conspiracy and illegal Monopoly.

ENGLISH LABOUR MATTERS.

At the opening of the Trades Union Congress at Sheffield, the leaders are faced with serious disputes between Capital and Labour on the part of the boilermakers, the South Wales miners, the Great Northern railwaymen's threatened dispute, and the Lancashire cotton spinners lockout.

ENGLISH MISSION TO AUSTRIA.

The Austrian press is delighted with Lord Rosebery's visit and declare it marks a significant change of attitude on the part of England toward Austro-Hungary. The ill-feeling over the annexation of Bosnia being dispelled and the old friendly relations re-established.

THE HONGKONG UNIVERSITY.

London, September 14.

The Times, publishing the account of the Hongkong University, refers to the German guarantee of ten thousand pounds sterling to the High School at Kiaochow, and trusts the university's appeal to the British public will not be in vain.

ROOSEVELT AND NEW YORK STATE CONVENTION.

Having concluded a fortnight of speech making Roosevelt started the gigantic task of organizing a new Republican party in an endeavour to recure the victory in the State Convention. The Maine results are the more significant because that state has hitherto been a Republican stronghold.

Later.

New York.—Democratic successes, and defections in New England, have increased the Republican determination to make Roosevelt Chairman of the Convention as the only way to save the state.

GERMAN PROTEST AGAINST HIGH PRICES OF MEAT.

Berlin.—Many meetings have been held to protest against the high price of meat. The Government has been petitioned to secure a reduction.

TUBERCULOSIS IN GREAT BRITAIN.

There are over 350,000 sufferers from tuberculosis in the United Kingdom, and 90,000 deaths annually. The National Association for the Prevention of Consumption is inaugurating an educational crusade, among other methods of combating the disease.

MEAT FAMINE IN GERMANY.

London, September 14.

There is growing agitation as the result of a meat famine in Germany, which is ascribed to the tariffs.

DEMOCRATS CONFIDENT OF VICTORY IN NOVEMBER.

The Democrats are almost dazed with the victory in Maine, and are confident that there will be a general "landslide" in November.

AEROPLANES VERSUS DIRIGIBLES.

Despite high winds and many mishaps aeroplanes proved to be useful scouts during the French manœuvres, compelling the Generals to modify the disposition of their troops.

The dirigibles were wind-bound and had to remain in their sheds.

DOCK FOR DREADNOUGHTS.

The Committee of the Clyde Navigation Trustees have recommended that the Trustees construct a dock for Dreadnoughts at Renfrew.

EFFORTS TO END ENGLISH LABOUR STRUGGLES.

Public feeling in Lancashire is increasingly in favour of efforts being made to avoid a lock-out among the cotton spinners, in view of the insignificance of the point in dispute.

The mayors of eight cotton spinning towns have expressed a strong opinion that a way out of the difficulty ought to be, and can be, found.

MANCHURIAN RAILWAYS' AGREEMENT.

London, September 15.

St. Petersburg.—The South Manchurian Railway and the Kilin-Changchun Railway have signed a working agreement at Kwangchengtse.

THE HONGKONG UNIVERSITY SCHEME.

Sir F. Lugard has issued an appeal for the Hongkong University Fund. He explains the scheme at some length, and dwells on the unique advantages of Hongkong, remarking that a university in China is bound to come under the deadening influence of Chinese officialdom.

The Liverpool Clergy Union has raised £2,000 in aid of the Fund.

GREECE AND ITS CONSTITUTION.

Athens.—At the opening of the National Assembly for the purpose of revising the non-fundamental clauses of the Constitution, King George rejoiced at the eminently pacific manner in which the electors had used their supreme political right. He was confident that the Assembly would overcome all difficulties and prepare a healthier basis for working their institutions.

AMERICAN POLITICS.

The Republican primary election in Washington indicates that Insurgents, supported by Mr. Roosevelt, will be elected Federal Senators—probably two Insurgents to one Republican Congressman.

THEIR MAJESTIES AND IRELAND.

Dublin.—The Daily Express says that Their Majesties' tour in Ireland will take place after the Coronation.

AIRSHIP DESTROYED BY FIRE.

Later.

Baden.—The passenger-airship Zeppelin VII. has been destroyed by fire in its shed as the result of an explosion of petrol. The car and several of the crew were burned.

PANAMA.

AMERICAN CHARGÉ'S INDISCRETION.

Washington.—Mr. Marsh, the United States Chargé d'Affaires in Panama, has been recalled, apparently owing to an interview in which he said "that if Vice-President Mendoza be elected, the United States will be compelled to occupy or annex Panama."

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE TOKYO "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

FORTIFICATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL.

London, September 9.

The Berlin Frankfurter welcomes the Times suggestion that in the event of the Powers disagreeing, the question of the fortification of the Panama Canal might be submitted to International arbitration, and adds that Great Britain and the United States would thereby earn everlasting credit.

GERMAN ARMY MANŒUVRES.

A special from Elburg states that the Germany army manœuvre scheme seems to be the most comprehensive yet planned. 90,000 men are engaged.

WELSH LABOUR TROUBLES.

Great unrest exists in the Welsh Coal Trade. Thirty-five thousand men have been informed that all contracts terminate at the end of September. The main cause of dispute is brought about by the leaders of the men.

AMERICAN POLITICAL SITUATION.

Washington.—Every indication points to Progressive gains in the next Congress.

THE FISHERIES QUESTION.

The press of Washington welcomes the fisheries award (as another sign of the closeness and reality of Anglo-American friendship).

STOCK EXCHANGE.

London, September 10.

There are continued continental demands for Russian securities.

GERMAN PRESS ON THE SPIES.

Berlin.—The Cologne Gazette, which is apparently inspired by the Government authorities, says that the Lieutenant arrested at Portsmouth acted with youthful inexperience and ignorance of local conditions. Another newspaper describes the arrest as a vicious British revenge for the arrests of two Englishmen at Borkum.

GERMAN ARMY MANŒUVRE.

London, September 12.
Berlin.—The principal feature of the army manœuvres was the use of a false position to conceal real position of troops. The red commander thereby obliged the blue commander to attack prepared ground chosen by his opponent.

Both Englishmen arrested for espionage at Borkum are in prison at Leipzig awaiting trial.

ANGLO-JAPANESE EXHIBITION.

Visitors to the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition yesterday were 424,760.

CHOLERA IN RUSSIA.

St. Petersburg.—154,445 cases of Cholera have been reported in the Russian Empire, and 174,723 deaths.

ENGLISH LABOUR TROUBLES.

Manchester Cotton Spinners at Lancashire are that unless the men consent to arbitration by Monday, there will be a general lockout.

RUSSIAN DIPLOMATIC CHANGES.

St. Petersburg.—M. Ishvolsky may shortly be appointed Ambassador to London. His successor is sure to be M. Sayonoff, thus including any change in the policy of the Entente. Minister Stolypin has been recently summoned to Germany by the Kaiser.

FRENCH ARMY AERONAUTICS.

London, September 13.
During the French Army Manœuvres the corps used aeroplanes for reconnoitering. A Bleriot monoplane flew over the front line of the enemy. It was chased and shot at by marine guns adapted to high angle firing and mounted on a motor car. The aeroplane located the main body of attack.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

The stock exchange did a fair business and Japanese securities.

RUSSIAN AERONAUTICS.

St. Petersburg.—A military balloon which landed near the city was surrounded by soldiers who persisted in smoking. An explosion followed and many were injured.

RUSSIAN DIPLOMATIC CHANGES.

London, September 14.
St. Petersburg.—It is authoritatively reported that the health of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Ichvolsky is being seriously strained and that he may be transferred to one of the great Capitals in the Empire.

ROOSEVELT AND THE "OLD GUARD."

New York, September 15.
New York.—Mr. Roosevelt declares himself gratified with the result of the primary elections. He refuses to accept the Governorship or the Chairmanship of the State Committee, intimating that if the "old guard" attempts to force him into an unpopular peace, he will be equally shrewd in the political game.

TURKEY AND GREECE.

Constantinople.—The public is irritated at the conflict in Constantinople between the Government and the Greek Patriarchate. The Powers have urged Greece to prevent incidents provocative to Turkey.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

Japanese stocks are in fair demand.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

THE BRITISH ASIATIC SQUADRON.

The Minotaur and Monmouth of the British Asiatic Squadron lying at Nagasaki, are reported to be coming to Yokohama via Kobe about the 23rd instant. It has been decided that no special entertainment will be accepted on account of being in mourning for the late King Edward, and because of the disaster to the Bedford.

SPECIAL ENVOY TO CHILEAN CENTENARY.

Santiago: From Mr. K. Inoue, special Envoy to Chile.

On the 12th I was received most ceremoniously by the new Vice-President, and I presented my credentials. Since my arrival here the Chilean Government has shown me the greatest kindness, and the country in its treatment has been irreproachable. In the order of precedence the Envoys of Italy, the United States and Germany, having arrived earlier, go before me. The Reception Committee have attached to my personal staff a Major and a Captain and have provided for me an excellently equipped residence. On the 8th I attended the funeral ceremony of the late Vice-President. All the local newspapers express the greatest satisfaction that Japan has shown her friendship by sending a Special Envoy to the Centenary.

THE CHILEAN CENTENARY.

There will be a reception at the Chilean Legation in Tsukiji from 10 a.m. to noon on the 18th instant, that being the centenary of Chilean Independence.

(RECEIVED BY THE NAVAL DEPARTMENT.)

THE BOY SCOUTS.

One of the greatest educational movements in the world was launched when General Sir Robert Baden-Powell started the organization known as the Boy Scouts. Although only two and a half years old, this work has already spread over the whole English-speaking world.

The organizer succeeded in combining education, both practical and moral, with such an atmosphere of romance that it is no wonder the movement has grown so rapidly. It almost makes a man wish he were a boy again.

An adaptation of this work to Japanese boys could easily be effected, and could not fail to produce splendid results. The principles are simple, and yet its splendid system and discipline render the organization permanent, and the play nationwide instead of sectional. The following article illustrates the manner in which the idea has been taken up in America:

The Boy Scout movement started in England under the direction of General Sir Robert S. S. Baden-Powell. It was successfully launched from the platform of the Young Men's Christian Association at Birkenhead, England, about two and one-half years ago, and was the result of much thought on the part of the hero of the Boer War. Several things had been borne in upon General Baden-Powell with great force, the first being that the ordinary classes of industrial Englishmen were failing to "make good" in the colonies because of lack of industrial training and the ability to do things manually; the other being the fact that forty-six percent of all the boys of England were growing up without any knowledge of useful occupations. With these two facts staring him in the face, and being tremendously interested in the development of boyhood, he decided to start a movement for the training of useful citizens. In starting the Boy Scout idea, General Baden-Powell emphatically stated that his intention was not the making of soldiers, but of citizens. In planning for the work he drew largely from all sources, and there has hardly been a book written on boyhood that has not been forced to contribute something to the movement. General Baden-Powell, in his attempt to develop boyhood along the Scout idea touched a large number of activities suitable to boyhood, such as a knowledge of first aid, bee farming, blacksmithing, carpentry, cooking, electricity, gardening, engineering, first aid to animals, interpreting languages, leather work, music, photography, painting, woodcraft, plumbing, poultry farming, seamanship, signaling, astronomy, surveying, life-saving, tracking, printing, marksmanship, and a host of others. It will be noticed that among these activities there is very little of the military, and that the movement is fundamentally and primarily educational. Everything that can enter into the development of boyhood and the building of character is good Scoutcraft, the aim of the Scouts is to become proficient in use of hand and eye, besides being loyal, patriotic, and obedient to employer, parents, country and God.

In England the movement has stretched to 400,000 boys, and 20,000 of these have been parade at one time in London.

All over this continent the Boy Scout idea is springing into instantaneous favor, and groups of boys, being organized in the larger and smaller cities of United States and Canada. Toronto has become a Scout city, and it is no uncommon sight to see fifty to thirty Scout encampments on its outskirts. Paterson, New Jersey; Springfield, Massachusetts; Utica, New York; Chicago, San Francisco; and a host of other places have seen patrols and troop Scouts spring up spontaneously. Cities such as Cleveland, Detroit, New York, and others, are forming city-wide committees to guide this movement.

WHO DIRECTS THE MOVEMENT?

Headquarters for the movement have been opened at 124 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York City, managing secretary and field secretary have been engaged, and national, state, and local committees are now in process of formation. The idea which is to be followed in this country is a slow but growth, the leaders of the movement being determined to benefit by all the mistakes that have been made by their English brethren. Prominent business men and our leading educators have gotten behind the movement, and a great popular organization needs but little equipment is now sweeping country for the purpose of the recreational education of the boyhood of America. At the present time this committee on organization is directing the movement, this committee being made up of representative men from the various agencies at among the boys of America. Such men as E. Thompson Seton, the author and naturalist; F. Hamner, of the Playground Association of America; George D. Pratt, of Pratt Institute; Luther Halsey Gulick, of the Russell Sage Foundation; Jacob A. Riis, of the Settlement movement; Dan Beard, of the Sons of Daniel Boone; Edgar Robinson, of the Boys' Work Committee of International Young Men's Christian Association; Colin H. Livingstone, of Washington, D.C.; W. D. Boyce, the Chicago publisher, are grappling with the question of national organization as well as giving their attention to the execution of the work in the field. The Scout movement in America, if the directors of the work their way, will not have a mushroom growth, will grow steadily and strongly and surely, and have a directing influence for good on the life of American boy.

The progressive and educational value of the Scouts may be readily understood by a little thought of the scope of the badges of merit, which are achieved by passing certain definite tests in various subjects. Thus, to gain the ambulance badge, he must be able to know the fireman how to drag an insensible man with ropes, how to provide a stretcher, how to sling a life-line, position of the main arteries, how to stop bleeding from vein or artery, whether internal or external, to improvise splints and to bind a fractured limb. He must also know the Schaefer (latest) method of artificial respiration, how to deal with cholera, burning, poison, grit in the eye, sprains and bruises, and the general laws of health, including the dangers of smoking, incontinence, lack of ventilation, cleanliness. Besides the other thirty-four badges of merit and the other requirements, a boy must pass through three stages, or degrees, before he can become a First-class Scout, and so be able to pass the test for the merit badges. To become a Tenderfoot he must pass a test in the following points in taking the oath:

WHAT A BOY MUST DO TO BELONG.

Know the Scout's laws and signs and salute. Know the composition of the national flag and right way to fly it.

Tie four out of the following knots: Reef, hand clove hitch, bowline, middleman's, fisher's, sheepshank.

He then takes the Scout's oath, and is enrolled.

Tenderfoot, and is entitled to wear the buttonhole badge.

Before being awarded the Second-class Scout's badge a Tenderfoot must pass the following tests:

1. Have at least one month's service as a Tenderfoot.

2. Elementary first aid and bandaging.

3. Signaling, elementary knowledge of semaphore and Morse alphabet.

4. Track half a mile in twenty-five minutes; or if in town, describe satisfactorily the contents of one window out of four, observed for one minute.

5. Go a mile in twelve minutes at a Scout's pace.

6. Lay and light a fire, using not more than two sticks.

7. Cook a quarter of a pound of meat and two potatoes without cooking utensils other than the regulation billy.

8. Have at least twenty-five cents in a savings bank.

9. Know the sixteen principal points of the compass.

Before being awarded a First-class Scout's badge a Scout must pass the following tests, in addition to the tests laid down for Second-class Scouts:

1. Swim fifty yards. (This may be omitted where a doctor certifies that bathing is dangerous to the Scout's health, in which case he must run a mile in ten minutes, or perform some equivalent selected by the Scoutmaster.)

2. Must have fifty cents at least in the savings bank.

3. Signaling. Send and receive a message either by semaphore or Morse, sixteen letters per minute.

4. Go on foot, or row a boat, alone to a point ten miles away and return again; or if conveyed by any vehicle or animal, go to a distance of fifteen miles and back, and write a short report on it. It is preferable that he should take two days over it.

5. Describe or show the proper means for saving life in case of two of the following accidents (allotted to the examiners): Fire, drowning, runaway carriage, gas, ice-breaking, or bandage an injured person, or revive apparently drowned person.

6. Cook satisfactorily two out of the following dishes, as may be directed: Porridge, bacon, rabbit's stew; or skin and cook a rabbit, or pluck and cook a bird. Also make a "damper" of half pound of flour, or a "twist" baked on a thick stick.

7. Read a map correctly, and draw an intelligible rough sketch map. Point out a compass direction without the help of a compass.

8. Use an axe for felling or trimming light timber, or, as alternative, produce an article of carpentry or metal work made by himself satisfactorily.

9. Judge distance, size, numbers, and height within twenty-five per cent. error.

10. Bring a Tenderfoot trained by himself in the tests required for a Tenderfoot.

AFTER HE BECOMES A SCOUT.

The guide of the Boy Scout is laid down in the following points of the Scout Law, which are as follows:

1. A Scout's honor is to be trusted. If a Scout tries to break his honor by telling a lie, or by not carrying out an order exactly when trusted on his honor to do so, he may be directed to hand over his scout badge, and never to wear it again. He may be directed to cease to be a Scout.

2. A Scout is loyal to his country, his officers, his parents, and his employers. He must stick to them through thick and thin against any one who is their enemy or who even talks badly of them.

3. A Scout's duty is to be useful and to help others. He must be prepared at any time to save life or to help injured persons. And he must try his best to do a good turn to somebody every day.

4. A Scout is a friend to all, and a brother to every other scout, no matter to what social class they belong.

5. A Scout must never be a snob. A snob is one who looks down upon another because he is poorer, or who is poor and resents another because he is richer. A Scout accepts the other man as he finds him, and makes the best of him.

6. A Scout is courteous. That is, he is polite to all, but especially to women and children, and old people and invalids, cripples, etc. And he must not expect any reward for being helpful or courteous.

7. A Scout is a friend to animals. He should save them as far as possible from pain, and should not kill any animal unnecessarily. Killing an animal for food is allowable.

8. A Scout obeys orders of his parents, patrol leader, or Scoutmaster without question. Even if he does not like an order he must do as soldiers and sailors do, he must carry it out all the same because it is his duty; and after he has done it he can come and state any reasons against it; but he must carry out the order at once. That is discipline.

9. A Scout smiles and whistles under all circumstances. When he gets an order he should obey it cheerfully and readily, not in a slow, hang dog sort of way. Scouts never grumble at hardships, nor whine at each other, nor swear when put out. The punishment for swearing or using bad language is for each offense a mug of cold water to be poured down the offender's sleeve by the other Scouts. It was the punishment invented by the old scout, Captain John Smith, three hundred years ago.

10. A Scout is thrifty; that is, he saves every penny he can and puts it in the bank, so that he may have money to keep himself when out of work, and thus not make himself a burden to others; or that he may have money to give away to others when they need it.

This law of the Scouts is a modern interpretation of the old vow of knightly chivalry which is interpreted so beautifully in the Idylls of the King and the boys' orders of the Knights of King Arthur and the Knights of the Holy Grail, only instead of dealing with a language of a by-gone age, the law is couched in modern, up-to-date phraseology.

The Boy Scout idea is very adaptable to the organized Sunday-school, and is just the thing that is needed for a through-the-week work for pupils and teacher. It operates between the ages of twelve and eighteen, and supplies every impulse and activity of an all-round life, while it leaves to the direct influence of the Sunday-school the formation of the boy's religious life. The Sunday-school class is the normal size of a patrol of Scouts, which consists of seven or more boys, in England seven being the maximum number. Each patrol of seven boys may be manned by an older boy as a patrol leader, while the troop, which consists of three or more patrols, will be led and supervised by a Scoutmaster who is an adult.

The headquarters of the Boy Scouts of America which are located at 124 East 28th Street, are available for any information about the Scout movement. The Secretaries of the Scout movement are ready to give their advice and help to any Sunday-school for the organization of a local movement. Small pamphlets for free distribution have been prepared and will be sent to any address on receipt of a postal card.

Ogasawara Coast-wise line	1,520
Oki Coast-wise line	5,400

A MOTOR accident occurred recently at Wampu in Deli, in which as often occurs in more civilized places, the driver did not stop to assist in rescuing his victim. The China Mail speaks of the occurrence in the following matter-of-course tone:—"Late the other day, at Wampu in Deli, a motor car, travelling at full speed, ran over a tiger on the roadway. It was sighted too late to think of stopping. The occupants of the car drove on without ascertaining the fate of the tiger."

THE BODY OF A WOMAN was found on Tarumi beach at 7 p.m. on Saturday. A letter found on her person showed that she was the wife of one Kato Tokusaburo. Her father had arrived in Kobe from Shimane prefecture, and he desired that she should divorce her husband and return with him to their native village. This she was unwilling to do, as the union was a very happy one. Her father's insistence so grieved and frightened her that she decided to do away with herself. Mrs. Kato is said to have been a very beautiful woman. She was only 25 years old.

WIRELESS telephoning from a moving train was accomplished on July 26 for the first time with complete success on a stretch of railway line between Horley and Three Bridges on the Brighton Railway. Travelling by a fast train, a railway official spoke to an inspector in a signal-box, as clearly and easily as if the train had been stationary and connected by wire with the box. The fact which distinguishes Mr von Kramer's system from any other previously tried in England or America is that the electric impulses travel between the bridge on the carriage and ground wires through an open-air space of 18 in.

THE Toyo Kisen Kaisha will hold a general meeting for the first half year of 1910, towards the end of this month. Mr. Ito Suketada, the Managing-director, is quoted as saying that with the improvement of conditions in the navigation world, the number of passengers has increased in both North and South American lines, as compared with the previous term. The export of nitrates from South America was so large that the results of the Company's business was far better than that of the preceding term. Some of the losses, said Mr. Ito, that the company sustained in the past can therefore be compensated with the net profit for this term. For the South American service three steamers, Hongkong, Buyo and Kiyo, are used. In addition a new steamer to be named Shunyo, a sister ship to the Tenyo and Chiyo, will be constructed by the summer of 1911. As to the rumour that the Hawaiian service will be given up, Mr. Ito said that the Company has had no such intention, the service being important in the future as well as in the present.

THE local authorities responsible for the government of Jocketa, Saxony, recently installed electric light. The majority of the residents retire to rest at an early hour, but there are others, including several manufacturers having villas at Jocketa, who do not always return to their homes very early. Eleven p.m. was the time fixed upon to turn off the current supplying the street lamps, but in order to meet the convenience of those who remain at their clubs until a later hour, slot machines have been fixed to certain lamp posts. The tired wayfarer who now reaches the dark streets of Jocketa after 11 p.m. can place a penny in the slot and half the village becomes lighted. If that does not suffice, he can, by paying another penny, have light all the way home.

THE Tokyo City Assembly held a meeting on Monday afternoon at the City Office to discuss the elevated railway question which has given rise to an uproar among the citizens. There were 35 members present who are opposed to the railway, while 25 other members including those in favour of the construction of the railway, did not attend the meeting. When Mr. Nishizawa, Chairman of the Investigation Committee, gave a report with regard to the course of events up to date, Mr. Nonoyama, a member from Shiba ward, strongly criticized the members of the Committee who had approved the railway construction. Subsequently several other members supported Mr. Nonoyama, and as there were no members present to answer these attacks, the bill to grant a charter to the proposed railway, was unanimously rejected.

EXPECTED BABY TO DIE OF ECZEMA

She was a Mass of Humour All Over
When Three Months Old—Sat with Her Night and Day, Thinking the End Would Come at Any Minute—
Skin Now Clear—Doctor Declares

CURE BY CUTICURA TO BE A MIRACLE

"I use Cuticura Soap steadily for my baby's skin. She had the eczema when she was three months old. She was in an awful mess all over her body. We never thought she would get over it. We sat with her night and day for about a month, expecting every minute to see her die. The doctor gave me an ointment to rub her with but it did her no good. My mother was home from America and she told me to try Cuticura Ointment and to wash her with Cuticura Soap. There was a great difference when I used the first box. It seemed to soothe her and she slept. I used three boxes of Cuticura Ointment and she was quite cured. She has the purest skin and is the fattest baby now! She is a miracle, the doctor declares. I am glad to tell anybody about it. Mrs. John Ewan, 5, Victoria St., Inverurie, Scotland, Sept. 21, 1909."

CLEAR SKINS Through the Use of Cuticura.

Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment afford the purest, sweetest and most economical method known of preserving, purifying and beautifying the skin, scalp, hair and hands of infants, children and adults, of preventing minor eruptions becoming chronic and of soothing and dispelling eczemas, rashes, itchings and chafings. Peace falls on distracted households when Cuticura enters. A single tablet of Cuticura Soap and box of Cuticura Ointment are often sufficient to cure. Consumption Can be Cured

Derk P. Yonkerman, Specialist, whose Discovery of a Cure for Consumption has startled the World.

Marvellous as it may seem after the centuries of failure, a cure for consumption has at last been found. After twenty years of almost ceaseless research and experiment in his laboratory, the now renowned specialist, Derk P. Yonkerman, has discovered a specific which has cured the deadly Consumption even in its far advanced stages. In many cases, though all other remedies tried had failed and changes of climate were unable to check the progress of the disease, this wonderful specific has conclusively proved its power to cure.

Whatever your position in life may be, if you are in consumption, or suffer from asthma, bronchitis, catarrh, or any throat or lung trouble, this cure is within your reach, for it is a home treatment and need not interfere in any way with your daily occupation. Learn for yourself of its healing power,

ABSOLUTELY FREE.

Simply send your name and address to the Derk P. Yonkerman Co., Ltd. (Dept. 21), 6, Bouverie Street, London, E.C., and they will post to you a free book on the treatment by this remarkable remedy.

Don't hesitate or delay if you have any of the symptoms of consumption. If you have chronic catarrh, bronchitis, asthma, pains in your chest, a cold on your lungs, or any throat or lung trouble, write to-day for the free book of instructions, and cure yourself before it is too late.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

It is particularly requested that all letters on business be addressed to the BUSINESS MANAGER, and that literary contributions be addressed to the EDITOR.

Correspondence intended for publication in the "JAPAN MAIL" must be accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication but as a guarantee of good faith.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, SEPT. 24TH, 1910.

DEATHS.

CORREA.—At 7.50 a.m., on the 18th inst., at the General Hospital Yokohama, FRANK C. CORREA, aged 22 years.

DAVID.—On September 18th, 1910, at 46D Bluff, Yokohama, DAVID, the beloved son of Mr. and Mrs. J. C. FLETCHER, aged six months.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

It is reported from Hongkong that the U.S. Asiatic Squadron under the command of Rear-Admiral Hubbard, arrived there on Tuesday.

THE Chinese Naval authorities, says the Fiji, are reported to have decided to construct, on completion of the naval budget, seven battleships, three armoured cruisers, and fourteen destroyers.

A SAPPORO telegram says that rumblings are again heard at Uzu-dake. An eruption occurred on Saturday, and ashes fell on Nishimura near Muroran, some 20 miles distant from the volcano.

THE Railway Board has provided new second-class sleeping cars for the various railway lines. Tickets can be obtained at Shimbashi, Hiranuma, Yokohama, Kozu, Yamakita, Numazu, Shizuoka, Hamamatsu, Toyohashi, Nagoya, Gifu, Ozaki, and Maibara Stations, and from agents in Tokyo, Nagoya, and Yokohama.

It is reported from Seoul that Yi Chai-myong's demand for revision was rejected on the 16th instant in the Supreme Court. The would-be assassin's execution will take place in a few days.

THE remains of Viscount Inouye who passed away in London, arrived at Kobe yesterday, and will be brought to Tokyo this afternoon. The funeral will take place at the Tokaiji Temple, Shinagawa, on the 25th instant.

It is reported that the Chinese Naval Department will send naval cadets next year to England, France, Germany, the United States, and Japan. The authorities of every province have been ordered to send a list of candidates.

EXCEPT in one or two unusual years the highest average of immigration to the United States was never greater than 1.4 per cent. of its total population. Canada is receiving immigrants year after year at a rate of 4 per cent. of its total population, or where the United States had to assimilate one, Canada has to assimilate 36.

A HANKOW despatch says that Mr. Yuan Shih-kai is desirous of again holding the military power of China and that he would reject any post in the Central Government, unless it be one likely to gratify this ambition. It may be added that Mr. Yuan is better remembered among certain classes of the Japanese as a military man than as a statesman.

THE Railway Board, it is said, has decided to make 50 per cent. reduction on fares for emigrants to Formosa, who have been chosen by the Formosan Government, from Kyushu, Chugoku, Shikoku, and Hokuyetsu provinces. They are to travel in third-class carriages and the terminal stations should be either Kobe, Ujina, Moji, or Nagasaki.

INVESTIGATIONS with regard to the organic regulations of the new regime in Chosen, are reported to have been concluded on Tuesday. Final decision on the subject will be passed at the ministerial conference to be held to-day, after which the draft is to be submitted to the Throne. It will, therefore, not be brought before the Privy Council before the 26th instant.

ACCORDING to officers of the Oura Maru, which ship returned to Nagasaki on the 15th instant from Quelpart Island, the Bedford is still in the same position as at the time of the disaster. The deck can be seen at ebb tide. Pumping water out of the engine room at one time gave a little hope that she might be saved but owing to the high waves, operations are very difficult.

THE Japanese sealer Koyei Maru which had been captured by the U. S. Government, together with the Tokai Maru and Tora Maru, is reported to have been released in the Alaska Local Court. All the crew were declared not guilty, except the Captain, an American, who was found guilty. The vessel has left Alaska and is shortly expected at Ishinomaki, Rikuzen province.

MESSRS. YARROW & Co., of Glasgow, have at present in hand two destroyers for the British Government of a special type. They are building in Holland two destroyers 230 feet long by 21 feet 6 inches beam, for the Dutch Government. They also have in hand one destroyer for the Portuguese Government, the hull of which is being built in Lisbon and the machinery and boilers Messrs. Yarrow's Works at Glasgow. They are also building two fast Gunboats, propelled by internal combustion engines, for the Governor General of Bagdad.

A SEOUL telegram says that Mr. Ko, Korean Envoy to attend the funeral of the late Viscount Sone, left there on the 15th inst. for Tokyo. Mr. Cho, ex-Minister of Agriculture, will also attend the obsequies as representative of the ex-Cabinet members.

IN order to personally command the Grand military manoeuvres to be held in Okayama prefecture this autumn, His Majesty, the Emperor will leave Tokyo on the 11th of November. Breaking his journey both at Shizuoka and Kyoto, His Majesty will arrive at the scene of the operations on the 14th. It is reported that an automobile troop, will for the first time, join the commissariat corps in manoeuvres.

MR. SHIMIZU ICHITARO, M. P. who wrote a long letter during July last to Mr. Roosevelt, ex-President of the United States, expressing his opinion with regard to emigration and political questions, has received an answer from the ex President through the Foreign Office. It is stated in the answer that Mr. Roosevelt is always glad to hear such interesting opinions from Japan, and that he expresses hearty friendship towards the Japanese people.

THE Japanese schooner Kano Maru is reported to have been forcibly detained by a Russian gunboat near the Commandore (?) Islands on a charge of poaching. Several firearms and implements for sealing have been seized and sent to Petropavloosk. The captain and crew, 15 in number, were all sent under guard to Vladivostok, where they were immediately delivered to the Japanese Consulate-General. The captain is said to have been imprisoned.

A KYOTO telephone message says that on the 16th instant the Imperial Messenger Count Yamashina and suite who were to have attended the Shinto ceremony at Otokoyama Hachiman Shrine in Fushimi, were taken in jinrikisha a short distance from the Shrine. A policeman riding on a bicycle came along the road at full speed and dashed into the carriage of one of the missionaries. Mr. Coikusa, the occupant, was thrown to the ground senseless. The religious function was suspended.

THE Chinese Government, says the Yorozu, has decided to establish a horticulture office at Mukden, which establishment is to deal with the felling of trees in the Three Eastern Provinces, and the selling of lumber which is made into rafts. It is suspected that the real intention of the Peking Government is to make the new office compete with the Japanese Yalu Lumber Company. The Japanese Government is said to have instructed the Consul-General at Mukden to lodge a protest with the Viceroy of Manchuria against the organization of the new office.

RECENT investigations made by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce shows that the number of silkworm egg-cards hatched for 1909 throughout Japan totalled 2,598,331, and the production of cocoons and their value were as follows:—

	Koku.	Yen.
Cocoons	2,928,437	120,297,677
Double cocoons	383,973	6,375,943
Empty do	57,416	928,587
Waste do	260,041	3,381,970
Total	3,629,867	130,984,177

CHOSEN.

Representatives of the Missionary bodies in Korea, as appointed at the recently held meeting, waited upon the Resident-General on the 14th instant and exchanged views with regard to the situation. The Rev. Mr. Gale seems to have acted as spokesman, and is said to have stated that the Korean converts borne upon the rolls of the missions represented were satisfied with the state of affairs and were peacefully disposed. The Resident-General expressed satisfaction with this report and attributed the orderly state of affairs in a large degree to the efforts of the missionaries. His Excellency then passed on to speak of the difference between the aims of religious propaganda and official administration. The two things had their own special spheres, and though they might be coöperative to a large extent, it was necessary that they should not be confounded. As to the policy which the Resident-General intended to pursue in Chosen, the Viscount explained that the good features of Korean civilization would be preserved as far as possible, and replaced by more modern methods only when necessary. Progress to be lasting must be gradual. However anxious people might be to hasten it, anything like precipitancy invariably provoked reaction.

News comes from Chemulpo that something like a mania to get rid of their top-knots and thus fall into line with the leaders of the new regime, has seized the people. One consequence of this is that the well known Korean head-gear is becoming a superfluity, and as to don it signifies to receive recognition as an adult, a great many persons are said to be perturbed lest the period of their juvenility should be inconveniently prolonged by the disappearance of the top-knot. One way out of this difficulty is to get married. Any one who passes through nuptial portals is recognized as an adult, and this exit from the dilemma is being largely resorted to, so that quite a fever for marriage prevails at Chemulpo.

The Asahi Shimbun's Seoul correspondent alleges that the problems discussed at the recently held conclave of missionaries at Kaison, which is a place between Seoul and Pyongyang, were of a decidedly difficult character. The missionaries had to determine whether they would devote their attention in future to moral education or to material, or to both in equal degrees; whether they would endeavour to extend the system of charity hospitals; whether they would turn their hands to elementary education; whether they would endeavour to foster a pro-Japanese feeling among their converts, and so forth. We are not told anything about the decisions arrived at, but we may be sure from our knowledge of the missionaries that they chose the course wisest in the circumstances. It is naturally impossible for religious propagandists to stand perfectly neutral in Chosen to-day. They cannot prevent their converts from asking questions, and to refuse all reply would be almost as significant as to answer explicitly. The missionaries are no doubt feeling this difficulty and their conferences are prompted by a desire to find the best road out of the dilemma.

The Koreans in Hawaii, acting under the leadership of Mr. Li Tok, are said to have addressed to the American Government a petition urging that the annexation of Korea was effected by force, and that to insure the happiness and prosperity of the Korean nation it is indispensable to restore the independence of the Peninsula. Annexed to the petition is a representation charging Japan with seven crimes which are not explicitly stated by the telegram, but which are said to be, one and all, baseless. Mr. Li Tok has caused this document to be printed and circulated widely in Seoul and its neighbourhood.

The number of political parties in Korea which dissolved their organization by the 15th inst., in compliance with the Resident-General's instructions, was nine, and the number of their affiliated members varied from 1,000 to 20. We gather that it is not their intention to abolish their organizations entirely. They are obliged to dissolve and abandon their character of political associations, but they intend to renew their existence as educational and literary societies. It does not occur to outsiders that men who joined hands originally for political purposes can be expected to have any special attitude for educational efforts or literary studies. The police will therefore find it necessary to watch the procedure of these resuscitated parties.

The expected trouble has occurred in the ranks of the Il Ching-hoi with reference to the manner of disposing of the party's funds on dissolution. The committee are in favour of turning over the money to a society for the promotion of agriculture, but the members object to such a device, their contention being that an agricultural society would be a merely nominal affair, and would not receive any genuine part of the fund. This dispute has become so keen as to involve the arrest of 20 members of the Il Ching-hoi's council.

Talk is again heard of a probable visit by the two ex-Emperors of Korea to Tokyo. It seems to be thought, however, that the annexation question has not yet become sufficiently familiar to all classes in the Peninsula to warrant the above procedure. A little delay will therefore be expedient and the idea is that the visit of the two Princes will be postponed until after Viscount Terauchi's coming to Japan in October. This would mean that the Princes Yi will not attend the Japanese Court until next spring.

Meanwhile we note that Prince Yi (junior) has contributed a sum of 5,000 yen towards the expenses of Viscount Sone's funeral.

We have commented more than once lately on the apparent quiescence of the insurgents in Korea. But that no conclusive inferences were to be drawn from that fact is shown by the latest intelligence. From three places simultaneously, namely, Kyongkwi-do, northern Hamyong-do and the neighbourhood of Pyongyang, comes intelligence of outbreaks of insurgents, numbering respectively fifty, nine and five. If these rioters had any political design, they concealed it effectually, for they confined themselves wholly to assassinating and robbing their own countrymen.

Korea furnishes a conspicuous example of the degraded condition to which a great creed has been reduced by the ignorance and carelessness of its disciples. We have never seen any satisfactory explanation of the causes responsible for the dishonoured state of Buddhism in Korea. Yet dishonoured it certainly is, and conspicuously so. Not even the ardent example of Christian activity and untiring propagandism has been able to strike a spark of life out of the Buddhist mummy in Korea. The priests are universally despised, and the faith they profess shares the contempt. This condition becomes all the more surprising when we remember that from Korea Buddhism came to Japan, and that in early mediæval days Japanese Buddhists sat at the feet of their Korean confreres. Now, at last, there seems to be an instinct of revival in the Peninsula. Telegrams from Seoul say that representatives of 29 temples held a meeting which lasted five days, for the purpose of discussing some method of resuscitating the moribund faith. The details of the discussion are not telegraphed, but the decision arrived at was that a college should be formed for educating preachers and propagandists. It is to be hoped that this is the beginning of a genuinely earnest movement, and that Korean Buddhism will now emerge from the slough of apathy and ignorance in which it has lain prostrate for so many years.

It appears that the land offered to renters at Chinghai Bay is much more extensive than was originally supposed. It covers an area about 2,000 acres, and extends from the projected offices of the Port Admiralty to the railway station at Masan. The land lies on either side of a road 40 yards in width, and it is offered at very cheap rates, namely, $2\frac{1}{2}$ sen per tsubo annually for the 1st class; 2 sen for the 2nd class and $1\frac{1}{2}$ sen for the 3rd class. Many speculators are taking up the land with the idea of holding it for a rise. In order to check this abuse, orders have been issued that on all rented land buildings must be erected within a certain time. Chinghai promises to be one of the greatest naval ports in the world. Every one remembers the glowing terms in which Prince Ito spoke of the place when he visited Masan at the time of the Imperial progress.

It is doubtless fresh in public recollection that Mr. Cho, a nephew of the senior ex-Emperor, was arrested some time ago on a charge of forging the Imperial seal in connexion with the transfer of the Electric Railway to a Japanese company. It will also be remembered that further interest was added to the event by the discovery of a box containing secret documents which had been abstracted from the Palace archives and placed in the care of a certain temple. When the amnesty was proclaimed Mr. Cho obtained his release, but a few days ago news arrived that he had been rearrested together with his younger brother. The crime laid to his charge on this second occasion relates to the purchase of land for the purposes of the French Legation, but the exact particulars are not given.

The operation of weeding out superfluous officials from the Korean administration cannot be much longer deferred. We may assume that this unwelcome task has been postponed until the eleventh hour, but it has to come sooner or later. Under Prince Ito's direction an extensive clearing out of unneeded officials and an increase of salaries in the case of those whose services were retained took place about three years ago. In the Court, especially, this reform assumed large dimensions. Had not that measure been adopted the situation at present would be much less manageable, but, even as it is, scores of officials will have to be placed on the seconded list. Already the process is said to have commenced in the Department of Commerce and Industry, where the staff is to be reduced by two-thirds. It is inevitable that this step should produce discontent, but doubtless the dismissed officials will be treated with all possible consideration. One comment which may be justly made is that officials who seem superfluous in Japanese eyes must be veritably redundant, for it still stands to the discredit of Japanese organizers that they over-man all their offices.

We read in Tokyo journals that the expenses incurred by the Residency-General down to the close of the present year will be met by a draft upon the reserves, and will be submitted to the Diet for post-facto approval. On the other hand, the expenses incurred from the 1st of January next to the 31st of March will be included in the supplementary budget. The account of these various expenses is awaited with much impatience. The Japanese Government has to choose between two evils. It has either to practise costly generosity or to run the risk of exciting still more costly discontent. The Japanese people recognize this fully enough, but are nevertheless anxious to learn how deeply they must put their hands into their pockets.

Several Korean subjects are said to have embraced Russian nationality by becoming Christians. Of course the one act does not necessarily involve the other, but the sequence in this case seems to be baptism first and registration afterwards. Telegrams received in Tokyo say that 60 Koreans recently took these steps at Chita, and a still larger number, which is put at 200, have taken a similar course at Nicholefsk. The movement is expected to extend to various places in Siberia. It is strange how wedded the Koreans are to the notion that Christianity and politics are inseparable. Yet after all there is some warrant for this supposition in the case of the Greek Church.

The Mainichi Dempo publishes a telegram from Seoul which refers to the report sent by an official who was commissioned to make a tour of inspection throughout Cholla-do and southern Chungchong-do. He reports that ostensibly everything is perfectly quiet. Even the Yangpan and the literati maintain an attitude of calm and acquiescence. But the Commissioner guards himself by saying that it would not be safe to construe this external attitude as a trustworthy evidence of genuine feeling. Nevertheless the fact remains that Japanese subjects can travel singly, and that Japanese letter-carriers can discharge their duties in perfect safety throughout these once perturbed districts.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN TRADE.

The returns for the second ten days of September are:—

	Yen.
Exports	12,850,000
Imports	13,032,000
Excess of Imports.....	217,000

The figures for the period January 1st to September 20th are:—

	Yen.	Compared with last year.
Exports	309,826,000	+34,290,000
Imports	335,573,000	+35,658,000
Excess of Imports.....	25,747,000

SYMPTOMS OF UNREST.

It would have been fatuous to expect, and probably no one did expect, that the annexation of Korea would pass off quite quietly. We may assume indeed that all fear of a national uprising is now past. The nation obviously has no leaders competent to excite and direct a crusade in the cause of independence. Whether that fortunate lack is due to adroit management on the part of the Japanese or to unpatriotic apathy on the part of the Koreans we cannot pretend to judge, but the fact is not to be questioned. On the other hand, that there will be occasional emeutes, whether fomented in selfish interests or prompted by genuine love of freedom, may be taken for granted. Thus we read in the Asahi's telegrams that the notorious agitator, Mr. Kim, has again taken the field. This is the gentleman who has seized every occasion of a treaty or a convention to fulminate against the Japanese and to stir up commotion. He has now recommenced to circulate over his own name incendiary notices, and the police are on his track. A similar course has been adopted by the leader of the insurgents in Kyongkwido. This, so far as we know, is the first instance of the insurgents attempting to promote an anti-annexation movement.

Of course the Koreans in foreign countries continue to agitate. A certain Mr. Yung of San Francisco, who represents himself as the mouthpiece of 60,000 of his countrymen living abroad, has compiled a vehemently worded circular which some of his friends are disseminating in Seoul.

Allusion may be here made to a question formulated by a recent writer who finds it strange that the Korean students educated in Japan should invariably be opposed to Japanese domination of Korea. To us the explanation seems very simple. It is that Koreans living in Japan inhale, for the first time, the breath of genuinely earnest patriotism. They learn the general principle that every man should be ready to fight and die in the cause of his country's independence and they apply that principle without discrimination.

MR. TOKUTOMI IN KOREA.

The Editor-in-Chief of the Kokumin Shimbun is paying a visit to Korea, and is using the exceptional facilities furnished by his prestige and his position to collect valuable information. His last procedure has been to obtain materials for diagnosing the state of missionary feeling in the Peninsula towards the question of annexation. As might have been expected the missionaries are not very emphatic in their expression of views. We gather from Mr. Tokutomi's interesting telegram that only a few of the missionaries venture to express themselves unequivocally as approving the new regime. The majority are unwilling to commit themselves to any statement which could be construed as encroaching upon the domain of politics, their argument being that the confidence of the rising generation of Koreans would necessarily be alienated from teachers who plainly endorsed the loss of Korean independence. The truth is that the missionaries are placed in a decidedly embarrassing situation and that the more perfect the neutrality they assume the better for all parties.

AN UNQUIET MEETING.

There has been a demonstration of an emphatically disquieting nature in Kiliu. It took the form of a meeting of members of the Local Assembly and representatives of all classes of society. Eight hundred persons are said to have attended, and they passed resolutions emphatically condemning the Russo-Japanese Convention and the annexation of Korea. They construed these incidents as most menacing to China's integrity, and they placed on record a conviction that a secret treaty exists between Russia and Japan, making over Mongolia to the former Power and Manchuria to the latter. It was resolved that steps must at once be taken to avert these dangers, and that the first necessity of the situation is to create a strong military force, to which end the people should be encouraged to save as much money as possible and to give it without stint for the sake of an army and a navy. A resolution was further passed declaring that no Japanese subjects should be taken into Chinese employ, and that a general boycott of Japanese goods should be organized.

It is distinctly unfortunate that the Chinese should publicly commit themselves to such a course as the above. The blame will lie at their doors if the relations between their country and Japan become dangerously strained. One Power cannot openly discriminate against another without provoking the latter's enmity. We cannot deny that from a Chinese point of view the Russo-Japanese menace may present itself under a very formidable aspect. But the way to deal with the danger is, not to precipitate it by displays of petty rancour, but to prepare quietly and resolutely for the evil day so that it may be postponed until China has strength to control the situation.

A DISGRACEFUL AFFAIR.

The Niroku Shimpō, not a very trustworthy authority, publishes a long and very circumstantial account of a most cruel and shameless act of desertion on the part of a Japanese nobleman, Baron Gō. It appears that while studying in Germany the Baron contracted a marriage with a German lady, her parents being consenting parties. The married couple subsequently came to Japan and lived for some time in the Imperial Hotel as man and wife. Subsequently one of the lady's parents being taken dangerously ill, it became necessary for her to pay a short visit to Germany, and during her absence her husband married a daughter of Mr. Hatano Shōgorō of the Mitsui Firm. When Baroness Gō returned to Japan her husband attempted to deceive her by taking rooms for her in the Imperial Hotel, but the true facts ultimately became known to her, and she twice attempted to make away with herself, once by jumping into a river and once with a pistol. Every possible effort in her behalf seems to have been made by that man of infinite kindness, Count Arco Valley, but it would seem that the first marriage had not been registered in Japan, and was therefore without validity in the eyes of the law. Finally a number of prominent Japanese residents of Tokyo took up the unfortunate lady's cause, and subscribed a sum of 10,000 yen, with which a school has been built for her in Tokyo. But what are we to say of those that connive at such an act.

THE KOREAN ADMINISTRATION.

There appears to be a good deal of confusion in the administration of Korean affairs. Things have been jolted out of their old grooves and have not yet fully entered their new. This is more or less inevitable, and we are not at all surprised to learn that people are impatiently waiting for the practical completion of the new system. It appears to be fully recognized that much patience has to be exercised in this transitional period but none the less the resulting inconvenience is not inconsiderable. It is one thing to pull down an old edifice, but to build another in its place is a very different exploit. We can well imagine that all the ability of the Resident-General and his assistants is needed for this purpose.

It is rumoured in Tokyo that the draft of the new Korean administration has led to considerable debate by the Privy Council in Tokyo. Many of the features proposed in Seoul did not meet with the entire approval of the Councillors, and they were disposed to make more or less sweeping changes, but this course was prevented by decisive telegrams from the Residency-General. Presumably the new system will be promulgated in a few days, but in the meanwhile the Authorities are successfully preserving complete secrecy.

It appears to be a fact that considerable difficulty is being encountered in finding persons competent to assume the somewhat onerous functions of Provincial Governors in Korea. Hitherto the principal provincial posts have been occupied by Overseers, who are Koreans, and the posts of next importance have been filled by Japanese subjects as Chief Secretaries. In the new machinery of local administration it was expected that this order would be reversed, the Overseers becoming Japanese and the Chief Secretaries, Koreans. But owing to the difficulty of finding Japanese officials who are at once qualified and willing to become Overseers, there is a rumour that the existing arrangement will be continued for the present. We give this report for what it may be worth. It would augur ill for Japanese administrative success if occupants of such important local positions were not forthcoming. This dilemma is not new, however. There have been several complaints in the past that Japanese officials of the better class were not willing to exchange service at home for service in Korea. After all the Japanese are not singular in this respect. Western countries also have been obliged to tempt their subjects or citizens by largely increased rates of emolument for colonial service. Still the reluctance of the Japanese is very marked, for a Japanese official in Korea receives, when everything is taken into account, nearly the double of the income accruing to him at home.

MALCONTENT'S.

The Jiji Shimpō enumerates some cases of salient dissatisfaction among the Koreans. The bulk of the nation seem to be fairly well reconciled to the situation, but some units of the nation are bitterly opposed to annexation. Thus at Yong-ju a certain Mr. Kim, Secretary of the local law court, has been publicly lecturing in the sense that whereas Japan took her civilization from Korea, the former has now swallowed up the latter, which is an intolerable state of affairs, and cannot possibly have any permanency. Another agitator is referred to by our Tokyo contemporary. His name is not given but he is described as one of the missionaries who took part in the recent conference at Kaison. This gentleman is quoted as saying that Korea's humiliation had fallen upon her in consequence of her lack of the faculty of combination, and that it behoved her now to develop that quality with the help of Providence. A third case is that of Mr. Yi, local head-man at Yong-chong. He is said to have chosen the public highway for a platform, and to have vociferously declared that the Governments of the United States and of China would certainly take steps to restore Korean independence.

We have no original information as to the accuracy of these stories, but the first and the third appear credible enough. That about the missionary at Kaison, however, requires confirmation.

A telegram to the same journal from Seoul alleges that the police have obtained information to the effect that the local officials of three districts in South Chholla-do, namely, Kwamju, Nampin and Naju, have formed a league for the purpose of agitating against annexation and have inveigled several Korean constables to join them. The origin of this affair is said to be that certain taxation officials at Kwamju were dismissed, and a rumour got into circulation that this preluded dismissal of all Korean officials.

MR. TANG SHAO-YI.

His Excellency Mr. Jui, Viceroy of Hukwang, has memorialized the throne condemning the appointment of Mr. Tang Shao-yi to the be Minister of Communications. The memorialist declares that Mr. Tang is only a translator and has no knowledge of politics or statecraft. His record in connexion with foreign affairs is a chapter of failures, and if now the duty of dealing with the railway loan question be entrusted to him, his method of settling it will inevitably invite public condemnation. This very outspoken memorial is said to have greatly influenced the Prince Regent. It will doubtless increase the reluctance hitherto shown by Mr. Tang to undertake the duties of his new post. Indirectly Viceroy Jui may be said to condemn Yuan Shih-kai, for Tang Shao-yi has always been regarded as a protégé of the latter.

It may be mentioned here that the latest news about Yuan's restoration to power is that strong opposition is offered by Mr. Na Tung and his clique in the Government. Moreover, rumour says that when the Prince Regent recently proposed to reinstate Mr. Tuan Fang in power, the Empress Dowager strongly opposed the idea. It will be remembered that Tuan was Viceroy of the metropolitan province at the time of the Imperial Obsequies, and that his conduct in connexion with the procession caused some umbrage to the Empress Dowager. Her Majesty seems to retain a vivid recollection of that incident. The point to be noted is that ex-Viceroy Tuan has always been counted among the partisans of Yuan Shih-kai, and therefore the Empress Dowager's attitude towards the former is likely to comprise the latter also.

CHIENTAO.

It appears that the world had only a very imperfect conception of the sacrifice made by Korea when she acknowledged China's sovereignty in Chientao. Some interesting facts illustrating this subject were adduced by Mr. Consul-General Nagataki at a meeting of the East Asian Common Script Society on the 19th instant. He explained that although Chientao is now a part of Chinese dominions, it is practically peopled by Koreans, for, whereas there are fully 180,000 Korean settlers, the number of Chinese does not exceed 25,000. Moreover many Koreans, while they reside on the Korean side of the Tumen, have their farms on the Chinese side, and cross the river to and fro every day. This land is very rich, in which respect it offers a marked contrast to the soil in north-western Korea. The Koreans grow chiefly millet and beans (large and small) while the crops mainly cultivated by the Chinese are sorghum, barley, oats and hemp. Moreover, at a place called Laoyeh, there are splendid forests which invite exploitation, and whereas the Korean settlers possess 120,000 oxen the Chinese have only 30,000. The great defect is want of means of communication. Mr. Nagasaki urges that no time should be lost in building the Kilin-Hoiryong Railway, and thus linking up Chyongjin with Chientao. If that were done, a great part of the agricultural produce would find its way to Chyongjin en route for Kobe.

At the same meeting Mr. Ishikawa, a railway expert, spoke strongly in favour of constructing the Chyongjin-Hoiryong Railway along a different route, namely, carrying it in the first place to Changsong, which is 27 miles up the river from Hoiryong. This would bring the line within measurable distance of the principal Chinese frontier town of Hunchun, and would also obviate many engineering difficulties.

PRINCE YI.

The latest item of interest from Seoul is that the Authorities are considering the organization of the Household of the junior ex-Emperor, now Prince Yi. The Prince is distinctly a rich man. An income of 1½ million yen annually is secured to him, and in spite of the calls that his relatives will certainly make upon his purse, a substantial sum will remain available for the maintenance of his household and for his own private expenditure. It appears to be felt that in these circumstances there is a danger of unsightly extravagance, and it is probable that the Prince's ménage will be organized so as to avert any such imprudence. Certainly a fine example is set by the Japanese Court. To say nothing of the Emperor himself, who is one of the most economical potentates that ever lived and at the same time one of the most generous, the Japanese Princes from the Prince Imperial downwards, do not offer a single instance of what could be called extravagance. Indeed the Prince Imperial seems to vie with his father in the matter of economy. His manner of life is of course largely beyond the ken of ordinary observers in normal times, but when he goes for trips in the heat of summer, he may be seen walking the roads like any everyday pedestrian, and the only luxuries in which he seems to indulge are a camera and a particularly beautiful Scotch terrier.

COMPETITION BETWEEN TOKYO GAS COMPANIES.

The competition between the Tokyo Gas Company and the Chiyoda Gas Company is entering an acute phase. If we look back upon the stages of this contest we find that the Chiyoda opened the ball in a somewhat irregular manner, since it canvassed for orders and took them before its organization as a Company has been actually effected. This was followed by the purchase of the Fukagawa Coke factory on the part of the Tokyo Gas Company. Then ensued the publication of a series of advertisements setting forth the thorough competence of the Tokyo Gas Company to supply the city in the best and the cheapest manner, and dwelling upon the untrustworthiness of the Chiyoda Company. The next step was that the Tokyo Company reduced its rates uniformly by 20-per-cent., and now we read that its Directors have succeeded in forming a league of all the sellers of gas appliances in Tokyo, so that the Chiyoda Company will be unable to effect any installations. The language of the above advertisements seem to have caused much umbrage to the Chiyoda Directors, and they are said to be contemplating a suit for libel.

The Directors of the Chiyoda Gas Company have taken a measure which may be regarded as preliminary to opening legal proceedings. In our last issue we stated that the Tokyo Gas Company had published advertisements extolling its own capacity to supply the 2 million inhabitants of the metropolis, and casting doubts on the trustworthiness of the Chiyoda Company. It now appears that these advertisements did not emanate direct from the Tokyo Gas Company, but were inserted by an association calling itself the Gas Kigu Hambai Kumiai (Guild for the sale of Gas Fittings). The Directors of the Chiyoda Company have now formally addressed to the above Guild an inquiry as to whether it acknowledges its responsibility for the advertisement, which is described in the query as libellous and injurious. The answer of the Guild may take some time to formulate, but, on the other hand, the advertizers may court the publicity of a law suit. After all this kind of advertisement is common enough, especially in the case of newspapers. One need not go very far in Japan to find English local journals which daily advertise themselves as the leading organs of their class with the largest subscription lists and the best advertising facilities.

The Gas Fittings Guild, in reply to the inquiry addressed to it by the Directors of the Chiyoda Gas Company, has accepted full responsibility for the advertisement complained of, but claims that the intention of the advertisement was simply to promote the interests of the Guild, and not in any sense to do an inquiry to the Chiyoda Company. Having received this answer, the Directors of the latter Company will now consult their shareholders as to the desirability of taking legal proceedings. The Directors declare themselves reluctant to appeal to the law, but they have received assurance from Mr. Hatoyama (son of the well known Dr. Hatoyama) and Prof. Uzawa that the advertisement is actionable.

The Directors of the Tokyo Gas Company, on their side, explain that they have acted in strict accordance with business principles. Being approached by the Gas Fittings Guild to make a contract, they did so in accordance with their own interests, largely because the agents of the Fittings Guild would then act as promoters for the Tokyo Gas Company. In other words, the agents of the Guild would serve as touts and the Company would effect a corresponding economy. Having made this arrangement, the Guild proceeded to draw up an advertisement which was submitted to the inspection of the Gas Company. It is true that the terms of the advertisement are very strong but the Directors of the Company disclaim any responsibility. There is a good deal of talk as to the ultimate responsibility for the advertisement, but evidently no definite opinion can yet be formed on this topic. At all events as the case will be the first libel trial under the new Criminal Code very great interest attaches to it.

The Directors of the Chiyoda Company are not disposed to treat with any undue leniency the injurious advertisement published by the Gas Fittings Guild. They have formally notified the latter association that since it has admitted responsibility for the advertisement, it must recognize the injurious character of the statements contained therein. Therefore the Directors call upon the Guild to publish in all the papers where the advertisement appeared an acknowledgment of error and an apology dictated by the Guild. It is not thought probable that the Company will accede to this demand: it will prefer to go into the Courts of Law.

It will probably be remembered that in our last issue we quoted the Fiji Shimpō as saying that the objectionable advertisement had been read before publication by Mr. Fujisaki, Managing Director of the Tokyo Gas Company. Mr. Fujisaki now denies this most emphatically and the Fiji Shimpō publishes the denial.

Alluding to this affair, the Kokumin Shimbun says that practices of a distinctly objectionable character are resorted to innocently by business competitors in Japan, and that there is urgent need of some law on the subject such as that existing in Germany. In fact our contemporary alleges that such a law is actually being drafted by the officials concerned.

THE EXHIBITION AT MAYEBASHI.

On the 17th instant the ceremony of opening the Mayebashi Kyōshin-kai took place in the presence of over 1,000 persons and is said to have been very successful. This enterprise had been interrupted by the inundations, and its final abandonment had been anticipated at one time. But happily all difficulties were overcome. The Governor of the prefecture, Mr. Kamiyama, explained that the exhibits represented the work of fourteen prefectures, which was five more than the number participating at the previous Exhibition. The exhibits were divided into 74 sections, and there were altogether 85,000 objects exhibited. Baron Oura, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce then made an interesting speech. He congratulated the people on the courage they had shown in rising superior to the disaster of the floods, and although he knew well that the sore wounds then inflicted were not yet healed, it was reassuring to see that they had not produced any crippling effect. The Minister then passed on to speak of a very vital topic. He said that whereas all the articles exhibited were of the highest quality in their respective classes, it was unfortunately a fact that the manufacturers of these articles seem to regard them as spectacular exhibits rather than as practical specimens. Thus, if on the strength of these exhibits, a merchant placed an order, he could not count on obtaining goods of corresponding quality. Such a state of affairs was most injurious to Japanese business reputation, and produced an exceedingly bad effect on the country's foreign trade.

It is curious to find men like Baron Oura echoing at this eleventh hour a criticism which has been uttered from time to time by foreign on-lookers ever since 1891. We ourselves, commenting on the Tokyo Exhibition of that year, emphasized the inconvenient fact that a majority of the exhibitors declined to accept orders for replicas of the exhibits at the prices marked on them. When pressed for a reason, they admitted that these exhibits had been prepared for purposes of display rather than of business, and that to reproduce the articles at Exhibition figures would entail a loss to the manufacturer. A few were willing enough to take orders, but either neglected them altogether subsequently or fulfilled them in an inferior manner. The comment we made at the time was that the uses of an exhibition had not been yet fully appreciated by the Japanese. It would seem, however, from Baron Oura's criticism that they have not even yet been fully appreciated.

CHRISTIANITY IN KOREA.

There are various rumours about the attitude of Christian converts in Korea since annexation. One account says that their number has suddenly decreased by no less than 200,000 persons out of 700,000. A partial explanation of this is offered by pointing out that in Korea the custom is for all the members of a household to follow the lead of the head in such a matter, and therefore the total of true believers who have withdrawn from the Church is much smaller than the above figures indicate. Another account says that it is a great exaggeration to speak of 700,000 Christian converts in Korea. The true number does not exceed 260,000, and, therefore, the alleged defections of 200,000 must be divided by three at least in order to arrive at a trustworthy estimate. Yet another telegram represents the missionaries as wisely welcoming the disappearance from their ranks of all political elements.

In the Seoul Press of the 15th instant we find the following brief summary of an interview between Viscount Terauchi and a committee of missionaries who visited the Resident General on the morning of the 14th instant:—

They were glad to say that the Korean Christians under the superintendence of the missionaries were perfectly peaceful and entirely reconciled to the new order of things just inaugurated in this peninsula. In reply the Resident General expressed his deep appreciation of the good work done by the missionaries, stating that he believed the peaceful attitude taken by Korean Christians was due largely to the guidance of the missionaries. Some conversation was subsequently carried on between the visitors and host concerning the administration of the country.

CHINA.

At present one of the questions earnestly discussed in Peking is the colonization of Northern Manchuria by drafts of people from the congested and famine-stricken provinces of Hupeh and Hunan. Already it is understood that there has been a considerable movement of that nature, and the Viceroy of Manchuria, who is now in the capital, is said to be an ardent supporter of the project, his view being that to strengthen the Chinese hold upon Manchuria and to avert the menace of Russian and Japanese aggression the best way is to create a numerous Chinese population in the Three Provinces. It appears, however, that his Excellency's opinions on this subject are not unopposed in Peking. We gather that theoretically his arguments are endorsed, but the difficulty is that funds cannot be conveniently found. To carry destitute people from a region where even in the midst of cultivation they cannot find means of subsistence and to plant them down in a region where reclamation has not even commenced, does not suggest itself as either a palliative or a protective measure.

The Chinese Government is reported to be much perplexed about next year's finances. The outlays far exceed the income in sight, and the only apparent method of establishing equilibrium is to increase the taxes, a course which the Prince Regent is naturally unwilling to take. The problem is complicated by that of currency reform, which Mr. Sheng Hsuan-huai is pressing to have dealt with at once, whereas Prince Tsaitse, President of the Board of Finance, desires to postpone this particular reform. According to the latest telegrams, it has been finally decided that the problem of general finance and an increase of taxation shall be submitted to the Tsucheng-yuan at its first meeting next month, but the problem of currency reform shall be postponed for a year. It is certainly disappointing to learn that such a postponement is considered inevitable. China's monetary system is one of the most imperfect that stands to the discredit of any country, and it is wonderful that an essentially practical nation like the Chinese should be content to remain in such a slough of confusion.

An interesting question has arisen in connexion with the Chekiang Railway. The Governor of the province, Mr. Tang, was recently deprived of that office by Imperial orders, and was forbidden to take any further part in railway work. Of course the right of the Throne to appoint or dismiss officials is not questioned by any one. But it appears that Mr. Tang had been chosen by the shareholders of the Railway to be their President, and they now claim that to veto his connexion with railways is a violation of the private rights of the subject. A petition in that sense has been signed by over 2,000 persons and addressed to the Throne. This is not by any means a fact without precedent in China, but it will be very curious to see how the Prince Regent deals with it.

It is stated that the Chinese Government has decided to send naval students to England, the United States, France, Germany and Japan next year. The number is not given, but as five countries are to be employed for educational purposes, a considerable body of students will have to be dispatched. Nothing has been heard of late about the building of Chinese warships, but if recent rumours as to orders placed in England, Japan and elsewhere be correct, we can well understand that the Chinese Government is beginning to get anxious about officers to take charge of the new vessels.

Next month being the time appointed for the first meeting of the Tsucheng-yuan, public attention is beginning to be directed keenly towards this new institution. The Tsucheng-yuan is a kind of senate, and, according to Chinese official views, its object is to prepare the way for a national assembly. Prince Pu-lun has been appointed President and Mr. Cheng Cha-pen, Vice President. The question has arisen whether foreigners should be admitted to hear the debates of this newly organized body, and rumour has it that Imperial assent will be given.

The Asahi publishes a curiously pessimistic telegram from Peking. Nearly all the Chinese journals, according to our Tokyo contemporary's correspondent, have been writing in an alarmist strain since the annexation of Korea. They descant upon the menace that now hangs over the Chinese Empire owing to Russian and Japanese ambition, and they insist that the situation can be saved only by a strong popular effort. But they fail to indicate what shape this effort should take or how it should be exercised, and since they thus summon the phantom without providing any means of exorcising it, their writings have produced a general feeling of alarm instead of resolution. The telegram adds that no such lugubrious sentiment has occupied the heart of the Chinese nation within the memory of living men, and no one ventures to predict what the outcome will be. This is obviously one of those generalizations which must be received with much caution.

In spite of the rights recovery mania which has interfered so seriously with the material progress of China, Viceroys Jui Cheng and Shih Liang have had the courage to memorialize the Throne in the sense that want of adequate communications is the principal barrier to Chinese prosperity. They therefore advocate the immediate construction of 4 lines of railway, which are somewhat vaguely designated by the telegram as the Yunnan line, the Tibet line, the Ili line and the Kulung line. The two Viceroys unhesitatingly urge that recourse should be had to foreign money for the purposes of these constructions. Viceroy Jui is a Manchu and Viceroy Shih a Chinese, and this union of opinions generally divergent may perhaps have some significance. At any rate it is highly satisfactory to find these prominent officials openly advocating in the interests of their country a distinctly unpopular cause.

There is a somewhat cryptic telegram to the Asahi Shimbun from Peking saying that the Viceroy of Liang-kiang has memorialized the Throne for permission to issue bonds to the extent of 5 million dollars. The face value of the bonds is to be 100 yen, the interest 4-per-cent. and the unredeemed period 6 years. Nothing whatever is said as to the selling price or the period of redemption, but we gather that the idea is to assist industrial and commercial enterprise by lending these bonds to influential men.

The latest theory in Peking is that the impeachment of Mr. Tang Shao-yi by Viceroy Jui, and the hesitation in recalling Yuan Shih-kai to office are due entirely to Japanese machinations. The Tokyo statesmen, according to the views held by the formulators of this theory, apprehended that Yuan's restoration would prelude a rapprochement between the United States and China with the object of curbing Russian and Japanese ambition in Manchuria. Altogether the Chinese seem to be in a nervous condition. They are said to have urgent need of a competent leader, and we begin to think that the statement is well founded. Of course in these circumstances the visit of Mr. Dickinson, Secretary of War, is construed in an important sense by politicians in Peking. In fact the Chinese seem to think that their whole hope of salvation centres on America, and the welcome they are disposed to give to Mr. Dickinson illustrates this mood.

The Nanking Exhibition is said to have been more largely attended on the 19th instant than on any previous day since its opening. The approach of autumnal weather is evidently tempting visitors. We observe from telegrams that advantage has been taken of the occasion to deliver addresses against the shocking custom of foot binding. Emissaries of the society formed for the purpose of putting an end to this barbarism have apparently been allowed to establish a platform within the building of the Exhibition.

The 3rd of October and the 23rd of September, 1910, will be days marked for all time in Chinese history. On the 23rd instant an Imperial decree will convene the first Parliament in China, and the 3rd of October will witness its opening. The Parliamentary buildings, whose construction was originally planned to take five years, are not yet nearly finished, and it will be necessary for the new Parliament to hold its sessions in the precincts of the Law School. But evidently everything possible will be done to impart to the ceremony an air of due solemnity. The Emperor will be represented by the Prince Regent, and doubtless all the foreign chiefs of mission will be present. The Parliament consists of two Houses. The Upper House may be roughly divided into 48 princes or nobles and 52 officials, literati and representatives of highest tax-payers. The Lower House will consist of 100 members elected by the various provincial assemblies. It has been decided that the language used shall be Pekingese, as that is most likely to be generally intelligible. The preparations for this signal event in China's history have been quietly conducted, but now that the Parliament is about to sit, the keenest interest is attached to its proceeding.

Tokyo newspapers state that the regulations for the navigation of the Sungali river have been promulgated and will go into force from the 29th instant. These regulations are the outcome of the negotiations which were recently held between Russia and China, and which threatened at one time to develop inconvenient phases. Rumour alleged that a settlement was reached mainly through Chinese complaisance, and also that the navigation of the river was to be thrown open to all flags. The details of the new regulation have not yet been telegraphed, but it is definitely stated that freedom of navigation is confined to Chinese and Russian vessels. It used to be urged that such a restriction would be contrary to terms of the Portsmouth Treaty wherein Russia abandons all exclusive privileges in Manchuria. But there is a great deal to be said on the other side of the question in this particular case, and evidently it has been said by Russia with convincing explicitness.

It is stated that a project is on foot to bring about the migration into Chientao of all Koreans in Chinese or Russian territory.

The Chinese Representative in Tokyo is said to have applied to his Government for instructions as to whether the Chinese Consul General in Seoul shall be abolished or maintained.

A telegram from Lisbon states that the Chinese Representative in that city, to whom has been entrusted the duty of negotiating the Macao boundary question, has received a rebuff from the Portuguese Government. The latter asserts that it cannot recognize any interference with its right to quell acts of piracy in the waters of Macao.

It is stated that the Governor of the Leased Territory in Kwantung will have either to draw upon the Tokyo Treasury or to impose additional taxes, in order to balance the budget for next year. There is some difficulty in ascertaining the exact amount of the probable deficiency. Seven hundred thousand yen is spoken of, but some confusion is caused by mention of the same sum as being required for the building and the equipment of the Industrial School at Port Arthur. There are also said to be unlooked-for outlays on account of policing the Mukden Antung Railway. What with demands on account of Korea and those on account of Manchuria, the process of empire-building is costing Japan dear.

The agitation in Chekiang continues with regard to the removal of Mr. Tang from his position as Director of the Railways in that province. He seems to have possessed the full confidence of the the people and they are correspondingly irate with Mr. Sheng, to whose indictment Tang owes his downfall. It is a curious fact that the public has not yet obtained any accurate knowledge of the charges preferred against Tang, but it is evident that they find no credence with the public in Chekiang.

THE TOKYO RAILWAY.

The Directors of the Tokyo Railway have thought it worth while to defend themselves against the extremely unjust attack made on the administration of the line by a member of the Tokyo City Assembly. One of the principal points of attack was that during August the Company had run fewer cars than previously and had unduly reduced the number of conductors and motor-men. The Directors point out that while these facts are true enough, the simple explanation is that the change was due to the natural calamity which overtook the city at that time. Many of the motor-men and conductors had to give up work temporarily, their houses having been flooded or wrecked. As a matter of fact, the Company has more than 1,000 cars, and could greatly increase the number running were it expedient to do so. People seem to forget, however, that if the number of cars running on a given section of the road be doubled, their speed has to be reduced by one half, and thus the public gains nothing in the long run. As for the proposal that doors should be placed at the centre of bogie cars, the question has been practically tested with very doubtful results.

THE AMERICAN TOURISTS IN CHINA.

The American tourists are evidently receiving a most hearty greeting from China. All past causes of disagreement between the ancient Empire and the great Republic seem to be put out of sight for the moment, and the vernacular journals, in different words but with the same voice, welcome the tourists enthusiastically. So far as our intelligence up to the present is concerned, the Chinese papers have not attempted to make political capital out of the event. One of them is quoted as emphasizing the fact that the coming of the tourists has no political significance, but is merely an interchange of private courtesy. This newspaper goes on to say that the oldest Empire in the Orient has a special lien upon the friendship of the youngest Power in the Occident, and that amity between the two peoples cannot fail to contribute to the cause of peace.

The American business men now visiting China are having a welcome which is said to throw entirely into the shade the greeting extended recently to the Japanese tourists headed by Mr. R. Kondo. Among other tokens of good will the Chinese are manufacturing silver cups having inscribed on them the names of the tourists. One of these cups will be given to each of the visitors. It is evident that all the grievances of which China used to complain so bitterly with regard to the treatment of her people in the United States have been forgotten for the moment, and the absorbing idea is to secure America's aid against Japanese and Russian aggression. It is doubtless to this desire that we must attribute also the order said to have been given to American builders for a number of Chinese warships. America can construct warships as well as any country in the world can from technical point of view, but she cannot do the work as cheaply and expeditiously as certain other Western countries, and therefore when the Chinese Government gives such a commission to United States dock-yards, something more than mere business considerations must be inferred.

PRATAS ISLAND.

Another difficulty has occurred with reference to Pratas Island. After the place had been recognized as Chinese territory, and after due compensation had been paid to Mr. Nishizawa, the Chinese attempted to develop the resources of the island on their own account, but found the work so unprofitable that they made a contract with Mr. Nishizawa to carry it on under certain conditions. A telegram from Hongkong says that these conditions have not been complied with. There has been a want of integrity on the part of the contractors, and the Chinese Authorities have ordered investigations which will probably lead to annulment of the agreement.

In our last issue we quoted Japanese journals as stating that the business of exploiting Pratas Island after it came into Chinese possession had been entrusted to Mr. Nishizawa. This turns out to be an incorrect statement. What really happened was that the Chinese Government delegated the task of developing the island's resources to a Cantonese official, Mr. Tsai Kan, who associated himself for the purpose with Mr. Fujii, the latter having acquired practical experience from his connection with Mr. Nishizawa. A company called the Ji-Hwa Guild was formed and everything seemed to be progressing favourably. But it subsequently transpired that Messrs. Fujii and Tsai had entered into collusion for the purpose of exploiting the island entirely in their own interests, and had employed certain Japanese adventurers to assist in the enterprise. The Japanese residents in Canton and Hongkong are said to be much incensed against Mr. Fujii, who, they say, has greatly injured his countrymen's fair fame in southern China.

THE UNITED STATES SECRETARY FOR WAR.

The United States Secretary for War is to leave Peking on the 26th instant. His sojourn in that city will have been almost as brief as was his stay in Tokyo. The telegraph credits him with expressing admiration of the vast resources possessed by the Chinese Empire and of the excellency of its military machinery. These are precisely the two points about which we should have expected from Mr. Dickinson adverse criticism instead of special eulogy. The troops of the metropolitan province may have impressed him favourably, as other foreign observers used to be impressed by the force which Viceroy Li Hungchang organized. But one imagines that he would have recalled the sequel of the Viceroy's work, which sequel must be described as a fiasco. The Pehchili troops, tested on the battle plains of Manchuria and Korea, proved themselves almost valueless from a military point of view, however imposing they looked upon parade, and Mr. Dickinson might have remembered that page of history before indulging in the praise attributed to him above. As for evidences of opulence in China, we have never heard that a Western visitor conceived any idea except one of penury. The circumstances amid which Chinese communities exist convey to a European or an American on-looker the conviction, not of large resources, but of a constant and almost desperate struggle to obtain the means of subsistence.

THE TOYO S.S. COMPANY.

Mr. Asano is represented as expressing a very confident opinion about the immediate future of the Toyo S.S. Company. He frankly admits that he did promise to make up the difference out of his own purse if the Company did not earn enough to pay off its debts. But that pledge referred to one whole year's working, not to a half year only. During the half year just ended the Company cleared a profit of a quarter of a million, leaving a debt of 800,000 to be still paid. Mr. Asano believes that this will be fully cleared off in the next half year. He says that the South American service is getting good cargoes and plenty of passengers, and that he looks for a clear profit of from 200,000 to 300,000 yen on this line alone. The San Francisco service is not doing so well in the matter of merchandise, but the splendid big ships of the Company are attracting a full compliment of passengers; so much so that all the berths are sold a fortnight or three weeks in advance. From this service also a substantial profit will be obtained, and altogether Mr. Asano is very optimistic.

THE SEIKO-SHO.

Japanese papers state that the negotiations for a foreign loan for the Seiko-sho have been broken off, and that the required amount is to be obtained in the domestic market. The foreign terms were interest 5 per-cent; issue price 95; actual sum delivered to the Company, 87; unredeemed period 5 years, and period of redemption 24 years. These terms seemed so onerous that recourse was had to domestic banks, and the Mitsui, the Mitsubishi, the Fifeenth, the First, the Hundredth and the Yasuda were invited to supply the money. Our contemporaries say that the Prime Minister interested himself actively in the transaction, but that some offence was given to the bankers by the Government's disposition to fix a hard-and-fast rate of issue. The Government, on its side, was anxious not to encourage the floatation of the loan on terms conspicuously different from the existing official rates of conversion, while, on the bankers' side, the fact that one-half of the shares are held by the Tanko S.S. Company did not enhance the character of the transaction. An agreement was finally arrived at, however, in consideration of a statement by the Government that it contemplated placing orders at the Seikoshō so soon as the latter was in a position to execute them satisfactorily. The Industrial Bank was then added to the syndicate, and it was decided that the loan should be divided into two equal portions, one to be issued before the end of the year, the other at a convenient time next spring. The terms are as follow:—Interest 5 per-cent; issue price 95 yen, net price 90; trust fees 1; unredeemed period 8 years, and period of redemption 17 years. In the event of the public not subscribing, the Industrial Bank agrees to take 2 million yen of the stock, and the other banks 3 millions in equal proportions. The rates of interest work out at 6.37 in the case of the foreign loan and 6.11 in the case of the domestic.

Japanese newspapers, obtaining their information from heaven knows what sources, have a great deal to say this (Sunday) morning about the Seikōshō loan. One amusing statement is that Mr. Toyokawa of the Mitsubishi Bank is much offended because the Directors of the Company have communicated the Japanese terms to London in order to find out whether British financiers can do better. Considering that the British terms were in the first place communicated to Japanese bankers, the attitude attributed by the Mainichi Dempo to Mr. Toyokawa would be simply childish, and we have no hesitation in denouncing the whole story as a canard. We are constrained to say that the sense of responsibility shown by many Japanese journals in publishing details, more or less imaginary, of these important transactions leaves a great deal to be desired. On the other hand, if manufacturers, merchants and bankers cannot conduct their business with suitable privacy, they must take the consequences.

The Shogyō Shimbun alleges that London financiers, on receiving information as to the terms which can be obtained in Japan for a Seikoshō loan, have asked for time to reconsider their original proposal. We quote this from the columns of our Tokyo contemporary for what it may worth, but the Shogyō makes one remark which we cannot but endorse, namely, that the fact of its being possible to obtain this loan in the domestic market cannot but have an excellent effect upon the credit of the Seikoshō and of the Tanko Kaisha also.

THE JAPANESE NAVY.

It is announced that the Emperor himself will proceed to Yokosuka on the 15th of next month to attend the launch of the battleship Kawachi. The progress made by Japan in the matter of ship-building has been somewhat discussed of late. Her first essay was in the 10th year of Meiji (1877), when she built the wooden gunboat Amagi (910 tons). This was followed by the Iwaki (660 tons) which was built in the ensuing year, and very soon we find Yokosuka turning out cruisers of nearly 4,500 tons. In 1902, work was commenced at Kure, and 1905 witnessed a great advance. For, whereas the largest warship built up to the latter year had not exceeded 3,420 tons, a line-of-battleship, the Tsukuba (13,750 tons) was laid down in 1904 and launched in 1905. The Kawachi, which is to take the water next month, will be the biggest vessel ever built in a Japanese yard, and she will be the third line-of-battle ship constructed by Japanese artificers in the Meiji era. We compile the following table from the columns of the Asahi and the Hochi:

1877.....	Amagi	910.....	Yokosuka
1878.....	Iwaki	660.....	"

These figures show that Japan is now competent to take high rank among the ship-building Powers of the world.

It is interesting to read in this context some remarks made by Mr. Shoda Heigoro of the Mitsubishi Company. He describes how up to the year 1894 the Mitsubishi dock-yard at Nagasaki turned out nothing larger than vessels of a few hundred tons. Then the Nippon Yusen Kaisha established its European service with six steamers of 6,000 tons each, and after much difficulty the Mitsubishi secured the order to build one of these vessels provided that the expense did not exceed that incurred in building in England. In order to execute this order it became necessary to procure machinery from England and to engage a large staff of workmen. Midway Lloyds local surveyor raised a question as to the method of construction, and at the request of the Mitsubishi Directors an expert was sent out from England to decide the question. His ruling was in favour of the Japanese Company, and in 1898 the ship was finished. This was the Hitachi Maru, afterwards sunk by the Russians in the Sea of Japan. Her construction had cost a great deal more than her contract price, but still the kudos of having built such a big ship in a domestic dock-yard compensated largely for the cost. To this day it is not possible for Japanese builders to compete with the British, as the former have to import all their iron from abroad. Since that time large cruisers, destroyers, gunboats and so on have been built in the Nagasaki and Kawa-saki yards to Government order, and there is no longer any question of ability. Very likely some of our readers will remember that when the Hitachi-maru was in course of construction, some preternaturally wise critics affirmed that Japan could never build ships as her workmen were not sufficiently strong to drive home a rivet.

SOCIALISM IN JAPAN.

Some discussion is now taking place in Tokyo with reference to the Government's policy in suppressing socialistic literature. The official view is that to cut off the source of poison is wiser than to treat it after it has been imbibed; whereas the Government's critics contend that dilution by the free atmosphere of thought is the best antidote. We do not propose to follow this discussion at any length, but we observe that the Nichi Nichi Shimbun speaks of Christianity as having a more denationalizing influence than Socialism, and contrasts the Government's liberal attitude towards the former with its sternly repressive mood towards the latter. We are surprised that this old error should find a place in the columns of such a journal. If Christianity were a denationalizing creed, what would become of the patriotism of Christian nations? As a matter of fact Buddhism is much more liberal in its eclectic tendencies than Christianity.

The Japanese Authorities are understood to contend that the causes making for the spread of socialistic doctrines in Japan are different from those operating in the Occident. Whereas in Europe and America the motive force is derived chiefly from the conspicuous interval between the rich and the poor, no such striking gap forces itself upon attention as yet in Japan. What is happening in this country is that theorists have been carried away by socialistic literature, and are acting as propagandists of a doctrine whose baleful effects they do not fully appreciate. Even in the primary and middle schools text books are used which contain phrases of a pernicious tendency, and among the students at such schools there are found policemen, post-office officials and other persons whose minds are poisoned by this literature. The Government is therefore determined to check the evil tendency by every available means. We read in the Niroku Shimpō's columns that even among the foreign residents of Yokohama propagandists of socialism, and even of nihilism à la Bakunin, are suspected of being present and active, and our sensational contemporary speaks as though steps to check these folks were imminent. It is at all events certain that four or five arrests have been made in Yokohama and that the police are searching for other suspects, among whom is Mrs. (or Miss) Saito Kuma, who was formerly a teacher at the High School, and is now a vigorous propagandist of communism. We need scarcely say that certain newspapers charge the police with great harshness in connexion with this crusade.

JAPANESE and Korean Chambers of Commerce in Korea have resolved to break up and to organize business societies as industrial advisory bodies.

FORMOSA.

Lieut.-General Koizumi, who has been transferred from the command in Formosa to that of a home brigade, arrived at Shimomoseki on the 21st instant and is quoted as giving some interesting information about the state of affairs in Formosa. He says that the number of combatants on the Japanese side, who are employed in the present campaign, totals 1,900, namely 1,500 in the Gilan column and 400 in the Shinchiku column. In addition to these there are a number of men engaged in the work of road-making. No fighting is going on at present. Each side is treating the other with generous courtesy, gifts of millet and fruit being constantly conveyed to the Japanese troops by the aborigines, while in return the Japanese send presents of bread and tinned provisions. Meanwhile the work of erecting wire entanglements is proceeding apace, and when these are finished the aborigines will have to decide finally between complete surrender and a last deadly struggle. The Lieut.-General adds that the Gaogan from whom special resistance has been encountered, occupy about 200 houses divided into homesteads of from 50 to 100 houses. It was believed that the only other aboriginal tribe in this district was the Marikoan, but another tribe called the Taiyakan had been discovered, and it will be necessary to deal with these three. The total casualties on the Japanese side have been 200, of whom 100 were killed in battle and 100 died of wounds. The aborigines, when they kill a man, devote all their energies to decapitating the corpse in order that they may offer the head at the shrine of their ancestors to whose intervention they attribute their success. The Japanese on their side endeavour to prevent this mutilation, and the result is that struggles for the possession of a body have taken place more than once.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun says that according to the latest statistics there are nine aboriginal tribes, who in spite of all efforts to deprive them of weapons, are still possessed of a formidable number of fire-arms. The following list is given by our contemporary:—

Name of tribe.	Number of rifles.	Number of men.
Ataryan	10,841	29,149
Baiwan	5,901	21,224
Amisu	4,652	29,380

THE ORIENTAL DEVELOPMENT COMPANY.

The Oriental Development Company is said to be seeking an interesting development of its functions. It asks for permission to move Japanese and Koreans from congested districts and to make them settle on lands calling for reclamation. This is evidently a programme which somewhat oversteps the legitimate functions of officialdom. Men cannot be constrained to leave a place where they have chosen to settle, or to settle at a place where they do not choose to live. It must be assumed, however, that the Company sees its way to influencing settlers without any recourse to coercive measures. On the other hand, if such be the case, there should be no reason to apply for official sanction.

SCAPE-GOATS.

We entirely agree with the Fiji Shimpō in denouncing reckless assertions like that recently made in the report presented to the Japan Syndicate on the occasion of the latter's dissolution. The whole fault of the Syndicate's failure was laid upon the shoulders of Japanese commercial immorality and untrustworthiness. Upon what bases was this wholesale charge founded? Had the syndicate been actually engaged in various transactions and had it suffered heavy losses in connexion with them and owing to Japanese dishonesty, then it might have been in a position to give chapter and verse for its charges. But the truth appears to be that it did no business at all. In other words, it failed to obtain from the Japanese terms sufficiently tempting to attract foreign capital and to bring a fine profit to the Syndicate's hands. That this failure should be laid at the door of Japanese commercial morals is obviously most unjust. The fact is, as all well-informed persons know, that immediately after the war with Russia a number of mushroom syndicates and companies sprang up in Europe, impelled by the idea that Japan would come into the market as a wholesale borrower of foreign capital. In nine cases out of every ten these syndicates and companies lent ear to the representations of men who were in reality mere adventurers, but who described themselves as having influential connexions with Japan, and as being in a position to command a full measure of Japanese confidence. Subsequent failure was due in the main to the inevitable inability of these men to make good their claims of influence. Their Japanese associates were not persons of any influence or reputation in their own country, and the mere fact of their connexion with an enterprise was enough to damn it. It is really a mere travesty of justice that such persons should turn round and attribute their own failures to Japanese laches. This habit of denouncing Japanese commercial immorality is indulged in with altogether too much freedom. There have been some grounds for it in the past, but the subject has been exploited ad nauseam by the class of critics who think that to abuse the Japanese is to eulogize foreigners by contrast.

THE INUNDATIONS.

On the forenoon of the 17th instant a special committee of the Seiyu kai, headed by Mr. Sugita Teiichi, waited upon the Prime Minister, and submitted to him a document drawn up by the committee with reference to the necessity of adopting extensive measures for preventing inundations. The committee had been considering this question for some weeks, and had arrived at the conclusion that nothing sufficient could be effected without the participation of the Government. Marquis Katsura, in reply, said that he himself, in company with Marquis Saionji, had visited the scenes of disaster at Karuizawa, and other places, and had arrived at the definite conclusion that deforestation was at the root of the trouble. In Yamanashi prefecture, for example, very radical engineering methods had been employed for the last three years, yet their efficacy on the present occasion had been small compared with the destructive influence of deforestation. Under existing arrangements the work of afforestation fell to the duty of the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, and the work of riparian measures belonged to the sphere of the Home Department. There was reason to believe that the two offices did not co-operate intelligently, and steps to correct that defect would be taken. Another notable point was that in a populous place like Tokyo, where the price of land was high, a tendency existed to reduce the width of rivers and increase their depth, without paying due regard to these level. Such steps might well contribute to inundations. The Marquis added that in the days of the Bakufu these problems seem to have been solved in a more practically satisfactory manner, and steps are now being taken to study the methods in vogue at that time. Meanwhile there could be no doubt that greater attention should be paid to the conservation of forests. So far as the State forests were concerned, it lay within the power of the Government to take the necessary steps, but the Central Authorities have no competence in the case of private and communal forests, and it was hoped that the people themselves would co-operate in that sphere, to which end the Premier bespoke the good offices of the Seiyu-kai.

THE "NICHU NICHU SHIMBUN" ON THE CHRISTIAN CONVERTS IN KOREA.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun has a leading article the gist of which is that nothing need be apprehended from the spread of Christianity in Korea, and that, on the contrary, its organization may be utilized in the cause of peace and order. Our contemporary dwells much upon the difficulty of arriving at any accurate estimate as to the actual number of converts in the Peninsula. The figure has been put at half a million by the converts themselves, and there has been talk of defections aggregating 200,000 since annexation. But the experience of Japan shows how little reliance can be placed on such numbers. Thus two of the missions in this country found their rolls of membership reduced by 500 each last year, and could only account for the loss by attributing it to changes of residence. The truth is that several factors contribute to render statistics unsatisfactory in such matters. In Korea there have certainly been many professing converts who were in reality influenced by political motives, and it is equally certain that there have been missionaries who, tacitly or explicitly, encouraged a belief in the political potency of the Church. These factors have contributed to confuse the issue. An apparently trustworthy authority estimates the total number of converts at about 190,000, and that seems tolerably close to the mark. Even supposing these to be all imbued with political motives, they would make but a small showing among a nation of 10 millions, and the fact that they are openly-affiliated bodies renders them comparatively easy of control. Therefore the apprehensions entertained on this subject by some Japanese are misplaced and groundless. However many Hulberts there may be among them there are also Ladds and Harrises, and on the whole missionary coöperation may be anticipated, and should be enlisted, in the cause of peace and order.

FAREWELL DINNER TO MR. SCHULTZ.

On Thursday evening a number of members of the Tokyo Club gave a farewell dinner to Mr. C. S. Schultz. Covers were laid for 45, and the following were present:—

Mr. T. Akahoshi	Mr. K. Kiyooka
Mr. T. Asabuki	Mr. M. Kushida
Mr. E. J. Blockhuys	Mr. C. Aeda
Col. R. W. Beger	Mr. A. W. Medley
Mr. W. M. Booth	Mr. G. Moillet
Capt. Boyle	Mr. N. Nabeshima
Capt. Brinkley	Mr. Z. Ogawa
Mr. A. C. Drabble	Mr. H. T. Rice
Mr. E. Dun	Mr. G. B. Slater
Mr. T. Hamaguchi	Ct. M. Soyeshima
Ct. K. Hirokawa	Mr. J. Struthers
Mr. S. Imamura	Dr. J. Takaku-u
Mr. R. W. Irwin	Mr. G. Tanaka
Mr. A. Kabayama	Mr. C. S. Wade
Mr. J. R. Kennedy	Mr. N. Watanabe
Mr. R. J. Kirby	Mr. S. J. Wheeler
Mr. S. Kishi	Mr. W. H. Stone
	Mr. S. Ando

Captain Brinkley presided and proposed the health of Mr. Schultz in the following terms:—

GENTLEMEN.—I think that I have never risen to propose the health of a departing friend with more pain than I experience this evening. The longer I live in Japan the more it assumes the aspect of a country of separations. Looking back on the roads we have trodden here—and some of them are pretty long roads—it appears to me that every milestone bears on its face the name of some friend whose presence brought sunshine into our lives and whose departure cast a corresponding shadow over our hearts. One does not like to think how different many things will be when our friend Schultz is no longer among us. I do not propose to attempt any enumeration of the qualities that have endeared him to us. He has forged a special link of sympathy with each of us individually, and any analysis by a third party must sound incomplete. But one thing I may say, and I am sure that it will be endorsed by you all in its fullest sense, cosmopolitan as is the gathering at this board to-night—namely, that Schultz, throughout his whole career in Japan has been an example of the highest type of British merchant. In bidding him farewell we have one consolation in the knowledge that he goes to occupy a higher post in the home country, and in the knowledge that if technical ability, steady industry and patient tactfulness be any passport to success, he deserves to succeed, and will always succeed. It is said that he goes home for good. We refuse to believe it. We refuse to part with the hope that the call of the East will bring him among us once more; and if happily that should be the case, he may be sure of a right royal welcome. Gentlemen, join me in drinking God speed to our friend Mr. Schultz.

This toast was received with all the honours, both English and Japanese. Mr. Schultz, who, on rising, was loudly cheered, replied as follows:—

Capt. Brinkley and Friends: I wish to thank you all most sincerely for the very nice things which have been said of me and which I am sure I shall have very great difficulty in living up to. I also wish to thank you for the hospitality you have extended to me this evening which has made it possible for me to meet so many of my friends on the eve of my departure. I have been in Japan for about 6½ years during which time I have made many friends, and I count among my real friends those I have made here and I am very sorry for many reasons that I am leaving, but I am sure I shall have many opportunities of again visiting Japan, and I shall look forward to them with very great pleasure. If I thought I should be unable to return to Japan at intervals I should hesitate in going. I do not know in what capacity I am returning to London but I am sure it will be for this benefit of my future career. Should any of my many friends visit London without calling on me I shall feel very hurt. I extend a hearty invitation to all my friends when I shall endeavour to reciprocate in some way the hospitality which has been extended to me during my sojourn here. Gentlemen, I thank you most sincerely for the hospitality you have extended to me this evening.

THE "SEISAN CHOSA-KAI."

The above Association, as our readers may remember, was established some time ago under the auspices of Marquis Katsura, and the section of it which has to do with the Empire's foreign trade held a meeting on the 21st instant in the Department of Agriculture and Commerce. Baron Shibusawa presided and the Minister of the Department was present. We do not gather that any definite decisions were formulated, but it seems likely that the Sections recommendations will take the following form:—

First, that the financial organs chiefly concerned with foreign trade shall extend their sphere of business and shall take measures for facilitating and accelerating the transactions of trade.

Secondly, that the railway system and the schedule of charges shall be improved.

Thirdly, that shipping rates shall be amended and made uniform.

Fourthly that bays and harbours shall be quickly improved and that special steps shall be taken to perfect the land and sea communications at Kobe and Yokohama.

Fifthly that the system of rebates in the case of materials imported from abroad for manufacturing purposes shall be amended.

Sixthly, that strenuous steps shall be taken to prevent manufacturing abuses, and to bring about uniformity of quality in the principal staples of exports.

Seventhly, that steps shall be taken to encourage the export of marine products, especially to China.

Eighthly, that measures shall be adopted to encourage the cultivation of the glandule-bearing oak.

Ninthly, that the class of men sent upon tours upon industrial and commercial investigation shall be chosen more carefully.

Tenthly, that hydro-electric power shall be more extensively used for manufacturing purposes.

Eleventhly, that steps shall be taken for introducing uniformity in the organs of foreign trade.

MISS MIFUNE CHIZU.

A considerable sensation has been created in Tokyo by the performances of a clairvoyante named Miss Mifune Chizu. This lady unquestionably possesses the power of seeing into the interior of material objects. Her capacity has been tested by several of the leading professors of the Tokyo University. At a recent séance attended by seven professors, one of them wrote the ideographs Jōtokuten on a piece of paper, which was placed inside a pewter canister the latter being enclosed in a thick wooden box lined with black velvet and carefully sealed. It should be added that these ideographs were taken at random out of a number written by the professors, and the combination was not known to any one until it emerged from the box after the test. Miss Chizu, when she is about to exercise her strange power, requires to be undisturbed for a few moments. She says that after an effort of abstraction, a peculiar sound strikes her tympanum, and she then becomes unconscious of any of her surroundings except the object on which her attention is riveted. This preliminary process is not long. It occupied only seven minutes at the recent séance, and the ideographs were then read with perfect accuracy. Several other similar texts proved equally successful, and people are now talking with much interest about the "lady who can see a thousand ri (Senrikan fujin).

THE SIBERIAN RAILWAY.

Mr. J. T. Hamilton, the General Manager for the East of the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States; who returned last week via Siberia, writes:—

"I consider the trip across the Siberian Railway nothing more than a most enjoyable motoring tour through Russia, Siberia and Manchuria. The carriages are good and comfortable; the food is fresh and up to the average supplied in ordinary good hotels in New York, London, Paris or Berlin. Fresh milk, butter, eggs, fish, chicken, fruits and vegetables can be purchased at almost every stopping place en route. There is practically no dust, and the little that is experienced is caused by the passage of the train over the road. The dust experienced in American and European railways is far more disagreeable, as the swift passage of the trains in these countries (say from 50 to 80 miles an hour) raises a lot of dust; while the Siberian train only travels at an average of 23 miles an hour, including stoppages.

The country is richly grassed and watered by large rivers throughout. If it were possible to place the hedges, trees and roads of England upon the many hundreds of miles of undulating, rolling downs of Siberia and Manchuria you would have all the rest in the shape of rich grassed, undulating, rolling downs, intersected with large and small rivers. The climate is cool and pleasant. I crossed in June, and in August and September, and experienced cool bracing weather.

I do not wish it to be inferred that everything is perfect, but I feel certain that an ordinary traveller journeying over the Siberian railway for the first time would find the trip more comfortable than he anticipated.

Less than 13 days from London lands the passenger at Vladivostok, and 35 hours from there in one of the fine Russian volunteer steamers across the pretty sea of Japan brings him to picturesque Japan; thus concluding one of the nicest journeys I know for body and mind."

"THE PATERNITY OF JESUS CHRIST."

While we fully acknowledge the right of every man to believe in whatsoever creed he pleases—provided that its tenets be consistent with the canons of moral decency—or not to believe in any creed whatsoever, if scepticism be his mood, we affirm that to pervert liberty of thought into flagrant licence of language is not within the right of any man. Therefore when the Japan Herald claims with one breath its title to freedom of conscience, and with another goes out of its way to insult Jesus Christ, we affirm that that journal tramples on its own doctrines. Quite apart from the supernatural attributes which tradition assigns to him, the founder of Christianity is the greatest philosopher of religion that the world has ever seen. Millions of men and women have revered his name during 20 centuries, and millions continue to revere it for the sake of the incalculable blessings that the creed he taught has conferred on humanity. The commonest principles of courtesy should secure against vulgar and ribald insult a name enshrined in so many hearts. The Japan Herald does not recognise this: the commonest principles of courtesy have no meaning for it when it mounts its agnostic hobby. It does not hesitate to defend the coupling of grossly opprobrious terms with the name of the Son of the God of Christianity. If atheism—and we use the term without any disparaging intention whatever—impels its disciples to such excesses, they are to be pitied.

"EASTERN ENGINEERING."

We have before us the first number of a new monthly entitled "Eastern Engineering," or "The Advocate of Anglo Oriental Interests," which promises to be of great value to British manufacturers and to Oriental communities. It is published in London, Bombay, Calcutta, Hongkong, Shanghai and Tokyo and the editor explains its raison d'être as follows:—

During the last few years we have often been urged by engineers, merchants, and others in India, China, and Japan to extend the scope of African Engineering so as to embrace the East. This demand has always been based on the fact that there existed no journal in Asia which attempted to advocate Anglo-Oriental engineering interests on the lines followed by African Engineering in its advocacy of Anglo-African engineering interests. After lengthy consideration, however, we decided against including Asia in the scope of that journal. Africa is Africa and Asia is Asia, and the two must be treated separately. In fact, African Engineering owes much of its strength and influence to the fact that it is a specialist engineering paper dealing only with Africa.

There is not any wish to make African Engineering or Eastern Engineering compete with ordinary engineering journals. At the present time, when engineering has extended so enormously, and every continent has its own distinct requirements we take it that the day is past when it is possible for a single general engineering paper, however big, to attempt to deal with the whole world in anything but a very sketchy manner. Then, again, a whole-world engineering paper must of necessity contain a great deal of matter which is totally void of interest in many parts of the world. Instead, therefore, of extending the scope of African Engineering to Asia, which would have had the effect of weakening that paper as the standard authority on African engineering matters, we decided to start Eastern Engineering to deal only with the East.

The table of contents of the first number is the following:—

THE KOREANS OF VLADIVOSTOCK

The raid made by the Russian police at 3 a.m. on the 13th instant in the Korean quarter of Vladivostock seems to have produced something like a panic. Several of the Korean residents are said to have concluded that the wisest course would be either to leave the town altogether or to frankly become Japanese subjects. The latter measure would not serve their purpose much. What they are wanting to become is not Japanese subjects, since they are that already, but law-abiding and non revolutionary people. Meanwhile the Russian Authorities seem to be determined that their country shall not furnish an asylum for Korean agitators. The police are said to be adopting stringent measures everywhere, and there will soon be nothing for the disaffected folks except to cross the Tumen as soon as possible.

THE PHILIPPINES AND JAPAN.

It appears that the Manila Times published, a few days ago, a statement that Mr. Iwaya, Japanese Consul at Manila, had held a conference with a number of Filipinos, and had assured them of Japanese coöperation with any attempt to recover the independence of the Islands. Mr. Iwaya has just returned to Tokyo, and being interviewed on this subject, declares in the most emphatic terms that the story is absolutely false. He has never had any meeting with any Filipinos, neither has he, directly or indirectly, formulated any opinion bearing the slightest resemblance to the views attributed to him. He justly says that nothing could be more unbecoming for a consular official than to meddle with the political affairs of the countries to which he is accredited, and that such indiscretion would be doubly unpardonable in the case of the Philippines where sinister designs have been attributed to the Japanese.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Friday, September 16.

The continuance of wet, cold weather is producing something like a panic in Tokyo. Rice has risen from to 15½ yen per koku, and a general slump was witnessed in the share market on the 14th instant. The shares of the Exchange dropped by more than 7 points, so that the debacle in the past two days have been 11.10 points.

Saturday, September 17.

With the return of seasonable weather all shares have sprung upwards.

Monday, September 19.

The upward movement on the Stock Exchange continued yesterday owing to the restoration of fine weather. A conspicuous rise took place in the stock of the Rice Market.

Tuesday, September 20.

The bad weather during the night and forenoon of the 20th instant produced a debacle in the forenoon session of the Exchange, but the afternoon saw considerable recovery.

Thursday, September 22.

The inclement weather has again produced a depressed state of affairs. We append the quotations for November delivery:—

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.
